As to the first question, I think that retiring allowances are under the present law governed by section 61 of the Act of 1872. The amount of the retiring allowance is entirely in the discretion of the School Board. I do not assent to the view that the retiring allowance here is the £60, and that the rent free use of the house and garden is something over and above that. I think the proper way to state the matter is, that the School Board in their discretion have given the aged teacher, as a retiring allowance, £60 and the occupation of the house and garden. Instead of that they might have increased the money allowance. They might, for example, have fixed it at £75 so as to give the retiring teacher £15 wherewith to get a house for himself. That could not have been objected to on the ground of want of power, and we would hardly have entertained the objection to it on the score of discretion, that it was an outrageous use of power. They did not take that course, but yielded to the suggestion made to them in dealing with this aged man, that he should not be turned out of the house he had so long occupied, but that an arrangement should be made with his successor to take a money allowance and to provide himself with a house in the meantime. I think they acted wisely in so doing, and, at all events, they acted within their discretion. Even supposing they had put the new teacher in possession of the house they would not have been bound to restrain him from letting it, so long as he was not neglecting his duties. He might have let it to the old teacher for such a sum as would have enabled him to rent another. It is a new idea to me that a teacher may not let the teacher's house. Of course he cannot do so to the prejudice of his duties, but where no such prejudice is suffered schoolmasters often do let them. Schoolhouses situated near the sea are often let in summer; and so also the manses of parish clergymen are often let in summer. That is quite lawful, though no doubt the presbytery would interfere if the thing were done to the prejudice of the parish.

I think that we should answer the questions to the effect of finding that the arrangement made between the Board and Mr Lawrie with regard to retiring allowance, both as to money payment and house and garden, was lawful and within their discretion. No. 71.
Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur.

LORD LEW.—The objections stated seem to be that the arrangements as regards both the £60 and the house and garden are ultra vires of the School Board. I cannot say that I share the opinion that the ratepayers have not a good title to state their objections, as the arrangement may affect the rates.

On the objections themselves, however, I agree that, as regards the first, the School Board is entitled to fix the retiring allowance in accordance with section 61 of the Act of 1872. As regards the schoolhouse and garden, my only doubt has been whether a school board, as long as they retain the schoolhouse, are not bound to use it for the accommodation of the schoolmaster. They may change the site or sell the building, but I do not think they are entitled to deal with it as if it were private property. While expressing this doubt, I have nothing to add to the opinions of your Lordships on the merits of the objections themselves.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"The Lords . . . are of opinion that the School Board in granting the allowance specified in the case and the free use of the teacher's house and garden to Mr Lawrie on his retiring from the office of schoolmaster, acted within their powers under the Education Act of 1872: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—JAMES P. SYM, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—J. G. Smith—Wilson.

No. 72.

DUNCAN & JAMIESON, Defenders (Respondents).—J. C. Thomson

—J. A. Reid.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Aggravation of Damages—Newspaper—Disclosure of anonymous correspondent.—In an action of damages for slander, it is competent for the pursuer as well as for the defender to prove the circumstances in which the slander was written where the defender is the writer,—or published where the defender is the publisher,—as affecting the amount of damages.

A town-councillor of a royal burgh raised an action of damages against the publishers of a newspaper for slander contained in an editorial article, and in a series of letters signed with various pseudonyms, published in their paper, and charging him with dishonest conduct in his office. He averred that the letters and article were part of a systematic plan to destroy his character, and that the defenders "either wrote the said letters or procured them to be written for publication in their said newspaper." An issue was adjusted "whether the said letters and article were of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously" represented him as having been guilty of the dishonest conduct in question. Held that he was not bound to put in issue whether the letters were written by the defenders, but was entitled to lead evidence upon that point, on the issue as adjusted, with a view to aggravation of damages, and that therefore he was entitled to a diligence to recover documents relating to the authorship, composition, or publication of the letters and article, though their recovery might lead to the disclosure of the names of anonymous correspondents who were not represented in the cause.

Low v. Taylor, 5 D. 1261, and Brims v. Reid & Sons, 12 R. 1016, distinguished.

No. 72.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.

M.

Observations per Lord Shand and Lord Adam on the case of Cooley v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. 8 D. 288.

WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM, a member of the Town-council of Stirling, raised an action of damages for alleged slander against Messrs Duncan & Jamieson, printers and publishers of the Stirling Observer and the Stirling Saturday Observer newspapers—damages laid at £1000.

The alleged slanders were contained in a series of eight letters of various dates, the first being dated 6th September and the last 20th October 1888, and in an article dated 20th September of the same year. All the letters and the article in question were published in one or other of the newspapers above mentioned. The letters were signed with various pseudonyms "Trader," "Another Trader," "Still another Trader," "Bow Street," &c.

The pursuer stated that the letters and article in question represented, "that the pursuer was a dishonest and dishonourable person, and that being a member of the Town-council of Stirling, he took advantage of his position to make money to the town's great hurt; that he had been bribed by the Caledonian Railway Company to betray the interests of the burgh in favour of the said Caledonian Railway Company; that he was a two-faced man, and a Judas, and ought to be shunned."

It was ultimately admitted that the above statement was a fair summary of the effect of the accusations made in the letters and article.

The pursuer further averred;—(Cond. 14) "The whole of the said letters and articles published by the defenders as aforesaid not only contain the false, calumnious, and malicious passages before cited, but, whether taken together or separately, were calculated and intended to hold up and expose, and did calumniously and injuriously hold up and expose, the pursuer to public contempt and ridicule. They were part of a systematic plan to destroy or injure the pursuer's respectability, reputation, character, and usefulness as a public man; and they have had the effect of lowering and degrading the pursuer in the eyes of the public." (Cond. 16) "On 22d October 1888, Mr D. W. Logie, solicitor, Stirling, the pursuer's agent, wrote to the defenders with regard to the foreshaid letter signed 'Bow Street,' which had appeared in the Stirling Saturday Observer of 20th October, and to the charges previously made against the pursuer in the defenders' papers. He requested the defenders to furnish him with the name and address of the writer of the 'Bow Street' letter, and called on the defenders for an apology. The pursuer believes and avers that the defenders either wrote the said letters or procured them to be written for publication in their said newspaper. The defenders have declined to give the pursuer any information or any satisfaction, and in these circumstances the present action has been rendered necessary." (Ans. 16 for the defenders) "The said letter is referred to. Quoad ultra denied."

The defenders averred;—"The writings complained of having been made in the public interest, and being only fair comments on the pursuer's public conduct, he has suffered no damage from them, and is not entitled to sue upon them."

The following issue was adjusted for the trial of the cause:—"Whether the said statements, letters, and article printed in the appendix hereto, or any of them, or any part of them, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer being a member of the Town-council of Stirling took advantage of his position to make money to the town's great hurt, that he had been bribed by the Caledonian Railway Company to betray the interests of the burgh in favour of the said Caledonian Railway Company, that he was a two-faced man, and a Judas, and ought to be shunned; or make similar false and calumnious representations of and regarding the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and No. 72.

damage?"

On 9th January 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) granted diligence to the pursuer against havers for recovery of the books and writings mentioned in the specification for him as amended.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

The original specification contained, inter alia, the four articles quoted infra.* The first three articles were disallowed by the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The articles which had been struck out of the specification ought to be restored. There was here a specific averment that the defenders were the writers, directly or indirectly, of the letters in question. They denied that, and proof on the matter should be allowed. The proof would go to aggravate the damages, and on that ground the inquiry was relevant. It was admitted that in the ordinary case an editor was not bound to give up the name of his correspondent.<sup>1</sup> There was no privilege on the part of a newspaper editor,<sup>2</sup> and if it could be proved that the defenders concocted and carried out a plot by which it was made to appear that the conduct of the pursuer was regarded as disgraceful by a large body of the public, that increased his fault, and was relevant to be placed before the jury, and ought to be taken into consideration by them in assessing damages. The measure of fault might be put in issue.<sup>3</sup> It was as competent to prove the circumstances in which the slander was uttered with a view to the aggravation, as with a view to the mitigation of damages.<sup>4</sup> It was competent to lead this proof on the present issue, because notice was given on record that it was intended to be proved that the defenders were the writers as well as the publishers of the slander, and further because that fact was merely an aggravation of the original offence and not a totally distinct one, which would require an issue to itself. The Lord Ordinary in disallowing these articles had been influenced by the case of Lowe v. Taylor,<sup>1</sup> but that case had no application here, as all the parties as well as the Court took the argument on the footing that the letters were bona fide, and had been written to the editor, for insertion, by members of the public. Here there was a distinct averment to the contrary. That averment also differentiated this case from

* "(1) The manuscripts of the various letters referred to in the 5th, 6th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th articles of the condescence, and the manuscript of the newspaper article mentioned in the 7th article of the condescence, or the manuscripts of the writings or documents embodying the said letters or article. (2) The business-books of the defenders for the period between 1st August and 5th November 1888—including diaries, journals, memoranda-books, note-books, letter-books and cash-books—that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries therein relating to the said letters or article, or any of them, or to the authorship, composition or publication thereof, or to payments made by the defenders on account thereof, or in connection therewith. (3) All letters received by the defenders during the foresaid period relating to the letters or article in question, or to the authorship or publication thereof, and all receipts received by the defenders for payments by them on account of, or in connection with, the said letters or article. (4) All letters received by the defenders during the months of September and October 1888, from the pursuer and his law-agent regarding the publications in question."

<sup>1</sup> Brims v. Reid & Sons, May 28, 1885, 12 R. 1016; Lowe v. Taylor, Nov. 16, 1844, 5 D. 1261.

<sup>2</sup> Merivale v. Carson, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. D. 275.

<sup>3</sup> Rogers on Libel and Slander, 2d edit. p. 309; Cooley v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., Dec. 13, 1845, 8 D. 288, 18 Scot. Jur. 134; Scotland v. Thomson, 1781, 2 Hailes, 716; Auld v. Shairp, July 14, 1875, 2 R. 950.

<sup>4</sup> Browne v. M'Farlane, Jan. 29, 1889, ante, p. 368.

No. 72.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

Brims' case, and those two cases were the authorities for saying that an editor who took the responsibility of an anonymous letter on himself was not bound to disclose his correspondent's name. It might be that the correspondent's name would probably be disclosed if these articles and the proposed line of proof were allowed, but in the absence of direct authority on such a case as this, where an elaborate plot was averred, the Court should not be very tender in protecting slanderers who wished to remain concealed.

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted that there was no case of privilege, but if the articles in question were allowed it would necessarily lead to the disclosure of the defenders' correspondents' names. That was contrary to the rule in such cases as laid down in Brims v. Reid & Sons (12 R. 1016) and Lowe v. Taylor (5 D. 1261), and the editor need not answer a question as to whether he himself was the author of the letters, as that would give up his own name, which might weigh with the jury in regard to damages. The diligence here should be considered with respect to the issue, and there was no hint that the question of authorship was to be gone into.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very important case, in my view of it, and it raises a question of some novelty. The series of letters which appeared in these newspapers during the months of September and October last was certainly in the highest degree calumnious, particularly as they were directed against the reputation of a man in a public position. There is no defence of veritas, but the publishers of the paper propose to take the whole responsibility not only of the editorial article in question, but of the series of letters, which ex facie appear to have been written by different people. All the letters are pseudonymous, and are signed "Trader," "Another Trader," and so forth, and bear to have been written by various people who are interested in the affairs of the town of Stirling. So far the matter is quite in a condition to go to trial, and an issue has been taken which is directed against the defenders, as printers and publishers of the newspapers in question. The complaint is, that in the editorial article and in the various letters there are most calumnious statements made regarding the conduct and reputation of the pursuer.

In ordinary circumstances I should certainly say that, having the defenders as the responsible parties to answer this claim of damages, the pursuer is not entitled to make the demand which he does, namely, to ascertain by diligence or by direct evidence who is the real writer of these letters. But this is not an ordinary case, for the pursuer has on record two very important statements. He says in article 14 of his condescendence, speaking of these letters and the article,—"They were part of a systematic plan to destroy or injure the pursuer's respectability, reputation, character, and usefulness as a public man; and they have had the effect of lowering and degrading the pursuer in the eyes of the public." In connection with that, he avers in the 16th article that "the defenders either wrote the said letters or procured them to be written for publication in their said newspaper."

Now, if it is true that this was a systematic plan concocted and carried out for the purpose alleged, and if in prosecution of that plan the defenders wrote this series of letters as well as the editorial article, and thus gave the appearance that this opinion of the pursuer's conduct came from several distinct and independent sources, they certainly took means to deceive the public as to facts which were taking place, for, as the matter was stated, the public were naturally led to believe that many people entertained a very bad opinion of the pursuer, and thought him guilty of corruption and malversation in office, and that that opinion was by no means confined to the editors of these papers. Such an idea was calculated largely to increase the damage to the reputation of the pursuer, for if it was only the opinion of the editor that was concerned the public might have thought—this is only scandal, and we will wait and see what happens before we believe the story; whereas if various people wrote to the same effect the slander necessarily and naturally became much more serious.

No. 72.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

Now, in my opinion, it is competent to prove at the trial, when we have such distinct averments as we have here, that the aggravated damage thus produced arises entirely from the actings of the defenders themselves, and that they falsely represented that others concurred in the view of the pursuer's character which they stated.

The only difficulty raised by the defenders is that if the pursuer means to prove that the publishers were really themselves the authors, directly or indirectly, of these letters, they must take an issue on the question, and that the issue as it stands will not enable them to prove that part of their case. That is a technical objection, but it must be carefully considered.

I have come to be of opinion that it is not necessary to put the question of authorship in issue—that is, either to insert it in the present issue or to take a second issue on it. If it were put into the issue as adjusted the pursuer would run this risk, that unless he proved both authorship and publication he could not get a verdict. That objection would not apply, of course, to a second issue on the point, but I do not see the necessity of such an issue, for the only purpose for which the evidence is sought is to shew what was the state of mind of the writers of the letters and of the mind of the writer of the editorial article when they were written, because the defenders were themselves the authors of them.

If that fact is established, it will probably aggravate the damages very considerably, and I think it is a good ground for aggravating them, just as it is a good ground for mitigation if it could be shewn that the editorial article was written under such circumstances as to lead the editor to the belief that the statements in the letters were true. It would I think be difficult to reconcile the rule we have laid down as to the mitigation of damages by proving all the circumstances in which the libel was written, with a refusal to allow the same sort of evidence to be led in aggravation of damages. If we admit circumstances to be proved in mitigation of damages, I think we must allow them to be proved in aggravation; and this case appears to me to be one of those in which proof of the circumstances alleged will be most important.

I was a little struck at first sight by Mr Thomson's argument that if this diligence is granted it may result in the disclosure of the authorship of letters written by third parties who are not represented in the cause. It is not desirable that that should be so, but at the same time the Court cannot have much sympathy with the writers of anonymous letters containing very calumnious statements, and such writers will have no great reason to complain if, to further the ends of justice, it may be necessary to drag them from their lurking places. I am, therefore, for disregarding that consideration in disposing of the case, and think that this diligence should be allowed.

LORD MURE.—The only difficulty I have found is with regard to the word

No. 72. "authorship" in the second and third articles of the proposed specification.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

The general rule in such cases as the present is that the editor of a newspaper, where he takes the responsibility for anonymous correspondence published in his paper, is not bound to disclose the author. I do not wish to trench on that rule, but, as your Lordship has remarked, this is not an ordinary case, for in articles 14 and 16 of his condescendence the pursuer makes a specific averment that these letters were part of a plan to damage his character, and that they were in reality not written, as they bear to be, by different persons, but by the defenders themselves.

I think that proof of those facts is competent evidence on the question of damages, and I agree with your Lordship that upon the same principle as you may prove, in mitigation of damages, the circumstances in which the slander was written, in order to shew that the writer was not acting through any malicious intention towards the pursuer, so the pursuer may be allowed to prove all the circumstances of the case in aggravation of damages.

It is clear that if the defenders had been in the witness-box they would have been subject to examination on the allegations in the two articles of the condescendence which I have mentioned; and that being so, I see no ground for holding that the pursuer can be prevented from obtaining access to documents which may tend to prove those allegations. I therefore agree in thinking that these articles of the specification should be allowed.

LORD SHAND.—If this were a question to be determined on strictly logical principles, much might be said in favour of refusing to allow such an inquiry as the production of the letters and documents in question will open up. According to principles of strict reason, it appears to me that assuming the publication of such calumnious statements as those complained of in this action, the only question left is one of the amount of damages, and it may fairly be said that if that be the only question, then all that the jury require to have before them is the articles complained of, and the fact of publication. The nature of the false and calumnious charges and the nature and extent of the publication give full materials for the assessment of damages. The amount of the injury done will not strictly speaking be affected, so far as I can see, by proof of what was the state of mind of the writer when the slander was written. The damage done by the anonymous publication in the paper is the same whoever may have written the libel, or whatever was the state of his mind when he did so. But although this be true, I am satisfied at the same time that our law has allowed evidence directed to these matters from the earliest date at which cases of this class have arisen. One element in the question of damages is solatium to the person calumniated, and it may be that it is on that ground that the amount of damage has in fact been to some extent determined according to the degree of malice by which the writer was actuated, or the circumstances, extenuating or the reverse, in the position of the libeller, whether author or publisher, in which the slander was uttered or the libel issued.

Mr Guthrie Smith has pointed out that as early as 1781, in the case of Scotland, 2 Hailes, 716, evidence of that kind was admitted. In that case it was said that evidence was admissible to shew whether the slander was written "of suddenity" or deliberately. The damage done would be the same in either case, but the Court would allow evidence on the point. So in practice evidence has been, I think, always admitted as to whether the slander was uttered or written, not only under provocation, but also under misapprehension to any extent, or under other extenuating circumstances, or again whether it emanated solely as a malicious invention of the writer, or on any information which he might reasonably believe to be true. And in the most recently decided case of Browne v. M'Farlane, the principle was clearly recognised that the parties are entitled to lay before the jury the whole circumstances in which the slander or libel was uttered, including the state of mind of the author or publisher. The rule is I think analogous to that which was sanctioned in the case of Morton, Cooley's Factor (8 D. 288). There a person was killed in a railway accident, and his representatives sued for damages. Now, on strict principles of reason in that case, the proper measure of damage would have been the extent of the injury, but the Court rejected an attempt to put in issue only "what is the amount of the said loss, injury, and damage," preceded by an admission that the death was caused by the company's fault, and decided that the jury should be in possession of the whole circumstances, in the view that these circumstances might affect the amount of damages to be awarded by them. The view which prevailed was that if the case were one where everything was systematically done to avoid accident, and the accident only happened through some slight error, the company should have the benefit of this, but if on the other hand, the accident occurred through gross carelessness, this fact should be admitted to proof as not without bearing on the question of damages. I do not for myself say that I should recommend a jury to make the nature or extent of the company's fault an element in determining the amount of damages to be awarded. But whatever may be said as to the legal principles involved in that decision, it was so decided, and has settled the practice ever since, so that there is, so far as I know, no case in which proof of fault has been excluded, though fault has been unqualifiedly admitted, except where parties have by consent agreed that the question should be tried on the pure question of damages, and I have little if any doubt that in practice juries do have regard to the degree of fault of the company to some extent in the assessment of damages.

Here if we refuse to allow the proposed evidence, the defenders would be in a position to go to the jury and say—you must assume that all these letters came from bona fide members of the public, who greatly disapproved of the conduct of the pursuer. They might admit through their counsel that they were wrong in publishing the slander, and state that they regretted having done so, but that they had yielded to pressure; and plead successfully that on that ground smaller damages should be awarded than would otherwise have been the case. That would be an injustice to the pursuer if, in point of fact, the letters were in reality or in effect the production of the publishers themselves. That is, however, the averment here made by the pursuer. I am not prepared to say that had there been no special averment to that effect on record, I should have been for admitting this line of evidence, but, with a record like this, I think we are bound to do so.

The case is quite distinguishable from that of Lowe v. Taylor (5 D. 1261). In that case there was no suggestion that the letters had not been received by the editor from bona fide third parties. The case was argued on that footing, and it was therefore held that as the editor, who was not the writer of the letters, took all the responsibility of publication on himself, the pursuer had no interest to go behind the publication which was the only matter complained of, and so to learn the name of the correspondent. Here, however, there is a distinct aver-

No. 72.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

No. 72.

Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

ment that the letters were written, or caused to be written, by the defenders themselves.

The only other question is whether there is any necessity for a separate issue as to the authorship of the letters. I agree that that is a question which must be looked at closely, but, giving it the best consideration, I have come to be clearly of opinion that the issue that has been adjusted is sufficient and proper for the trial of the cause. It seems to me that the question comes simply to be one of more or less damages according to whether the defenders wrote these letters themselves or not, in so far as the jury may think fit to give weight to that consideration. If the defenders got the letters from an ordinary correspondent, the damages may be smaller; if they wrote the letters themselves, the measure of damages may be enlarged. It is merely a question of aggravation of damages, and not a matter for a separate issue, and therefore I do not think a separate issue is required. I agree in thinking that the diligence originally sought is not too wide, and see no reason for limiting its terms in the interest of parties other than the defenders, who may have been anonymous slanderers, and on the whole, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the diligence granted in the terms asked.

LORD ADAM.—In actions of damages for libel it is competent by the law of Scotland to prove the state of mind of the publisher, or of the writer of the libel, as the case may be, when it was written or published. In the case of the publisher he may shew all the circumstances in which he made the publication. We had an example of that in the recent case of Browne v. M'Farlane (ante, p. 368), where the publisher was allowed to shew that he received the letter complained of from a regular correspondent, and he might have gone on to shew that he made all due inquiry as to the correctness of the statements made in it. Now, if such evidence is allowed in mitigation of damages, I think a similar inquiry must be allowed in aggravation of them. One is just the counterpart of the other. It will not do for the defender to say—I propose to inquire into the surrounding circumstances, but you, the pursuer, must not do so. On that ground, I am for allowing these articles of the specification. If we did not do so, the effect would be to put a publisher in a better position than the public, for all he would have to do would be to write anonymous letters to himself, and publish them, and then to say, I accept responsibility as publisher, and refuse to give up my correspondent's name.

I am not moved by the fact that this line of evidence may lead to the disclosure of the name of the actual writer of these letters, because I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Court can have little sympathy with that class of persons. I quite see, however, that if, as in the case of Lowe v. Taylor (5 D. 1261), no legitimate interest can be shewn for the disclosure of the anonymous writer's name, such an inquiry as this may not be allowed, but where, as here, there is a clear interest averred on record, I do not think we should stand in the way of its being made.

I do not wish to rest my opinion in this case on the case of Cooley (8 D. 288),<sup>1</sup> because I think actions of damages for libel are exceptional in this respect, and the admission of such evidence does not require to be supported by the doctrines advanced in that case. My recollection of the practice in such cases differs from that of Lord Shand. No doubt the question of fault is laid before the jury, but in my experience a jury is never asked to enlarge or to diminish the amount of damages on the ground of the extent of fault on the part of the defender. That has not been in my experience the nature of the inquiry in actions of damages for fault or negligence.

<sup>1</sup> Followed in Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Co., May 23, 1856, 18 D. 862.

No. 72.
Feb. 2, 1889.
Cunningham
v. Duncan &
Jamieson.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to grant the diligence in the terms originally proposed by the pursuer.

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—WILLIAM DUNCAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE SIMPSON, Petitioner.—C. S. Dickson.
HENRY M. HORSBRUGH (Liquidator of the Boson Oil Company, Limited), Respondent.—G. W. Burnet.

No. 73.
Feb. 5, 1889.
Simpson v.
Boson Oil Co.
Limited.

Company—Voluntary liquidation—Rectification of register by Court—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 138.

On 15th August 1888 it was resolved, at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Boson Oil Company, Limited, that the company should be voluntarily wound up in terms of the Companies Act, and Mr Henry M. Horsbrugh, C.A., was appointed liquidator.

On 20th October 1888 George Simpson, a shareholder of the company, presented a petition to the Court for rectification of the register of the company by deleting therefrom his name as the holder of 1440 shares.

The liquidator lodged answers in which he stated that with regard to 1391 of the shares he was willing that the register should be rectified as craved, on the ground that they had not been properly allotted, but with regard to the remaining 49 “he conceives himself not entitled to consent to the rectification without the authority of the Court.”

On 23d January 1889 the liquidator presented a note to the Court in which he stated that all questions with regard to the remaining forty-nine shares had been settled, and praying the Court “to order the rectification of the register of the members of the Boson Oil Company by deleting the name of the petitioner as a shareholder of the company, so far as the said 1440 shares are concerned, and to order the register of the said company to be rectified by deleting therefrom the said shares.”

He relied on section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862,* and cited the under-mentioned authorities<sup>1</sup> with regard to the intervention of the Court in voluntary windings-up.

THE COURT, without giving opinions, pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the prayer of the note of 23d January 1889.

RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—GEORGE ANDREW, S.S.C.—Agents.

* Section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides,—“Where a company is being wound up voluntarily the liquidators or any contributory of the company may apply to the Court in . . . Scotland . . . to determine any question arising in the matter of such winding-up, or to exercise as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court.”

<sup>1</sup> Buckley, 5th edit. p. 307; Sdeuard v. Gardner, March 10, 1876, 3 R. 577; Sdeuard, June 6, 1878, 5 R. 867; Clark v. Wilson, June 7, 1878, 5 R. 867.

No. 74. GEORGE SMITH & CO. AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—Asher—Ure.
HUGH FARRIES SMYTH, Defender (Respondent).—Goudy.

Feb. 5, 1889.
Smith & Co.
v. Smyth.

Bankruptcy—Deed of Arrangement—Illegal Preference—Right to challenge.
—Held that a deed of arrangement in a sequestration conveying the sequestrated estates to a purchaser does not carry a right to challenge illegal preferences.

Bankruptcy—Illegal Preference—Act 1696, cap. 5.—A firm, within sixty days of their sequestration, assigned their book debts to the amount of £387, 15s., in security of an immediate advance of £330, and in exchange for a bill for £57, 15s. previously granted by them to the assignee.

Question whether this assignation was struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5, to the extent of the £57, 15s.

Opinion per Lord Young that it was not.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ON 6th May 1887, George Smith & Co., ironfounders, Sun Foundry, Kennedy Street, Glasgow, granted an assignation whereby, "in consideration of the sum of £330 advanced by Hugh Farries Smyth, 4 Main Street, Anderston, and a bill dated 31st March 1887, for £57, 15s. granted by us" [in favour of Hugh Farries Smyth], they assigned, conveyed, and made over "to the said Hugh Farries Smyth and his heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, the following book debts due and owing to us, and to be held and collected by him in security of the said advance and bill, videlicet," &c. Then followed a list of the book debts.

The bill, which was then current, was handed back by Smyth at the same time that he made the advance of £330.

On 25th May 1887, the estates of George Smith & Co. were sequestrated.

At a meeting of the creditors of the firm, on 11th July, it was unanimously resolved that the sequestrated estates should be wound up under a deed of arrangement, and accordingly a trustee was not appointed.

Thereafter, on 1st August, a deed of arrangement was entered into between George Smith & Co., Gavin Bell Millar, and the creditors of the firm, whereby Millar agreed "to purchase the whole estate property and assets constituting the said sequestrated estate as it stands, including the goodwill of the business and a right to use the firm's name, and to pay £3500 for a discharge of the heritable debts other than the feu-duty and whole arrears thereof and £3000 for division among the unsecured creditors"; and the creditors, "for all right and interest they have acquired by or through said sequestration," renounced and discharged the same, and reinvested, restored, and retrocessed the said George Smith & Co., their heirs, executors, and assignees, "in and to their whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated, belonging to them at the date of their sequestration or subsequently acquired or succeeded to; surrogating and substituting them and their foresaids in the creditors' full right and place in the premises."

In May 1888, George Smith & Co. and Millar brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Hugh Farries Smyth, the assignee under the assignation of 6th May 1887, and against David Prentice Menzies, to whom Smyth's rights under that assignation had been assigned, to have them ordained to grant a valid assignation to George Smith & Co.'s book debts, and to account for their intromissions therewith.

The defenders admitted liability to account, and proposed to take credit for £387, 15s., the sum in the assignation.

The pursuers denied the right to take credit for £57, 15s. of that sum, being the amount in the bill, on the ground that the assignation was to that extent a further security of an existing debt granted within sixty days of bankruptcy, and so struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5.

On 20th July 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Lees), after a proof, which related mainly to other branches of the case, found, after findings in fact, that the pursuers had no title to sue. This plea had not been taken by the defenders on record. No. 74.
Feb. 5, 1889.
Smith & Co.
v. Smyth.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—(1) The assignation of 6th May 1887 constituted an illegal preference under the Act 1696, cap. 5, to the extent of £57, 15s., as having been to that extent granted in security of a prior debt within sixty days of bankruptcy. (2) The pursuers, one or other of them, had a title to reduce this illegal preference. The whole sequestrated estates under the 29th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 belonged to the creditors for the purposes of the Act, and one of these purposes under the 35th section was a deed of arrangement, it being specially provided by section 38 that notwithstanding the deed of arrangement “the sequestration shall receive full effect in so far as may be necessary for the purpose of preventing, challenging, or setting aside preferences over the estate.” Either, therefore, the right of challenge had been purchased by Millar as part of the sequestrated estates, or it had passed to the bankrupts under the clause of retrocession. Where a composition contract was entered into it might be that there should be a special assignation of the right of challenge and notice to the creditor, but a deed of arrangement was different,<sup>1</sup> and the creditor had had sufficient notice through the Gazette. A trustee in the sequestration, had there been one, could undoubtedly have reduced, and Millar was in the place of a trustee.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The assignation was not to any extent struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5. The transaction was a unum quid, and so far as regarded the sum in the bill was a novum debitum. (2) The pursuers had no title to sue. The right to challenge illegal preferences was not part of the sequestrated estate, but was a privilege of the creditors and of the trustee in the sequestration as representing them. It might be expressly conveyed to the purchaser of the sequestrated estates under a deed of arrangement, but if it was not expressly conveyed it was not to be presumed that the creditors intended to convey a right which could be used only to their prejudice. The 38th section of the Act of 1856 was intended to meet the case of creditors desiring to keep up the sequestration in order to cut down preferences.

LORD YOUNG.—This case raises a question which is not without interest, although in my view it is not attended with much difficulty. In May 1887 Messrs George Smith & Company required an advance of £330. They applied for accommodation to Mr Farries Smyth, who held their bill, granted sometime previously for £57, and the agreement come to was that he should advance the sum of £330 to them, and give up the bill for £57 upon receiving security in the shape of an assignation to their book debts, entitling him to uplift these debts to the extent of £387, i.e., the £57 for which they were already indebted to him under the bill and £330 which they received from him on the spot. Shortly afterwards George Smith & Company became bankrupt, and their estates were sequestrated, but before a trustee had been appointed an arrangement was come to whereby the creditors transferred the bankrupt estate, including, of course, the book debts, to Mr Gavin Bell Millar for the price of £6500, and they arranged among themselves to divide that sum, which thus repre-

<sup>1</sup> Douglas, Mitchell, & Co. v. Hunter, Newall, & Co., July 14, 1859, 21 D. 1302; Bell's Comm. ii. 458.

No. 74.

Feb. 5, 1889.
 Smith & Co.
 v. Smyth.

sented the bankrupt estate. There is no doubt of the validity of arrangement, and Millar, I presume, knew—we must at anyrate take upon the footing that he knew—that the book debts had been already to Smyth for the sum of £387. As the purchaser of the bankrupt estate was entitled to call on Smyth to account for the book debts, and as he has brought the present action, which is in substance an action of assumpsit against Smyth. In this action Smyth debits himself with the amount of the book debts which he has ingathered, and he credits himself with the sum of £387. Millar admits the correctness of this accounting except as regards the book debts, but he disputes Smyth's right to take credit for this sum on the ground that it represents the amount of a bill which was current within sixty days of the date of Smith & Company's sequestration, and is consequently struck at by the Act of 1696.

Now, I think it more than doubtful whether if this transaction was challenged by some one entitled to challenge it—by the trustee in the event if there had been one, or by prior creditors—it would have been valid as involving an illegal preference under the Act 1696. The inclination of my opinion is that it would not. It would, I think, have been quite legitimate according to the principles fixed by a series of decisions, for Smyth to assign to me a bill not only for the £330 which I am now advancing but also for the balance which you already owe me, and let me have an assignation of your book debts in security of the whole £387." I think that that assignation would have been challengeable under the Act, even at the instance of a trustee or of prior creditors, assuming that there are prior creditors.

That, I think would have been sufficient for the determination of the case, but passing by that, and assuming that this assignation would have been challengeable at the instance of prior creditors to the extent of £57 out of the £387, the question remains,—Did they convey that right of challenge to Millar by the arrangement by which they transferred the bankrupt estate to him for £6500? Now, I am of opinion that while the parties might have conveyed that right if they pleased expressly about that right, an assignation of it in favour of Millar is not to be raised up by implication. Such an assignation could be made only to the prejudice of the general body of creditors, and it is not to be presumed that they intended to transfer a right which could be exercised to their own prejudice. In the absence of express stipulation I think that it is to be presumed, and as there is no such express stipulation here, I am of opinion that Millar has no title to challenge the conveyance of the book debts to Smyth to any extent.

I am not much moved by the argument on which Mr Asher mainly founded on the words at the end of the 38th section of the Bankruptcy Act. I think the purpose of these words plainly is, where creditors agree to the sequestration, and have their claims satisfied by some other means, that they provide that the sequestration shall nevertheless continue to the effect of bringing down illegal preferences; but I think that has no bearing on the question before us.

I am of opinion, therefore, in the first place, that this assignation of the book debts is challengeable, either in whole or in part, at the instance of anyone, and if I thought the right of challenge existed at all, I think it belongs to the creditors alone in virtue of a peculiar and exceptional law, and is not to be presumed to have been transferred by them under such an assignation as here. I should also wish to say that if I had thought otherwise—that the right of challenge had been transferred to Millar—I should have felt unable to decide the question in the absence of the creditors.

No. 74.

Feb. 5, 1889.
Smith & Co.
v. Smyth.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Upon the question whether this assignation of the book debts could have been reduced by anyone having a proper title to do so, I desire to give no opinion. I think it is a question of difficulty.

Upon the question whether under the deed of arrangement with the creditors Millar has a right to reduce the assignation under the Act 1696, I am of opinion that he has no such right. If he possessed such a right he could use it only to the prejudice of his cedents, and we are not entitled to presume that the cedents intended to convey a right which could be used only to their prejudice.

I am also of your Lordship's opinion that if we had taken another view, we could not have decided the question in the absence of the creditors.

LORD LEE.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to say that I do not understand your Lordships to decide the question of the validity of the assignation, but only that of the title to sue.

LORD YOUNG.—The case may be decided on either ground. I decide it on both.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Find that on 6th May 1887 Messrs George Smith & Company, . . . in consideration of a sum of £330 advanced to them by the defender, Hugh Farries Smyth, and of a bill, dated 31st March 1887, for £57, 15s., granted by them to him, assigned to him certain book debts in security of the said advance and bill: . . . Find that by deed of arrangement the sequestration of the said George Smith & Company, which was awarded on 25th May 1887, was brought to an end, and George Smith & Company were reinvested in their estates: Find that by the said deed of arrangement the pursuer Gavin Bell Millar became purchaser of the whole estate, property, and assets constituting the sequestrated estate of George Smith & Company as they then stood: Find that the challenge of the said assignation by the pursuer has been departed from by them, except as regards the said bill for £57, 15s.: Find that by said deed of arrangement no special authority was given to the pursuers, or either of them, to challenge any preferences that may have been granted by the bankrupt: Find in law that the pursuers have no title to challenge the said assignation in respect of the said bill: Find that the pursuers are entitled to an assignation of the book debts enumerated in the said assignation, . . . so far as these are unpaid, upon payment to the defender David Prentice Menzies of the balance of the sums due to him, and interest thereon at 5 per cent from 3d May 1888 to the date of payment: . . . Quoad ultra dismiss the action," &c.

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 75.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

JOHN G. MURDOCH & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents)
Lord-Adv. Robertson—A. S. D. Thomson.

JOHN GREIG, Defender (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie—Wilson.

Sale—Suspensive condition—Sale or hire—Contract.—M. & Co. piano sellers, entered into the following contract with A:—"In consideration of M. & Co. (hereinafter called the owners) letting to the undersigned (hereinafter called the hirer) a harmonium (hereinafter called the goods) the hirer hereby agrees to pay to the owners the sum of £1, 10s. of the goods, as deposit, and a further sum of £1 every four weeks thereafter, as hire, until the full amount of £15, 15s. (including the deposit) have been paid, when the goods shall be the property of the hirer, without further payment whatever." A paid the deposit, and made one of the payments. She then left the country, and her goods were sold at auction. At the sale G. bought the harmonium, and obtained delivery in action for delivery of the harmonium at the instance of M. & Co. again. The Court granted decree of delivery as craved on the ground that the condition of sale under the suspensive condition that the property in the goods should not pass till the full price was paid, and that the condition was fulfilled, G.'s title to the instrument was bad.

Observations per the Lord President on sale under suspensive condition.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

JOHN G. MURDOCH & COMPANY, LIMITED, pianoforte sellers, in December 1886 entered into a contract with Mrs Taylor, Glasgow, the terms of which were as follows:—"In consideration of John G. Murdoch & Co., Limited (hereinafter called the owners), letting to the undersigned (hereinafter called the hirer) a harmonium (hereinafter called the goods) on hire, the hirer hereby agrees to pay to the owners the sum of £1, 10s. on delivery of the goods, as deposit, and a further sum of £1 every four weeks thereafter, as hire, until the full amount of £15, 15s. (including the deposit) shall have been paid, when the goods shall be the property of the hirer, without any further payment whatever. The following are the conditions of the hiring:—(1) The hirer undertakes for the continuance of the hiring, to keep the goods in the hirer's possession, tidy, and in good order, and to allow the owners, or their servants, to inspect the same at any time. (2) The hirer agrees that until the full sum be paid the hirer shall have no property in the goods, but only than as a hirer thereof only, and that if the hirer do not duly observe the agreement, the owners may put an end to the hiring, and retain possession of the goods; and in case they do so, that all payments made shall be in respect of the use and tear and wear of the goods only, and not for the purchase of the same. (3) Should through change of circumstances, be unable to continue such hiring, he may transfer his interests in the goods under this agreement to any responsible person (to be approved by the owners in writing), who shall continue the payments in the stead of the hirer. (4) After payment of three months' hire, the possession of the goods may be given to the hirer for a period not exceeding three months, during which period no payment shall be due, and on resuming the hiring the hirer shall be in the same position as if the hiring had not been interrupted."

Mrs Taylor paid the deposit of 30s., and a further sum of £1, one of the monthly payments contracted for, but made no further payments.

Early in 1887 Mrs Taylor left this country, and on 19th April 1887 her furniture, including the harmonium, was exposed for sale at public auction at her house in Glasgow.

At the sale John Greig bought the harmonium at the price of £15, 15s.

the price being paid to the auctioneer he received delivery of the instrument. No. 75.

In May 1887 John G. Murdoch & Company, Limited, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Greig, concluding for delivery of the harmonium. Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

The above facts were ultimately admitted.

The pursuers pleaded;—The said harmonium being the property of the pursuers, and being in the possession of the defender, decree should be granted as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having in bona fide purchased the harmonium referred to at a public sale, by an auctioneer, instructed by the ostensible owner of the instrument, and having paid the price thereof, he is not bound to deliver it to the pursuers as craved.

On 4th July, the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the defender bought at a public sale, on 19th April last, a harmonium, said sale being a public sale of household furniture of a certain Mrs Elliot or Taylor: Finds this harmonium is claimed by pursuers as being their property; under reference to note, sustains the first plea in law stated by the defender, and assoilzies the defender."*

On 31st May 1888, the Sheriff (Berry) pronounced this interlocutor:—

* "NOTE.—Although it may be that certain cases of late years have impinged on the effect to be given to the doctrine of reputed ownership, I am still of opinion that this is a case where the doctrine of reputed ownership must be held to apply. A sale of household furniture is publicly advertised; the defender goes to the house, and in perfect good faith bids for the harmonium put up by the auctioneer; it is knocked down to him for the sum of £8, and now the pursuers come forward and say that in terms of the agreement between them and the lady whose furniture was exposed to sale, it was not the latter's property, but theirs, and in these circumstances they are entitled to delivery from the bona fide purchaser without paying him a farthing of the expense to which he has been put. Such a result, it appears to me, would be unjust. If loss is to fall upon anyone it should be upon the pursuers, who must be held, in supplying the article to Mrs Taylor, in a question with third parties at least, to have put her in a position of dealing with the article as her own property.

"Apart, however, from the doctrine of reputed ownership, I find the case of Cropper & Co. v. Donaldson, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1108, has an important bearing on this case. In that case there was practically a transaction of the same nature as that under discussion, but the Second Division refused to give effect to the contract as one of hire. Lord Ormidale, who gave the leading opinion, said, inter alia,—"In short, without entering into further particulars, it appears to me to be sufficiently clear that the transaction in question was of the nature of a sale and not hiring, and that the form and terms of the agreement, so far as it has the colour and appearance of a contract of hiring, was a mere device, resorted to for the purpose of evading the operation of the bankruptcy laws in the event of Wood becoming insolvent, as he did before he had fully paid the price of the machine." That case, as indicated in the last clause, had reference to a question between a creditor doing diligence on the estate of the hirer of the machine and the suppliers of it. If any distinction falls to be drawn between the two cases, a fortiori the bona fide purchaser of the harmonium in this case is in a better position than the pouncing creditor in the case referred to. On these two grounds, therefore, viz (1) reputed ownership, and (2) that the transaction in question must be regarded as a sale to Mrs Taylor in a question with a bona fide purchaser from her, I am of opinion that the defender's first plea in law must be given effect to."

No. 75. "Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Ordains the defender to deliver as craved, and decerns."*

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The contract here was not one of hiring but of sale. The words of the contract were against that view, * "NOTE.—Two questions arise in this case—(1) whether the contract between the pursuers and Mrs Taylor was a contract of sale or of hire, and (2) whether the doctrine of reputed ownership applies to the case.

"In regard to the former question, namely, as to the nature of the contract, it is clear that the mere language which parties have used in describing their contract is not conclusive of its nature. It may be that the terms of their agreement are such as to shew that it has been a contract of sale, although they may have given to it the name of a contract of hire. This is shewn in particular by the case of Cropper & Co. v. Donaldson, 7 R. 1108, where a transaction bearing to be a hire was held by the Court to be truly a sale. In the present case the contract bears to be one of hiring, and a consideration of its terms leads me to think that that is its true nature. The terms differ materially from those in Cropper & Co.'s case, where a bill at three months was at once granted for £58, which was the price of the instrument, and that amount was to be payable by instalments at intervals of three months, the bill being renewable in each case for the instalments still remaining due. In effect, the ground of judgment was that there was an attempt to create a security over a moveable subject belonging to the debtor. Here a certain sum was to be paid every four weeks as hire; and, no doubt, when the sums paid amounted to £15, 15s., the harmonium was to become the property of the hirer; but it seems to me that the transaction is to be regarded as substantially, and in effect, one of hire, and that the rights of the parties are to be governed by the rules applicable to that contract. If the case is treated as one of hire, it follows that the hirer had no power by a sale to confer a valid title on a third party, without, at all events, that party being approved by the pursuers, in terms of the third condition attached to the contract.

"The question then arises, whether the doctrine of reputed ownership can avail the defender. I do not think that it can. On this point I may refer to the judgment of the Second Division in Marston v. Kerr's Trustee, 6 R. 898, where it was held that the principle of reputed ownership is not applicable where a subject is in the possession of a person on a limited title under a fair and ordinary contract; and again, to the judgment of the same Division in Hogarth v. Smart's Trustee, 9 R. 964, where the Lord Justice-Clerk said—'The cases of hire and purchase have all proceeded on this, that the title of possession was good without attributing it to purchase, and no one is entitled to attribute possession to a title which would carry the property, where there is a subordinate title to which it may be ascribed.' Here, on the assumption that the contract was one of hiring, there was a subordinate title to which Mrs Taylor's possession was attributable, and it is material that the defender admits that he had seen the hire purchase system advertised. He was therefore not ignorant of the existence of such a right of possession as that of possession under a contract of hire and purchase, and he has the less ground for complaining of having been deceived. At the same time, his good faith is not disputed, and the question is on which of two innocent parties, the pursuers or the defender, the loss must fall. It is said that Brown v. Marr and Others, 7 R. 427, justifies the view that the loss must be thrown on the pursuers, who enabled the fraud to be committed. That case, however, was materially different, in respect that the goods were placed in the hands of a retail jeweller for the express purpose of his selling them. Here there was never any intention on the part of the pursuers that Mrs Taylor should dispose of the goods in any way without their consent. The fact that the sale was by public auction does not seem to me to affect the rights of parties, inasmuch as it is not suggested that the pursuers were aware of the sale till afterwards. I regret, in these circumstances, to be obliged to take a different view of the case from that taken by the Sheriff-substitute."

the true nature of the agreement must be looked at. If the contract of sale, then the property passed at delivery to Mrs Taylor, and in a position to give a good title to the harmonium. The case was decided by the decision in Cropper v. Donaldson,<sup>1</sup> and the periodical payments stipulated for here were simply the price of the article payable in instalments. The amount of those payments was quite out of proportion to the amount which would have been exigible as hire for this instrument. £1 per month bore no proper relation, regarded as hire, to the value of the article, viz., £15, 15s. If Mrs Taylor had failed to pay the instalment, the pursuers could have sued her for the amount, and compelled her to go on paying each instalment as it became due. Whether the contract were taken as one of sale or hire, the defender would have the advantage of the doctrine of reputed ownership. The sale was effected at auction, and the defender was a bona fide purchaser. Those circumstances protected the purchaser unless the goods were stolen by the defender, unless, in short, there were some vitium reale attached to the property. That doctrine afforded an answer to the argument that the sale was a sale on a suspensive condition. If, in such cases as the present, that idea were to be carried out to its full extent, in all cases of sales of moveables all that would be required to protect the article would be to require the recipient's creditors would be to annex a condition to the sale that the property should not pass till the price was paid. It was contended that the law of England was contrary to the defender's contention,<sup>2</sup> but in such cases had no application in Scots law, as the English law with respect to property in moveables was essentially different.

The case for the pursuers;—This was a very common form of contract, technically as the hire-purchase system. Till the last instalment of the price was paid the contract was one of hire, but on the payment of the last instalment it grew into one of sale. The contract itself anxiously provided that the transaction should be looked on as one of hiring, and there was no doubt why it should not be taken according to its express terms. It had been recognised in England as one of hire ever since the decision in Ex parte Crawcour (9 Chanc. Div. 419). The decision in Cropper v. Donaldson (7 R. 1108) was undoubtedly adverse to the pursuers' contention, but they challenged the soundness of the law there laid down, and in making the law as good, there was this distinction between the present case and Cropper v. Donaldson the Court took the case as merely an attempt to create a security on moveables to defeat creditors, while here there was no suggestion of the kind. Assuming, however, that the contract was not one of hire but of sale, it was a sale under a suspensive condition. The law was that in such sales the property did not pass till the condition was purified, even though delivery had been given.<sup>4</sup> As the defender had a reputed ownership the defender must have known of this

No. 75.

Feb. 6, 1889.

Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

Donaldson v. Donaldson, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1108; Duncanson v. Jefferies, March 4, 1881, 8 R. 563.

Donaldson v. Kerr's Trustee, May 13, 1879, 6 R. 898; Hogarth v. Smart's Trustee, 1882, 9 R. 964; Sim v. Grant, June 3, 1862, 24 D. 1033, 34 Scot. Rep. 1033; Henderson v. Gibson, 1806, M. App. Moveables, 1; Bell's Prin. sec. 32, on Sale, sec. 32, and cases there; Bell on Sale, p. 80; Brown v. Brown, 1880, 7 R. 427.

Ex parte Crawcour, 1878, L. R., 18 Chan. Div. 30; Ex parte Hattersley, 1878, L. R., 8 Chan. Div. 601; Ex parte Hattersley, 1883, L. R., 23 Chan. Div. 261.

Donaldson v. Smart's Trustee, 9 R. 964; Stair, i. 14, 4; Ersk. iii. 3, 11; Bell's Prin. sec. 37, 5th edn.; Brown on Sale, sec. 37.

No. 75.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

system of dealing with musical instruments, and was not entitled on mere possession.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case Mrs Taylor obtained possession of a harmonium from the pursuers under a contract, the terms of which it is necessary to look at attentively. At the time at which she obtained possession of the harmonium Mrs Taylor made a deposit of 30s., and afterwards she made another payment of 20s., being the first instalment payable under the contract. Immediately after making that payment she disappeared from this country, and her property was sold by public auction. The harmonium was at the sale purchased by the defender. The pursuers now seek to recover the instrument, on the ground that it remained their property while it was in the hands of Mrs Taylor. In support of their contention they maintain that the contract was one of sale, and never was anything else, in consequence of the failure of Mrs Taylor to perform her part of the contract. If she had paid all the instalments she was bound for, the contract, they admit, would then have become one of sale.

The defender, on the other hand, says that the contract is one of hire, and nothing else, and in that, I think, he is right. No doubt the contract is in itself a contract of hiring, the words hire and hirer being constantly used. Notwithstanding that, I am of opinion that in substance and effect the contract is one of sale. The agreement is in these terms:—"In consideration of the sum of £15, 15s. paid by G. Murdoch & Co., Limited (hereinafter called the owners), to the undersigned (hereinafter called the hirer) a harmonium (hereinafter called the goods) on hire, the hirer hereby agrees to pay to the owners the sum of £15, 15s. on delivery of the goods, as deposit, and a further sum of £1 every four weeks thereafter, as hire, until the full amount of £15, 15s. (including the deposit) shall have been paid, when the goods shall be the property of the hirer, and no further payment whatever." Now, I consider that to be an under-lying contract on the part of Mrs Taylor to pay not only the deposit, but a sum of £1 every four weeks, from which she cannot resile, and under which she cannot get back the harmonium and put an end to the contract. She is bound to go on paying the monthly instalments. I do not see how such a contract can be one of hiring, more particularly when we consider that in a very short time the monthly payments amount to the full price. How can such payments, which in a short time exhaust the full price, be called hire? The payments of £1 monthly are said to be hire, but they are not—they are simply instalments towards the price. That is made clear if we look at the relation of the sum of £15, 15s. to the full price, which is £15, 15s. It is absurd to say that £1 per month is proper hire for an article worth £15, 15s. If, then, those payments are not hire, the only other purpose for which they can be paid is that under the contract the sale price is to be paid by monthly instalments, till, including the deposit, £15, 15s. in all has been paid. There is much to support that view, the "conditions of the hiring," but I think the obligation entered into by Mrs Taylor is enough to shew that the contract is one of sale.

This case is much stronger than that of Cropper v. Donaldson (7 M. & W. 100). I am not disposed to throw the slightest doubt on that decision, but this is a stronger case than that. I might have had more doubt in Cropper's No. 75. case, but here I have none at all.

<sup>1</sup> Robertsons v. M'Intyre, March 17, 1882, 9 R. 772; Bell's Prin., s. 100; Ex parte Watkins, 1873, L. R., 8 Chanc. App. 520; Brown on Sale, s. 100, et seq.

Another question is, however, raised by the pursuers, namely, that if this be a case of sale, it is one of a sale with a suspensive condition, and that if that is so, the condition not having been fulfilled, the property did not pass to Mrs Taylor. That is a more serious question, but here, again, the contract speaks in unmistakable language, for the first and second conditions are in the following terms:—"1. The hirer undertakes, during the continuance of the hiring, to keep the goods in the hirer's own custody, and in good order, and to allow the owners, or their servants, to inspect the same at any time. 2. The hirer agrees that, until the said full sum be paid, the hirer shall have no property in the goods otherwise than as a hirer thereof only, and that if the hirer do not duly observe this agreement, the owners may put an end to the hiring, and retake possession of the goods; and in case they do so, that all payments that may have been made shall be in respect of the use and tear and wear of the goods only, and not for the purchase of the same."

It is there declared and provided that until the full price is paid Mrs Taylor shall have no property in the goods "otherwise than as a hirer." Those last words are of little consequence, because the main thing is that the property shall not pass till the full price is paid. Now, that, I think, is a suspensive condition in the proper sense of the term. It is very necessary to have a clear notion what a suspensive condition is, and what is its effect in a case of this kind. Lord Stair (i. 14, 2) says,—“Sale being perfected, and the thing delivered, the property thereof becomes the buyer's, if it was the seller's, and there is no dependence of it till the price be paid or secured, as was in the civil law, neither hypothecation of it for the price.” That is the ordinary case of sale and delivery. But in the fourth section of the same title he expresses himself thus,—“As to the other pactions adjected to sale, sometimes they are so conceived and meant that thereby the bargain is truly conventional and pendent, and so is not a perfect bargain till the condition be existent: neither doth the property of the thing sold pass thereby, though possession follow, till it be performed; as if the bargain be conditional only upon payment of the price at such a time, till payment the property passeth not to the buyer.” Lord Elchies commenting on that title, at p. 80 of his Commentaries on Stair, states this further proposition, which is a corollary from the text,—“If in bargains there be conditions or clauses suspensive of the bargain, till the existence or non-existence of which the property is not transmitted, no doubt such clauses will likewise affect singular successors, for the buyer could not transmit the property which he had not.” Mr Mungo Brown, a very high authority on this branch of the law, in his scientific treatise on sale sums up p. 43) the law on this point thus,—“When a sale is made under a suspensive condition the contract is not complete until the accomplishment of the condition. It is not to be supposed from this, however, that the agreement of parties produces no effect whatever in the intermediate period, or that no right whatever arises to either party from the imperfect contract. On the contrary, while the condition is yet pendent, neither party is at liberty to resile any more than in the case of an unconditional bargain, and if the condition happens to be accomplished the accomplishment of it has a retrospective effect to the date of the contract, so that if either party have died in the interim his rights under the contract will pass to his heir.” That is a very clear exposition of the principle of

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Graig.

No. 75.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

suspensive conditions, and has received effect in a great variety of cases. It must be observed that in most mercantile contracts where such conditions are found, they are overlaid and obscured by specialties, and so it is difficult in cases so clear an exposition of the law as we do in these institutions.

Here, however, the condition appears clearly, nothing is left to imagination. The contract declares in so many words that the property shall not pass till the full price is paid. Therefore while thinking that the contract is one of hire, and negating the idea of hire, I am still for deciding for the purchaser on the ground that Mrs Taylor never had any right of property in the harmonium, and therefore could not sell it or give a good title to it. The result will be the same effect to the Sheriff's decision, though I go on the separate ground which is now explained.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the judgment which you have now explained is safer than that on which the majority has gone. My main difficulty in the case was in the frequent use of the word "hire" in the contract, but I agree that when we come to read the terms of the agreement it is difficult to construe them consistently with the idea of hire. I think the contract is one of sale with a suspensive condition.

LORD SHAND.—I entirely concur in all that your Lordship has said in regard to the grounds of judgment in this case. The real question to be decided is whether Mrs Taylor had a right to sell the harmonium, or in other words whether she was the proprietor of it. If the instrument was her property she could give a good title to it to a purchaser. If not, the appeal must be allowed to restore it. The fact that the harmonium was sold at a public auction makes no difference in the case; the title of a purchaser is exactly the same whether he buys at a public or a private sale. The title of the purchaser can be no better than that of the seller, and in this case I agree that Mrs Taylor had no title to the harmonium, and consequently could give no title to the purchaser.

The undertaking in the contract is that the "hirer," as Mrs Taylor is called, is to go on paying £1 per month till the full sum of £15, 10s, is paid, and that then the harmonium is to become her property. That is the substance of the opinion, a contract of sale, whatever it may be called in the contract. We had had a contract to this effect, that there were to be monthly payments for "the hire" of the harmonium as here, but that the hirer was to be allowed to stop paying the hire when he liked, and to return the instrument, if he so wished. I had difficulty in holding the contract to be one of sale, for in such a case there would be no obligation to pay the full sum, which being paid is clearly a condition. Here, however, there is no suggestion of any such option. The contract compels the purchaser to pay up all the instalments as they fall due. On this ground I think the contract was one of sale,—not a contract of hire with a mere option to purchase.

I am, however, further of opinion that there is a suspensive condition attached to the sale—viz., that the property should not pass till the full price is paid—that is to say, that until the condition of payment was fulfilled the property was not completed so as to give the property to the buyer. That is as clear as a suspensive condition as could possibly be. Till it was fulfilled the harmonium was held by the purchaser only as deposited with her with a right to sell it, as it was not fulfilled I am of opinion that the property never passed.

Taylor. I therefore agree in thinking that as the defender here can have no right in the harmonium higher than that of Mrs Taylor, therefore decree for delivery must be pronounced.

No. 75.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Murdoch &
Co., Limited,
v. Greig.

LORD ADAM.—Whether we regard this as a contract of sale or of hiring the result would, I think, be the same. The property did not pass to Mrs Taylor in either case. I am, however, of opinion that the contract is one of sale under the suspensive condition that the harmonium should not become the property of Mrs Taylor till the full price was paid. It appears to me that that is a clear suspensive condition, and unless we are to disregard all the law as regards such conditions laid down by the writers your Lordship has quoted, we must hold that in such sales as this the contract of sale is not completed till the last instalment is paid. Here the last instalment was never paid, and therefore I think the property of the harmonium was never in Mrs Taylor.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor appealed against, refuse the appeal."

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—L. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—Agents.

TRUSTEES OF SIR WILLIAM ALEXANDER MAXWELL, Pursuers and Real Raisers.

TRUSTEES OF CAPTAIN WALTER HENRY GILL, Claimants (Reclaimers).—
D.-F. Mackintosh—J. C. Lorimer.

DAVID PATRICK AND HILL, THOMSON, & COMPANY, Claimants (Respondents).—Asher—C. S. Dickson.

No. 76.

Feb. 6, 1889.*
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

Process—Multiplepinding—Direct claim—Riding claim—Title to sue—Creditor suing his debtor's debtor.—A creditor has no title to claim in a multiplepinding funds to which his debtor has right except by way of a riding claim upon a claim lodged by his debtor.

A, by his settlement, left a share of the residue of his estate to B. B, in a deed of indenture, assigned his interest to trustees for behoof of himself and his daughter, and the assignation was intimated to A's trustees. B thereafter died, and A's trustees raised an action of multiplepinding for distribution of B's share of the residue. The trustees under the indenture claimed the whole fund. No claim was lodged by B's executor, but a claim was lodged by a creditor of B, who maintained that the indenture had no effect, in so far as regarded B's interest under it, against his creditors, and claimed to be preferred primo loco on the fund, and, alternatively, to be ranked to the extent of his debt as a rider upon the claim by B's trustees.

Held that B's creditor had no title to claim sums due to B either by A's trustees or by B's trustees, and claim repelled in both branches.

SIR WILLIAM ALEXANDER MAXWELL, Bart., of Calderwood Castle, 1st Division, Lanarkshire, died on 4th April 1865 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, in which he directed his trustees in certain events, which happened, to pay the remainder of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, when realised, to his two stepsons, Walter Henry Gill and Dundas Reinhardt Gill, equally between them.

Lord M'Laren.
M.

On 16th April 1877 a deed of indenture was executed between Walter Henry Gill, on the one part, and Frederick Augustus Gore, Esq., and others (thereinafter called trustees), of the other part. The deed proceeded on the narrative that Mr Gill was desirous of settling irrevocably the moiety of the trust-estate bequeathed to him by Sir W. A. Maxwell

No. 76.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

in his trust-settlement in the manner therein provided, and that frustrating such desire, and in consideration of his natural love for Mrs Elizabeth Saunder or Gill, and his only daughter, Mrs C Adeline Maxwell Gill or Lambart or Mahon, he and his trustees that they were to invest the moiety in their own names, and pay the fourth part of the dividends and income arising therefrom to C Adeline Maxwell Lambart, the only child of Walter Henry Gill during her life, for her sole and separate use; and the remaining three-fourths to Walter Henry Gill, and his assigns during his life, and after his death to the survivor of Walter Henry Gill and Mrs Elizabeth Saunder Gill, the trustees were directed to pay the dividends, and interest of the whole principal trust funds to Catherine Maxwell Lambart (now Mahon) as therein provided. This indenture was intimated to Sir William A. Maxwell's trustees on May 1877.

Walter Henry Gill died on 22d October 1887 survived by his wife by his first marriage, Mrs Mahon, and by his second wife, Mrs A. whom he appointed his executrix.

This action of multiplepointing was raised by the trustees of Sir William Alexander Maxwell, as real raisers, for distribution of his share of residue bequeathed by Sir William to Walter Henry Gill. The action was directed against Walter Henry Gill's trustees, and his wife, his executrix, his daughter, and certain other persons.

The object of the action was thus stated by the pursuers in their plea:—"The pursuers have been advised that doubts exist as to the validity of the said indenture of 16th April 1877 to convey the estate therein mentioned, and also as to the right of the defender the said C Adeline Maxwell Gill or Mahon to nominate new trustees without the consent and concurrence of the persons to whom she has claimed an interest in the funds under the said indenture by way of mortgage assignment. In order to determine who has right to the half of the residue . . . the present action has become necessary."

In cond. 16 they stated that they had paid to Dundas Reinhardt his share of residue, but as Walter Henry Gill's trustees, under the indenture of 16th April 1877, were not in a position to grant a discharge for any payments to account of his share of the residue, they had paid bank sums amounting to £9475, 16s. 5d., which they were to hand over to the persons entitled thereto on receiving a proper discharge. In cond. 17 they stated that the fund in medio consisted of the residue and also of the balance of the one-half of the free residue of the estate under certain deductions. They further stated that since 4th May 1887 they had realised portions of the estate amounting to the sum of £26,683, 11s.

A claim was lodged by F. A. Gore and the other trustees under the indenture of Walter Henry Gill of 1877. They claimed to be ranked as preferred to the whole fund in medio as conveyed to them by the said indenture.

On 22d May 1888 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect no other claim has been lodged and no other has been stated, for aught yet seen, and on the motion of the claimants F. A. Gore and others (Walter Henry Gill's trustees), ranks and prefers their claim to the fund in medio in terms of their claim, and authorises and ordains the said pursuers and real raisers to indorse and deliver up to the said claimants by their agents the receipts for the sums which they had lodged for the payment of Walter Henry Gill's share of the estate."

On 5th June 1888 claims were lodged for Hill, Thomson, & Company, No. 76.
wine merchants, Edinburgh, and David Patrick, solicitor, Hamilton.

Of that date the Lord Ordinary of consent recalled the interlocutor of 22d May, and allowed the additional claims to be received.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

Patrick in his claim stated that he was a creditor of Walter Henry Gill to the extent of £30, 2s. 4d., which he had advanced to Mr Gill on receiving his cheque, which was dishonoured. (Cond. 3) "The said Walter Henry Gill granted the indenture narrated in article 8 of the condescendence appended to the summons without any consideration, and the same was legally in fraud of his creditors, and the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the funds and estate thereby bearing to be conveyed as having a riding claim on the claim of the said trustees, or otherwise in preference and primo loco to the trustees of said settlement who have been ranked and preferred thereto for aught yet seen." (Cond. 4) "By said indenture the said Walter Henry Gill retained and reserved right to the income arising from the capital sums dealt with and transferred thereby, and the said income is liable in payment of his debts, and inter alia the debt due to the claimant amounting to £30, 2s. 4d., with interest thereon at five per cent per annum from 30th November 1877. The fund in medio consists of income due to the said Walter Henry Gill to an extent more than sufficient to pay the debt due the claimant."

The claim was in the following terms:—"The claimant claims to be ranked and preferred as a rider upon the interest the said Frederick Augustus Gore and others, as trustees foresaid, have been found to have in the fund in medio, but that only to the extent of the said sum due to him as aforesaid, principal, interest, and expenses, and the expenses of the present claim; or otherwise, to be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio to the extent foresaid preferably to the said claimants."

He pleaded;—(1) The said Walter Henry Gill having been indebted and resting owing to the claimant the sums claimed, and being entitled to the fund in medio, and the claimants Gore and others taking only as representing the said Walter Henry Gill, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred as a rider upon their interest, or otherwise preferably to the said claimants. (2) In any event, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred as a rider upon the fund in medio in so far as the same consists of income which accrued during the lifetime of the said Walter Henry Gill, or otherwise preferably as aforesaid.

Hill, Thomson, & Company's claim was as creditors for the sum of £22, 4s. 8d. for goods supplied and cash advanced to Mr Gill, for the greater part of which they held a bill by Mr Gill in their favour.

Walter H. Gill's trustees lodged answers, in which they explained that the indenture was an onerous postnuptial deed providing for his wife and daughter, duly intimated to Sir William Maxwell's trustees, and that Mrs Alice Gill, as sole executrix to her husband, was administering his estate in the Court of Chancery in England.

They further stated that three-fourths of the income of Walter Henry Gill's share of the residue of Sir W. A. Maxwell's estates, accruing prior to 22d October 1887, "will fall to be accounted for and paid by the claimants Walter Henry Gill's trustees to Mrs Alice Gill, as his executrix, to be administered by her. In addition to the two riding claimants, the Norwich Union Insurance Company claims to be a creditor of Walter Henry Gill for a sum of £350, and allege that they hold an assignation from him of his interest in Sir William Alexander Maxwell's trust-estate, which has been intimated to the claimants Walter Henry Gill's trustees. . . . The pursuers and real raisers state that the deposit-receipt of 16th August 1887 for £447, 10s. 3d.

No. 76. represents income. Further realisations are being made. The court submit that they should be authorised to uplift £9000 from deposits, and that the balance should be retained to meet the claims, and that before they are disposed of intimation should be given to Mrs Alice Gill, as executrix foresaid, and to the Norwich Insurance Company."

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and
Others.

Mrs Alice Gill, the executrix, did not lodge a claim.

On 19th June 1888 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: "Finds that the claimants Hill, Thomson, & Company and David are entitled to be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio the claimants on the claim of the claimants Frederick Augustus Gore and others (Walter Henry Gill's trustees), in terms of their claims, and prefers them accordingly, and decerns: Finds them entitled to the said fund in terms of their claims: . . . Further ranks and prefers the said claimants Gore and others to the balance of the said fund in medio the said fund; and authorises," &c.

Gill's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—The creditors' claim against the Lord Ordinary had sustained here fell to be repelled, regarded as made directly or as riding claims on that of Gill's trustees. (1) The real raisers were debtors either to the trustee under the indenture or to W. H. Gill's executrix. The creditors were not suing their debtor's debtor by direct action, which it was seen to be incompetent. Their real remedy was by arrestment and an order for furthcoming.<sup>1</sup> A general or residuary legatee could not direct against the debtor to the deceased,<sup>2</sup> and a beneficiary under a trust-deed was in the same position as regards a debt due to the trust-estate.<sup>3</sup> Unless these creditors had arrested in the hands of the real raisers, the creditors, not, either during W. H. Gill's life or after his death, have sued the real raisers by direct action, the principle being that the latter were not in a question with their creditor's creditor to try the question of the latter's debt. There was no different rule to be applied in a case of multiplepounding. (2) In order to admit a riding claim there must be a direct claim upon the principal claimant. Here, if W. H. Gill's trustees had claimed, his creditors might have had a riding claim. In the absence of that, however, the riding claims were incompetent.

Argued for the creditors;—(1) It was highly inconvenient that Scottish creditors should have to go to the Court of Chancery to recover their debts when the only opposing parties here were gratuitous trustees of W. H. Gill. His indenture was really a nullity in so far as it was in the behoof of himself, and it could not prejudice his creditors.<sup>4</sup> His creditors therefore had no right to the money at all, and the present claim of the creditors as a preferable one fell to be given effect to. (2) They were entitled to come in as riders on the claim of Gill's trustees. The trustees' competing claims, and it was admitted that the executrix might come in and take away the whole interest in the estate. If she had appeared in the process they could, beyond doubt, have claimed to be ranked as preferred to her claim.<sup>5</sup> There was no reason why they should not be ranked as preferred in her absence, on the claims of Mr Gill's trustees, who would have to

<sup>1</sup> Royal Bank of Scotland v. Stevenson, &c., Dec. 4, 1849, 12 D. 100, Lord Fullerton, 252, 22 Scot. Jur. 51.

<sup>2</sup> Hinton, &c. v. Connell's Trustees, July 6, 1883, 10 R. 1110, per Lord Fullerton, 1115.

<sup>3</sup> Rae v. Meek, July 20, 1888, 15 R. 1033, per Lord Shand, 1050.

<sup>4</sup> Miller v. Learmonth, Nov. 21, 1871, 10 Macph. 107, May 3, 1872, (H. L.) 662, 42 Scot. Jur. 418, Paters. Ap. 1777.

<sup>5</sup> Mackay on Court of Session Practice, ii. 114.

to her for the income due to her husband at the time of his death. The case of the Royal Bank<sup>1</sup> was inapplicable, as here the claims were duly constituted. No. 76.

At advising,—

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The raisers of this multiplepointing are the testamentary trustees of the late Sir William Maxwell of Calderwood Castle, under a deed of settlement dated 3d November 1862, and certain codicils. They sold the estate for various purposes, but according to the events which have happened they are now holding, or at least recently did hold, the entire residue of the estate for the benefit of two gentlemen of the name of Gill—Walter Henry Gill and Dundas Reinhardt Gill, who were the stepsons of the testator, and who, failing other purposes of the trust, are entitled to divide the residue of the estate between them. There is no question about the right of Mr Dundas Reinhardt Gill to get his one-half of the share of that residue, and the fund in medio consists of the half which is destined by the settlement of Walter Henry Gill. The condescendence of the fund in medio sets out these different facts, and also a certain deed of indenture, dated the 16th of April 1877, by which apparently Mr Walter Gill settled his share of Sir William Maxwell's estate by creating a trust in the person of Mr Frederick Augustus Gore and others, who are the reclaimers. The raisers say in the 15th article of the condescendence of the fund in medio that doubts exist as to the sufficiency of the indenture of April 1877 to convey the estate therein mentioned, and also as to the right of the defender Mrs Catherine Gill to nominate new trustees under that deed, and in consequence of these doubts they bring this multiplepointing calling the trustees under the indenture, and also the executrix of Mr Walter Gill, and some other parties, but the two parties who are of the most importance as defenders of the action are the executrix of Mr Walter Gill and the trustees under the indenture of 1877. They further set out that they have made payments to Mr Dundas Reinhardt Gill of his share of the residue of the estate, but as Mr Walter Gill and the trustees under the indenture of 1877 were not in condition to grant a discharge, they have paid corresponding sums into bank on their account, amounting in all to £9475. And then they go on to state that they have made further recoveries of the estate amounting to very large sums. In short, the succession is a very lucrative one, and there are ample funds apparently to meet every claim that can be brought against it.

In these circumstances, the only party who appeared as a claimant in the multiplepointing was Mr Frederick Gore, and the other trustees under the indenture of 1877, and there being no other claimant the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor on the 22d of May 1888, and "in respect no other claim has been lodged, and no objection stated, for aught yet seen," he ranked and preferred Frederick Augustus Gore and the other trustees of Mr Walter Gill on the fund in medio in terms of their claim, and authorised the pursuers to endorse and deliver up to them the receipts for the sums which had been lodged in bank to account of Mr Walter Gill's share of the estate. After that there appeared in the process two other claimants, viz., Mr Patrick, and Messrs Hill, Thomson, & Company. Now, these persons are creditors or alleged creditors of the deceased Walter Gill, and they claim alternatively to be ranked and preferred as a rider upon the interest of Frederick Augustus Gore

<sup>1</sup> Royal Bank v. Stevenson, supra, 12 D. 250.

No. 76.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and
Others.

and the other trustees under the indenture of 1877, "or otherwise, to be and preferred on the fund in medio to the extent foresaid preferably to claimants"—that is, preferably to Gore and others, the trustees under the indenture. Now, upon the appearance of these claimants the Lord Ordinary consent recalls the decree of 22d May last. That appears to me to be a mistake in the course of this proceeding. In so far as regards the decree against the fund in medio as made by these parties preferably to Gore and others, there were ample funds I think to meet these claims without the authority which had been granted by the previous interlocutor to discharge the receipts for the £9400 that was in bank. There is one bond for £19,000 which has been realised since that date, and therefore in the funds to meet the direct claim of these now appearing claimants are complete there was no need to recall that part of it. And in so far as regards the claim which they state alternatively, it is quite a mistake to have recalled the ranking of Gore and others as trustees, because unless they were ranked against the fund in medio there could be nothing taken through them by a riding decree. Therefore it appears to me that the interlocutor of the 22d of May 1889 should have stood.

But that brings us to a consideration of what these claimants represent in the way of interests in this multiplepointing. If they claim directly against the fund in medio—that is to say, against the fund in the hands of the trustees, the question naturally arises—What have they got to do with the estate or funds of the late Sir William Maxwell? and the only answer they can make to that is to say that Maxwell's trustees are debtors to them. Now, that is by no means clear even if it were relevant. Maxwell's trustees are debtors to somebody on behalf of Mr Walter Gill, but the question is to be whether the trustees under the indenture of 1877 are not preferred to everybody. They are in the position, as they represent, of taking a right by an assignation which has been intimated to the holders of the fund, and certainly a creditor of Walter Gill with an unconstituted claim could not compete with an intimated assignation. That is altogether out of the question; indeed, they had brought an action against Walter Gill or his executor upon the dependence of that action had attached the fund in medio by judgment, I could quite understand their coming into competition with an intimated assignation. But they have done nothing of the kind, and, having done in any way to attach the fund in medio, their direct claim against the fund cannot possibly be entertained. And accordingly the Lord Ordinary has not entertained that claim. But what he has done is this—He has granted their riding claim, and upon this footing apparently that they are entitled to their claim as against Gore and others, trustees under the indenture of 1877, it appears to me that the very same objection arises there as in the case of the claim directly against the fund in medio, because neither of these parties, the creditors of the late Walter Gill had any direct right against Gore and others, trustees under the indenture. The indenture is not granted for their benefit. It is granted for other purposes altogether. If, indeed, they could show that the indenture is bad, which they have not attempted to do, or if they could shew that in any way whatever Mr Gill was really a party interested in the fund that fund which they claim, they would be in a different position, and even then they could not possibly have a direct right against the fund in the hands of the trustees under the indenture, because the parties who are fited by that indenture have a direct claim against that fund, whereas the trustees under the indenture are in relation to these riding claimants nothing but debtors of their debtor. Therefore whether as regards the fund in medio or the fund belonging to the trustees under the indenture of 1877, there is no direct claim whatever in the person of these creditors.

No. 76.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

It must be kept in view that Mr Walter Gill had apparently no connection with Scotland except his interest in Sir William Maxwell's estate under his settlement. He lived in England, and the debts apparently incurred to those riding claimants were debts incurred in England. Now, the only course which a party can follow in these circumstances with the view to do diligence so as to attach a fund belonging to his debtor is to raise action against his debtor in the first place, or, Mr Gill being dead, to raise action against his executrix, and that is just the course which these creditors have not adopted. That is the only competent course by means of which they could have access either to the fund in medio or to the fund to be obtained in this process of multipleponding by the trustees under the indenture of 1877. The Lord Ordinary in the interlocutor under review has found that these claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred as riding claimants on the claim of the claimants Frederick Augustus Gore and others in terms of their claims. Now, that is a very curious interlocutor to be pronounced in the circumstances, because he has already recalled the ranking and preference in favour of Gore and others, and how the riding claims can be admitted upon a claim that is not yet ranked I do not very well see. But apart from that difficulty in point of form, I am decidedly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is wrong in ranking these riding claims at all, for the reasons that I have already assigned, that the creditors have not in any way attached the fund upon which they seek to set up these riding claims.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled, because I do not think the case is in shape for giving effect to a riding claim of the description of Mr Patrick's, or of Hill, Thomson, & Company's. They, as I understand, allege themselves to be creditors of the late Walter Gill, and they claim upon a part of the fund in medio, which is said to have belonged to Mr Gill, and which is now payable to his representatives whoever they may be. And they claim here as riders upon the claim of Mr Gore, who claims the fund in medio upon the grounds set forth under an indenture by which he takes a particular portion of that fund. Mr Gore, as I understand the matter, is not a debtor of the claimants. Their debtor is Mr Gill's executrix, who has been called in the action, but does not appear. Now, if she had appeared, and had put in a claim to be preferred to that fund as against Gore, and had been preferred, I could then have quite well seen that Mr Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company might have claimed as a rider on Mr Gill's executrix upon the share of the fund in medio that is said by them to belong to Mr Gill. But she has not claimed, and therefore Gore and others, as trustees under the indenture, have the right to get hold of the money belonging to Mr Gill. I agree with your Lordship that the riding claim in these circumstances upon what is coming into Gore's hands is not a competent proceeding in point of form, and cannot be entertained. The only hesitation I have had in this case about the matter was in consequence of certain statements on the record in answer to the claiming party. A proposal was made on the part of Mr Gore, which it strikes me was in the circumstances a very fair

No. 76. proposal, and by which the matter might possibly have been extricated in this process had that proposal been adopted, for Mr Gore frankly admits that of the £9400 that was claimed a considerable proportion is the sum which he probably will have to hand over to Mrs Gill, the executrix of Walter Gill. But then they say that it represented income which in point of fact belonged to Mr Gill. But they go on to say,—“The claimants submit that they should be authorised to uplift £9000 from the said deposits, that is, from the £9400, and that the balance should be retained to meet the riding claims, and that before they are disposed of intimation should be made to Mrs Alice Gill as executrix foresaid, and to the Norwich Union Insurance Company.” Now, that stands as a proposal made by Gore, and I think in the circumstances it was a very fair proposal. I called attention to it during the discussion, and I never heard any explanation as to why that proposal had not been adopted, because if Mrs Gill had got notice, and had come forward and claimed, this riding claim would have been in shape, but at present it appears to me to be altogether out of shape. It is very likely that there was some good reason for the course adopted, but as matters now stand I agree that this is an incompetent mode of working out the matter, and that these riding claims should be refused.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Gill's Trustees
v. Patrick and Others.

LORD SHAND.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships. It appears that the trust which was created by Mr Gill was by virtue of a deed executed, I think, in April 1877, and the deed was intimated to the trustees, the holders of the fund, on the 3d of May 1877. At that time neither Mr Patrick's debt nor Hill, Thomson, & Company's debt was in existence. They became creditors for the first time in November 1877, after the fund in question in the hands of Maxwell's trustees had been assigned to Mr Gill's trustees for the purposes of the deed of 1877. In that state of matters the question that arises is, in the first place, is there a good riding claim here on the claim of Gill's trustees to the fund in medio? Undoubtedly Gill's trustees prima facie are the persons entitled to draw the money from Maxwell's trustees. They have an assignation intimated, and they are prepared to give a discharge for any money they get. As I understand, the first view of this case presented for the claimants Hill, Thomson, & Company and Mr Patrick is this, that they are entitled to come in as riders on the claim of Gill's trustees. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that that cannot be allowed in the state in which matters are. Mr Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company claim to be creditors of Mr Gill; but he is dead, and there is no decree of constitution here, there has been no proceeding adopted by way of action against Gill's executrix to constitute the claim and to obtain a warrant of arrestment, and no arrestment has been used either in the hands of Gill's trustees or in the hands of the raisers, Maxwell's trustees. I doubt very much whether an arrestment would have attached anything in Maxwell's trustees' hands, but assuming it to be so, there is no nexus of that kind here, and therefore I think Gill's trustees are in a position to say, these claimants who propose to have a riding claim on our claim have no title whatever to take up that position. There is neither constitution nor arrestment nor nexus of any kind attaching this fund. It is a personal claim, bearing to be a claim against Mr Gill, who had a claim against his own trustees, who again had a claim against the raisers. In these circumstances it appears to me that in the absence of any nexus there is no room for the riding claim on Gill's trustee so as to attach money in the hands of the raisers. On the other question, whether there is any direct claim, I concur in what your Lordship has said. No. 76.

 What the Lord Ordinary has done is to sustain the riding claim. If there had been an arrestment there might have been a direct claim, but, looking to the Feb. 6, 1889.
 circumstances in which parties here are, there having been no proceeding against Gill's Trustees the executrix and no arrestment of any kind, I do not see that there is a case v. Patrick and Others.
 for a direct claim against Maxwell's trustees interpellating them from paying to the holders of the assignation so much of the funds as would meet the claims of Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company. So that in either view of the case I agree with your Lordship in thinking that these claims must be disallowed.

LORD ADAM.—The parties we have here are Maxwell's trustees, who are raisers of the multiplepounding, and are or were the holders of the fund in medio. Then we have Captain Gill's trustees under a certain indenture, who are claimants, and we have also here alleged creditors of Mr Gill, Mr Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company. Now, Mr Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company claim alternatively. They claim either as a riding claim upon Gill's trustees' claim, or, if that be not successful, they claim directly against the fund in medio as against Maxwell's trustees. That is the position of matters. Now, it is to be observed that these two creditors—Mr Patrick and Hill, Thomson, & Company —do not allege that they are creditors of Maxwell's trustees. If that be so, it appears to me perfectly clear that they could not have sued Maxwell's trustees directly for the sums alleged to be due to them by Mr Gill, because that would be, as your Lordship has pointed out, simply a creditor suing his debtor's debtor, and that we have decided very recently, upon well-known principles, is quite incompetent. So far as the claim is made directly against Maxwell's trustees, I hold that any claim directed by these two creditors against Maxwell's trustees is quite out of the question. But in my opinion, the position is exactly the same as regards Gill's trustees. They do not allege that they are creditors of Gill's trustees, and they do not allege that they have any claim under Gill's trust.
 What they claim, as I said before, is that they have a claim against the late Mr Gill. That again is simply a claim by a creditor against his debtor's debtor or alleged debtor. It is neither more nor less than that, and I hold that such a claim as that is quite out of the question. It humbly appears to me that that being so, this claim of these creditors must on either branch of it be repelled, and I think that the whole case lies there, and that it is a clear and a simple case.
 It is quite clear to my mind that the claim of these parties is upon Gill's representative, and against nobody else directly, and if they desire to get payment of their money, that is their course to follow.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the claims of the claimants Hill, Thomson, & Company and David Patrick, and rank and prefer the claimants the said Frederick Augustus Gore and others as trustees fore-said in terms of their claim, and decern: Grant warrant to, authorise, and ordain the pursuers and real raisers to endorse . . . Find the claimants the said Hill, Thomson, & Company and David Patrick liable to the said Frederick Augustus Gore and others, as trustees foresaid, in expenses."

No. 77.

MRS HELEN DOLLAR OR COUPER AND OTHERS (Archibald Couper's Trustees), Pursuers (Appellants).—*Balfour—Murray.*Feb. 6, 1889.
Couper'sTrustees v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.THE NATIONAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Low.

Bank—Current account—Initialing of entries by bank-agent—Fraud—Bank-agent also agent for customer of bank—Liability for loss.—Entries in a customer's bank pass-book of sums paid into the bank, duly initialed by a bank official, are prima facie evidence against the bank that the money has been paid in.

The law-agent and factor of a trust was also agent of a branch bank with which the trustees had a current account, and was authorised by them to operate on the account. After some years he absconded. It was then found that four entries in the trustees' pass-book of sums paid in had no corresponding entries in the bank ledger. All the entries in the pass-book were initialed by the agent himself, and not by the bank teller, as was the usual course with such entries, and two of the four entries had also the forged initials of the bank cheque clerk. The other two, like the rest of the entries, had only the initials of the agent, who kept the pass-book in his own custody. The agent had also annually signed docquets in the bank ledger as "factor," certifying the correctness of the balance as appearing in the bank ledger. In an action by the trustees against the bank for payment of the sums as entered in their pass-book, held that the money had never been paid into the bank, and consequently that the bank were not liable.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ON 31st July 1876 the trustees under the trust-disposition of Archibald Couper, manufacturer in Kirkintilloch, appointed Richard Reid, writer there, to be factor and law-agent to the trust, and he continued so to be until he absconded in October 1887. During the same period he was also agent for the branch of the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, at Kirkintilloch, with which the trustees had a current account, Reid being authorised by them to operate as their factor on the account.

After Reid's disappearance the trustees claimed credit for a sum of £82, 2s. 2d., as the balance in their favour on the account with the bank. The bank disputed this, maintaining that there was a debit balance against the trustees of £98, 9s. 5d. The dispute turned mainly* upon four sums which were entered as paid in to the credit of the trustees in their pass-book, but which did not appear in the bank ledger. The two earlier of these entries, viz., £86, 8s. 3d. on 1st December 1879, and £9, 15s. 0d. on 16th June 1882, were initialed "R. R.," being the genuine initials of Reid; the two later entries, being £35, 15s. 4d. on 1st November 1885, and £38, 13s. 4d. on 28th July 1886, besides Reid's genuine initials, bore the forged initials of the cheque clerk.

Reid also, after each annual balance, signed a docquet at the foot of the account in the bank ledger in the following terms, the balance credited or debited being that brought out by the ledger, not by the pass-book:—"The above account examined and found correct, the vouchers delivered up, and the balance, carried to credit (or 'debit') in a new account, amounts to
.—Richard Reid, factor."

In July 1888 the trustees brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the bank for payment of the above-mentioned alleged balance of £82, 2s. 2d.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 6) "Up to the 1st of June 1887 the sums paid into the bank are regularly and formally entered in the pass-books, and are initialed by the bank-agent. Such entries are the recognised acknowledgments by bankers for moneys paid into bank." No. 77.

* There were certain other minor matters in dispute not necessary to be referred to.

The defenders answered;—(Ans. 6) "The pass-books are referred to for their terms. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the pass-books do not set forth the true state of the account; that it is not the custom for such entries to be initialed by the bank-agent. It is unusual for him to initial such entries, which are usually initialed by the teller or the ledger clerk, and sometimes by both." Feb. 6, 1889.
Couper's
Trustees v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

The defenders in their statement of facts further averred;—(Stat. 4) As the pursuers' factor, Reid "had possession of the pursuers' pass-book, and operated on the said cash account from time to time. Further, as factor for the pursuers, he also from time to time docquetted the said account in the defenders' Kirkintilloch ledgers. Counter statement denied."

The pursuers answered;—(Ans. 4) " . . . Explained that it was from the defenders the pursuers obtained possession of the pass-books, and that any docquets made in the bank's ledger were not made by Richard Reid as factor for the pursuers; that they were false and fraudulent, and at variance with the pass-books and the facts, and were made by him solely to conceal the manipulations on the account and his defalcations as bank-agent."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having paid into the defenders' branch at Kirkintilloch the sums entered in their pass-books, and said payments having been duly acknowledged by the initials of their agent, the defenders are liable for the balance due upon the entries in said pass-books, and the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved, with expenses. (4) The docquets founded on by the defenders not having been made by the said Richard Reid in his capacity as factor, but as part of a series of false and fraudulent manipulations by him as bank-agent, to deceive the defenders, the pursuers are not bound thereby. (5) The entries in the pass-books being the usual acknowledgments given by the banks for moneys paid to their officials, the defenders are bound thereby.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) Any loss the pursuers may have sustained having been caused by the malversations of the said Richard Reid, in his character of factor to the pursuers, the defenders should be assoilzied. (4) In any view, the said Richard Reid having docquetted the pursuers' bank account on 1st November 1886, they are bound by the terms of that docquet.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was mainly directed to the practice of banks in initialing the paid-in entries in their customers' pass-books. It appeared that it was unusual, though not irregular, for the agent to initial the entries, that being properly the duty of the teller and, in branches of any size, of the cheque clerk also. In the pass-book in question Reid had invariably initialed the entries himself, and in the few instances where other initials appeared along with his these were forgeries. He had hardly ever initialed the pass-books of other customers. It did not appear that down to his disappearance the pass-book had ever been out of his own personal custody—it had neither been in the possession of the trustees personally nor of any of the bank officials.

On 30th October 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers, as trustees libelled on, appointed Richard Reid, agent of the branch of the defenders' bank at Kirkintilloch, to be their factor, and granted to him a mandate to draw the dividends effieing on the trust funds, and authorised him to operate on the account in their name, of the trust funds with the said branch of the defenders' bank: Finds that the said Richard Reid, in his capacity as factor, received from

No. 77.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Couper's
Trustees v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

time to time monies on behalf of the pursuers to the amount of about the sums and at about the times specified in the bank pass-books, Nos. 8/1 and 8/2 of process: Finds that the said Richard Reid adhibited his initials to the entries of sums bearing to be paid into the defenders' bank, as per said pass-books: Finds that said entries were in the main false and fraudulent, and did not correctly represent the monies paid by the said Richard Reid to the bank, or received by him on its account: Finds that the bank did not receive the sums claimed by the pursuers, which go to make the balance claimed by them: Finds in law (1) that in the circumstances above set forth, the initialing of the bank pass-books by the said Richard Reid was not habile to constitute a claim in the pursuers' favour, in terms of the pass-books; and (2) that the sums claimed by the pursuers not having been paid to the defenders, or to anyone on their behalf, and the defenders not having received the same, they are not liable to make payment to the pursuers of the sums claimed: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable to them in expenses," &c.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The money here must be held to have been duly received by the bank. It was entered in the pass-book, and the entries were duly initialed by the agent, who acted as teller, and so acting could undoubtedly bind the bank. It was said that Reid had embezzled the money in his capacity as factor to the trustees and not as agent for the bank. But that argument had been rejected where the facts were very similar to the present.<sup>1</sup> The docquet was of no avail to the defenders, for it was outwith Reid's mandate as factor gratuitously to discharge the bank of debt which appeared ex facie of the pass-book.<sup>2</sup>

The defenders were not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—This case is of some interest, and it is a satisfaction to us that we have had the argument which was so fully and ably stated by Mr Balfour. I indicated in the course of the debate the question upon which, I think, our decision must turn. That question is, whether as a matter of fact the bank received the money which the pursuers seek to have paid to them. The entries in the pass-book are no doubt prima facie evidence that the bank did so receive the money, but they are not conclusive evidence, and we must determine upon consideration of the whole facts of the case whether the bank did really receive it. I have no doubt that the entries in the pass-book are prima facie evidence against the bank, even as regards those entries to which only the initials of the agent are attached. I think it would be distressing, and that the public would be alarmed if it were held to be the law that when a customer paid money to the agent of a bank personally, and received an acknowledgment from him by his initialing the entry in the pass-book, that that was not prima facie evidence against the bank. I think the usual custom is that there should be two signatures to the entry—first, the initials of the teller who received the money, and then the initials of the cheque clerk. That is done because the bank desires to have this check upon its own officials—it is a matter within the bank itself. If the teller alone, or the agent alone, acknowledges the receipt of the money, he does so by affixing his initials to the entry. Such acknowledgments constitute prima facie evidence against the bank, and if a customer of the bank should pay money into the hands of the bank-agent as bank-agent, and he instead of paying it into the bank puts it into his own pocket, I think it not doubtful that he is a thief from the bank, and that the bank is responsible for the money so paid in. No. 77.

<sup>1</sup> Craw v. Commercial Bank, Dec. 9, 1840, 3 D. 193, 13 Scot. Jur. 76; Rhind v. Commercial Bank, Feb. 24, 1857, 19 D. 519, Feb. 10, 1860, 22 D. (H. L.) 2.

<sup>2</sup> Fell v. Rattray, Jan. 28, 1869, 41 Scot. Jur. 236.

In this case Mr Reid was agent and factor for these trustees, and he received the trust funds and absconded, carrying off a portion of these funds. With respect to the items there seemed to be a certain confusion, but the parties have now reduced the sum to about £80. The question is whether Reid embezzled this money as factor to the trustees, or as agent for the bank? He filled both capacities, but he could not embezzle in both capacities; the money could not be embezzled twice; he must have embezzled it in one capacity or the other. If he embezzled it as a factor for the trustees, then the money was never paid into the bank, but the suggestion of the pursuers is that he passed it from himself as factor to himself as agent for the bank, and then embezzled it, so that the money was in the bank's hands, and they are now liable to repay it. Now, looking at it as a matter of fact, I think that that is not a suggestion which has any likelihood to recommend it. I think the money had not been paid into the bank before it was embezzled, and therefore it never came into Reid's hands, or anybody else's hands, as representing the bank. I think that is the sound conclusion with reference to the first and second entries here in question. And I think the facts as they were told us as regards the two later entries, which have two sets of initials to them, point in the same direction, for while initialing the items himself he forged the initials of another official of the bank. If the sums of money had come into his hands as bank-agent there would have been no necessity for his forging the name of the other official. When he made up his pass-book no one can tell, for he kept it in his own possession, and probably no eyes but his own ever saw it, but I think the conclusion to which the forgery points is that he never paid the money into the bank. The docquets in the bank ledger also are evidence that the money was never paid into the bank. I therefore agree with the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, and hold it proved as matter of fact that the bank never received the sums claimed by the pursuers. That being so, the prima facie evidence of the pass-book has been displaced by satisfactory evidence that the money was not paid in, and I would suggest to your Lordships that we should dismiss the appeal with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that on 1st November 1886 the balance due by the defenders on the cash account with Richard Reid, as agent and factor for the pursuers, was £1, 17s., and that on 1st November 1887 there was a balance due to the defenders on said account, and that no sum is now due by the defenders to the pursuers: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Find the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

DONALD MACKENZIE, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

Feb. 6, 1889.
Couper's
Trustees v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

No. 78. JOHN F. M'LAREN (Nicol's Trustee), Appellant.—C. J. Guthrie—Craigie.
F. C. HILL, Respondent.—Strachan—Patten.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Nicol's Trustee v. Hill.

Bankruptcy—Catholic and secondary creditors—First and second bondholders—Poinding of the ground.—The holder of a first bond over heritable subjects, who had by poinding the ground obtained a preference over his debtor's moveables to the extent of £122 (of interest), after obtaining payment of his bond by realising the heritage, assigned his preference over the moveables to the holder of a second bond.

In a question between the trustee on the debtor's sequestrated estate and the holder of the second bond, held that the holder of the first bond was bound as far as possible to take payment from the moveables or to assign his preference over them to the second bondholder, and that having taken payment entirely from the heritage the second bondholder had right to his preference over the moveables.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
M.

By bond and disposition in security, dated 8th, and recorded 15th May 1883, James Nicol borrowed £2500 from Mr Thomas Sime, on the security of certain heritable subjects in Oban, called Craigievar.

By another bond and disposition in security, dated 20th, and recorded 26th November 1884, Nicol borrowed £500 from Mr F. C. Hill, on the security of the same subjects.

On 10th June 1887 Sime, the first bondholder, obtained decree under a poinding of the ground, which he had executed, and thereby obtained a preference for one and a-half year's interest on his bond, or £122, 16s. 1d.

On 21st June following the estates of Nicol, the debtor in the bonds were sequestrated, and Mr John F. M'Laren was appointed trustee.

On 18th October following Hill, the second bondholder, served a summons of poinding of the ground upon the trustee. On an admission from the trustee that Hill had a preference under his poinding for the current half year's interest, and arrears for the previous year, it was arranged, on 29th November following, that the action should not be further proceeded with. A sum of £24, 5s. 5d., the amount admittedly due, was thereafter paid to Hill.

On 19th October 1887 Sime, the first bondholder, sold the security subjects under the powers in his bond at the price of £2900, which was paid on 23d November following. After satisfying Sime's claim for principal and interest, and deducting expenses, &c., there remained out of the £2900 a balance of £199, 8s. 6d. to meet Hill's debt of £500.

Hill, the second bondholder, objected that Sime ought to have paid his claim of £122, 16s. 1d. for interest out of the moveables secured by his poinding, which had realised about £500, and that he was not entitled to satisfy that portion of his debt out of the proceeds of the heritage. Hill only consented to Sime's doing so on obtaining from him an assignation to his preference over the moveables. The assignation was granted on 26th January, and was intimated to the trustee on 13th February 1888.

Hill then lodged a claim in Nicol's sequestration for the £122, 16s. 1d.

The trustee rejected the claim, holding that Sime's legal claims "were fully met on 23d November 1887, and his diligence was of no effect after that date, and any assignation granted by him after his diligence was extinguished carried nothing."

Hill appealed to the Sheriff, and pleaded;—The appellant being now in right of the preference acquired by the said Thomas Sime, the first bondholder, is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The trustee pleaded;—(3) After a sale of the heritable subjects the first bondholder could not put the said decree in force, and his assignee is in no better position than his cedent.

On 31st October 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) recalled the trustee's deliverance, and ordained him to rank Hill in terms of his No. 78. claim.*

The trustee appealed, and argued ;—(1) The security subjects had been completely disencumbered of all diligences and securities over them by the sale, which was completed by the payment of the purchase-price on 23d November 1887.<sup>1</sup> The assignation by the first bondholder of his decree of poinding, and of the rights thereby secured, which was not executed till some months after that date, carried nothing. (2) This was not a case of catholic and secondary securities, for both creditors had availed themselves of their right to poind the ground in security of the interest due to them, so far as they could legally do so. That right was restricted, and only extended to interest for the current half year and arrears of the previous year.<sup>2</sup> Accordingly the security created by the first bondholder's poinding could never have been available to the second bondholder ; the more so, as at the date of the settlement with the first bondholder on 23d November, the second bondholder's poinding was still in force, and had not been withdrawn. None of the cases quoted upon the other side were authorities for extending the rights of a second bondholder so far as it was proposed to extend them here. The result of so extending them would be most prejudicial to the interests of the ordinary creditors, of which the law was always particularly jealous.<sup>3</sup>

Argued for the respondent ;—(1) The operation of the 123d section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868 did not affect this question. No doubt the lands were disencumbered of all diligences when a sale was carried through under the Act, but that was only in a question with the purchaser. It did not affect the interests of creditors. (2) This would have been the ordinary case of a catholic and secondary security if it had been the first bondholder only who had executed a poinding. In that case he could not have capriciously injured the secondary creditor by taking payment out of the heritage only, leaving the moveables untouched. He would have been bound either to satisfy his debt out of the moveables so far as they went, or to give the second bondholder an assignation to his * "NOTE.— . . . When the sale to which this action refers took place the selling creditor's debt consisted of the principal sum of £2500 and £122, 15s. 1d., being one year's interest, less tax, and his security consisted of the bond along with the preference created by his poinding of the ground. In the circumstances it was unnecessary for him to realise the security created by his poinding of the ground, seeing that his principal debt and interest were paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the heritable subjects. But there still remained the obligation in section 122 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, of holding count and reckoning with the postponed creditor, and this obligation he fulfils by paying over the balance of the price, and assigning his diligence of poinding of the ground, being the unrealised portion of his security.

"The appellant, by withdrawing the poinding of the ground executed by him, gave up the security thereby created over the moveables, and his security was thus confined to the heritable subjects, and I hold that the first bondholder, seeing that his security extended over the moveables as well as over the heritable subjects, was not entitled to defeat the second bondholder's claims by selling only that portion of the property which formed the latter's sole security, and paying himself in full out of the proceeds, leaving the other portion untouched."

<sup>1</sup> Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (32 and 33 Vict. cap. 119), sec. 123.

<sup>2</sup> Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 118 ; Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 55 ; Conveyancing Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 40), sec. 3 ; Boswell v. Ayrshire Banking Co., Jan. 15, 1841, 3 D. 352.

<sup>3</sup> Urquhart v. Macleod's Trustees, June 16, 1883, 10 R. 991.

No. 78.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Nicol's Trustees
v. Hill.

rights over them.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, a formal assignation was not necessary.<sup>2</sup> [LORD PRESIDENT.—I am inclined to agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Ivory (18 D. 218) that it was not.] The fact that the second bondholder had also brought a pointing of the ground could make no difference; besides, the trustee had conceded his rights so soon as it was brought, and practically before the sale was carried through on 23d November. Nor could the fact that the rights of creditors executing pointings of the ground were restricted by the 3d section of the Conveyancing Act Amendment Act of 1879 affect the question. It diminished the extent of the right, but it did not alter its nature.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question here arises in the sequestration of a person of the name of Nicol, a writer in Oban, which was awarded on 21st June 1887. There were two heritable securities over certain subjects belonging to the bankrupt, one created in May 1883 for a sum of £2500 in favour of Mr Sime, and the second in favour of Mr Hill, the respondent in this appeal, for £500, and created in November 1884. Mr Hill was thus in the position of being second bondholder, Mr Sime being the first. Mr Sime executed a pointing of the ground on 10th June 1887, and Mr Hill also served a summons of pointing of the ground on the trustee in October of the same year. The pointings were of course restricted in their effect by the operation of the Bankruptcy Act, which deny all effect to pointings of the ground executed either after sequestration or within sixty days of bankruptcy, except to a limited extent—that is to say, to the extent of the current half year's interest and arrears for one year. The pointings were here in consequence restricted to that extent; in the case of the first the amount for which it was effectual was £122, 16s. 1d., and in the case of the second the amount was £24, 5s. 5d.

The first bondholder availed himself of the power to sell the heritable property. He sold it in October 1887, and the price was £2900, which was more than sufficient to pay the sum in his bond with the interest due upon it, and in consequence left a surplus, for which, of course, the first bondholder was liable to account to the second bondholder and to the trustee. The first bondholder proposed to hand over the surplus which he said he had in hand, but the second bondholder was not satisfied, because he objected that the first bondholder had taken full payment out of the price of the heritable subject, and not at all out of the moveables which he had effectually pointed, and the second bondholder contended that in fairness to himself payment ought to have been taken out of these moveables in so far as the claim for the £122, 16s. 1d. was concerned. The contention of the second bondholder just comes to this, that the first bondholder had a catholic security—a security over the heritage and a security over the moveables—and that, as a catholic security holder, he was bound so to divide what was available to him under these securities as to leave as large a surplus as possible to the second bondholder. In answer to this contention, the first bondholder granted an assignation in favour of the second bondholder of the sum of £122, 16s. 1d. secured by the first bondholder's pointing of the ground; and the contention of the second bondholder now is, that he is entitled to be ranked preferably on the bankrupt estate for that amount, on the ground that the assignation of the poiding of the ground is effectual to him in virtue of the equity arising in the case of catholic securities. The question is, whether that equity applies to the present case?

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Comms. ii. (5th edn.) 524, (7th edn. 418); Goudy on Bankruptcy, 500; Littlejohn v. Black, Dec. 13, 1855, 18 D. 208, 28 Scot. Jur. 87; Goldie v. Bank of Scotland, Feb. 27, 1834, 12 S. 498, 6 Scot. Jur. 293.

<sup>2</sup> Littlejohn v. Black, 18 D. 208 (Lord Ivory's opinion, p. 218).

No. 78.

Feb. 3, 1889.
Nicol's Trustee v. Hill.

The equity itself is well established in the law, and it is almost unnecessary to cite authority in regard to it, but it may be well to quote what Mr Bell says, carrying out the doctrine as he finds it in Lord Kames' remarkable work on the Principles of Equity (Bell's Comma. (7th edn.) ii. 417),—"Where two estates," says Mr Bell, "of the same debtor are covered by a security for the debt, and there is no third party interested in either of the estates, the operation of the principle is obscured by the identity of interest in the proprietor; the creditor may of course take his payment from either estate, and there can be no room for assignation, the debt being to all purposes extinguished. But if a separation of interest in the two estates take place (ex gr., if the debtor die and is succeeded by two heirs in different lines of succession) the same rule must of course be applied as if the estates had belonged originally to two several debtors. They must pay the debt rateably in proportion to the value of the estates; and if the proprietor of one pay the whole, he is entitled to an assignation that he may recover the share belonging to the other." And then comes a passage which is more immediately applicable to the present case. "Where there are secondary creditors on the two estates, the right of the catholic creditor to demand his debt must suffer the same qualification as if the estates belonged to several proprietors. Thus, if A have an heritable bond over two estates belonging to B, and C have an heritable security over the one estate and D an heritable security over the other, A cannot capriciously prefer the one to the other, by claiming his debt from one of the estates, leaving the other free, but must in equity assign his security. But if there be a secondary security over one estate only, and no interest in opposition upon the other estate but that of the debtor, the rule uniformly laid down is that the catholic creditor is not capriciously to injure the secondary creditor by claiming his debt from the estate over which his security extends, leaving the other unburdened to the debtor, but that he must claim from the unburdened estate, or must assign his security."

Now, the question is whether that doctrine is applicable to the circumstances of the present case. The peculiarity here is that we are dealing with the heritable estate and the moveable estate as two separate subjects of security—that both the creditors have a security over both the estates. Each of them has a security over the heritage, and also over the moveables, but to a limited extent, that is to say, to the extent of the value of their poidings, and the value of the moveables is undoubtedly sufficient to satisfy both of these limited rights over the moveables. That peculiarity distinguishes the present case from any former case, so far as I am aware, but does it distinguish it in principle from those cases to which the equity arising from the position of catholic security holders has been held to be applicable? There is no doubt that if the first bondholder had taken payment out of the moveables to the extent to which his right over them extended he would have taken just so much the less out of the heritable estate, and in consequence would have left just so much the more for the second bondholder. He has in fact taken payment of his whole debt out of the heritable estate, and has thus made worse to that extent the position of the second bondholder. It appears to me that this is just the situation to which the equity does apply. It is precisely where the first bondholder has it in his power injuriously to affect the second bondholder that he is bound so to act as to cause

No. 78.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Nicol's Trust-
tee v. Hill.

the least prejudice to the second bondholder consistently with payment of his own debt in full, or if he chooses to act otherwise, that he must assign the second bondholder the security which he has not used. It was argued, and forcibly and plausibly argued, that to give effect to that contention would be to benefit the second bondholder at the expense of the general body of creditors, and that is quite true. But then that is just the effect of giving the doctrine in any case. Whatever has the effect of giving the second bondholder a larger preference necessarily implies a loss to the general body of creditors, but nevertheless that effect has been disregarded and the doctrine maintained. I can see nothing in the circumstances of the present case to exclude the application of the doctrine, and, therefore, I think that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD MURE.—I also think that the Sheriff-substitute has come to the right conclusion. The passage which your Lordship has read from Mr Bell's Commentaries fully warrants that conclusion, which is also, I think, borne out by the case of Littlejohn referred to by Mr Patten. The second bondholder was prejudiced by the way in which the first bondholder proceeded to work out his preference, but no fault is to be found with the first bondholder for so doing, because he granted an assignation to his poiding in favour of the second bondholder, and thus did all he could to put him into the position which he ought to occupy.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. Each of the bondholders had a security over the heritable estate, and at the same time the power of stretching their hands and securing the moveables by the diligence of poiding to the extent of one half year's interest and arrears for the past year. The first bondholder exercised his diligence over the moveables by executing a decree of poiding, and thus secured a preferable right over them to that extent. He nevertheless then turned back upon his security over the heritage and proceeded to sell it under the decree and pay himself in full out of the price. Now, I take it that in such a case of matters the right of the second bondholder was to say,—"You must not take such of your securities as are available to me in payment of your debt, but you must have other securities which will in part reduce your claim, but of which you must directly take the benefit." Because, I think, the principle explained in Bell, in the passage which your Lordship has read, forbids that. In the case of Littlejohn this doctrine was carried so far as to require the first bondholder to realise a separate security which he had over ships, the property of the second bondholder in which the second bondholder had no direct interest, in order to prevent the diminution of the second bondholder's interest in his heritable security. In the present case it appears to me to be a fortiori of the present, for if the first bondholder had been bound to realise a security in which the second bondholder had no interest or right whatever, much more, as it appears to me, ought he to have been bound to do so when both parties have interests in the same security, namely, the heritable property, and the moveables on it which are liable to be poided for a year's interest on the debt, and which had been in fact poided. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right.

LORD ADAM.—It is quite clear that if Hill, the second bondholder, had a security only over the heritage, this would just have been an example of an ordinary case of a catholic security, for Sime, the first bondholder, would held a security both over the heritage and the moveables, and Hill over the heritage only. Does it make any difference that each creditor holds a security over both subjects? There is no direct authority on the point, and I am not surprised. In the ordinary case, each security right extends over the whole subject, and consequently it cannot matter out of which the prior creditor takes his payment; he just leaves so much the more of the other subject out of which the posterior creditor may pay himself. Here the peculiarity is that neither creditor can exhaust the moveables. But I am clear that this peculiarity makes no difference. I think it is just an instance of the ordinary case to which the equitable doctrine of catholic securities applies. That doctrine is that when a prior creditor has one way of working out his preference which is less injurious to the postponed creditor than another, the prior creditor is bound either to adopt that course, or by assignation to put the postponed creditor into his right. Sime accordingly was bound to pay himself out of the moveables to the extent of the £122, 16s. 1d., or to assign that right to Hill, for in either way there was a larger fund to meet Hill's debt. I therefore agree with your Lordship that we should adhere.

No. 78.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Nicol's Trustees v. Hill.

THE COURT adhered to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and refused the appeal.

WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—M'NEILL & SIME, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN STEWART KENNEDY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Robertson—No. 79.
D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Defender (Reclaimer).—Balfour—Asher—Dundas. Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v. Stewart.

*Entail—Sale of entailed estate "subject to ratification of Court"—Contract—Specific performance—Entail Amendment Acts, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 4; 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 94), sec. 5; 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 61), secs. 5 and 6—Entail Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 53), secs. 13, 19, 20, 21, 22.—S, an heir of entail in possession, sent to K a holograph offer to sell the entailed estate at a specified price, containing these words,—"In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court." The offer was accepted. Thereafter S presented a petition to the Court, setting forth the above missives, and sections 19-22 of the Entail Act, 1882,* and praying the Court to ratify the contract constituted by the missives, and to grant an order of sale in terms thereof. The heir next entitled to succeed (who was the only other existing heir) lodged answers, in which he founded on section 22 of the Act of 1882, which gave him a right to refuse his consent to a sale by private bargain. In an action brought by K against S, concluding for declarator that by the missives a valid contract was entered into for the sale of the estate, and that in respect thereof the defender was under a legal obligation to apply to the Court for authority and power, under the Entail Amendment Acts, to sell and dispoise the estate, and for implement, the Court held that the procedure under sections 19-22 of the Act of 1882 was not applicable to the circumstances, and that the heir in possession was bound to present and prosecute to a conclusion a petition, in terms of section 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, and section 5 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1853, as amended by section 13 of the Entail Act, 1882, for a sale of the estate on the footing of compensating the next heir, and, further, ordained the pursuer to lodge in process a draft of a disposition by the defender of the entailed estate.*

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART was heir of entail in possession of 1st Division. the estates of Murtly, Grandtully, and others in Perthshire. Lord Trayner.
B.

In 1885 he had presented a petition (after mentioned) to the Court of * These and the sections subsequently referred to are quoted infra, p. 427.

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

Session for an order of sale of the estates in terms of the Entail Act, 1882, but after some preliminary steps the proceedings therein were not carried further, and the petition was ultimately dismissed on the motion of the petitioner, on 26th October 1888.

In the year 1888 Sir Douglas received certain communications from Mr Peter Glendinning, Leuchold, Dalmeny Park, on the subject of a proposed sale of the estates to a third party, whose name was not at first disclosed, but who was, as ultimately appeared, Mr John Stewart Kennedy, banker, New York.

On 18th September 1888 Mr Kennedy and Mr Glendinning visited Murtly Castle, and saw the house and grounds.

On 19th September Sir Douglas wrote the following letter to Mr Kennedy:—"Murtly Castle, 19th September 1888.—Dear Sir,—Having reference to my interview and conversation with you and Mr Glendinning yesterday, I now desire to say that I am willing to dispose of the entire estate of Murtly, &c., consisting of about 33,000 acres, with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, on the basis of twenty-five years' purchase of the present, or even an appraised valuation, of the nett rental thereof, as may be ascertained by an agreed appraisement, you appointing one, and me the other, and if the two cannot agree, a third party to be chosen by the two.

"Payment to be made in cash unless it can be otherwise agreed as to any part, and possession to be given not later than the 15th May 1889.

"This offer to be open for your acceptance for two weeks from this date, and on your notifying to me or to my agents (Messrs Dundas & Wilson, C.S.) of such acceptance on or before the expiry of that time it will be binding on me.

"In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court."

Mr Kennedy answered:—"Edinburgh, 20th September 1888.—Dear Sir Douglas,—I hereby accept your offer of the entire estate of Murtly, &c., with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, as contained in your letter to me of yesterday's date, and I agree to purchase said estate, &c., at twenty-five years' purchase of the present nett rental thereof, and that on the conditions set forth in your said letter, a copy of which is annexed hereto."

On 5th October Sir Douglas wrote to Mr Kennedy as follows:—"My dear Sir,—Since I wrote to you on the 19th ulto., I have thought a good deal, as you may suppose, about the important transaction which in that letter I proposed to enter into with you. I am quite satisfied on reflection that my offer was a very foolish one, and I should never have made it if I had not been hurried and pressed, or if I had taken proper legal advice, as I certainly should have done. I am told now that there are legal difficulties in the way of which I was not then aware, and it appears that it is by no means matter of certainty that the Court will agree to ratify the proposed arrangement. That may involve unpleasant publicity and the interference of the next heir of entail. I should be well pleased if you see your way to release me altogether from it. I repent it both on my wife's account and my own, as well as on account of the heir of entail entitled to succeed me, who is even now more interested than I am.

"If, however, you insist upon it, I am ready to endeavour to obtain the ratification of the Court, which I am advised can only be done for an order or authority to sell in terms of our contract."

Mr Kennedy declined to cancel the transaction.

Thereafter Sir Douglas and Mr Kennedy's agents agreed that the price of the estates, on the basis of the missives above quoted and according to a rental adjusted between them, should be £372,982, 10s. 10d. No. 79.

On 6th November 1888 Sir Douglas presented a petition to the Court of Session for "ratification of agreement to sell." The petitioner after setting forth the missives of sale, and praying for an order for service on Walter T. J. Scrymgeour Fotheringham of Pourie, the only existing heir of entail (other than the petitioner) under the deeds of entail therein narrated, craved the Court "to ratify and confirm the contract constituted by the missives of sale set forth in the petition; and to grant an order of sale of the said estates of Grandtully, Murtly, Strathbraan, and others, in favour of the said John Stewart Kennedy at the said price of £372,982, 10s. 10d., in terms of the said missives; and authorise the petitioner to execute, at the sight of your Lordships, a disposition or other deed of conveyance of the said estate in favour of the said John Stewart Kennedy, containing all clauses usual and necessary for the purposes of the conveyance, according to the nature of the transaction, and the clause of warrandice specified in the said Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882; and further to authorise the price, after payment of the expenses after mentioned, and after payment of the debts and redemption-price of rent charges affecting the said estates, to be invested in terms of the said Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882." Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

Mr Fotheringham lodged answers to the petition, in which he stated, inter alia;—"The present petition, which prays for the ratification by the Court of an alleged private bargain of sale of the whole of the said entailed estates, dated 19th and 20th September 1888, between the petitioner and Mr John Stewart Kennedy, a New York banker, is not in conformity with or warranted by any of the Entail Statutes. . . . In the procedure authorised by the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, the respondent, as next heir, has right, by intimating within one month after an order for sale that he desires the sale to be by public auction, to prevent any sale by private bargain. . . . A sale in the manner and at the price proposed would very injuriously affect the patrimonial interest of the respondent."

On 6th November, the same day as that on which the petition was presented, Mr Kennedy raised an action in the Court of Session against Sir Douglas, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that by the missives above quoted "a valid contract was entered into between the said pursuer and the defender for the sale by the defender to the said pursuer of the estate of Murtly, including the lands and estates of Grandtully, Murtly, Strathbraan, and others, situated in the county of Perth, belonging to the defender as heir of entail in possession thereof, and that, in respect of the said contract, the defender is under legal obligation to apply to our said Lords for authority and power under the Entail Amendment Acts to sell and dispose the said estate; and the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to implement the said contract, and forthwith to present a summary application to our said Lords, under and in terms of the Entail Acts, and specially the following sections thereof, viz, the 4th section of the Act of the 11th and 12th of our reign, cap. 36, the 5th and 6th sections of the Act of 38th and 39th of our reign, cap. 61, and the 13th section of the Act of 45th and 46th of our reign, cap. 53, or otherwise in terms of other sections of the said Acts, all as the said petition or application may be adjusted at the sight of a person to be appointed by our said Lords in the process to follow hereon, for authority to sell and dispose the said lands and estates to the said pursuer, and to adopt and carry out with all due speed the procedure prescribed by the said Acts, including, if necessary, the com-

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

pensating of the next heirs for obtaining such authority; and thereupon, after having obtained such authority, to make, execute, and deliver, at the sight of our said Lords, a formal disposition of the said lands and estates to the pursuer, the said John Stewart Kennedy, containing all usual and necessary clauses, and to make and execute such other deeds of conveyance, and other deeds as may be necessary for giving effect to the said contract of sale, the defender duly making payment of the price as the same is or may be fixed in terms of the letters above mentioned; or otherwise, the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained to make such application, in terms of said Entail Acts, as shall entitle him to carry out and implement his said contract or agreement with the said pursuer; and failing implement of the foresaid contract, the said defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £50,000 sterling, in name of damages.*

The pursuer founded on the correspondence above quoted, and averred;—"The defender presented the petition referred to after the present action was raised, and he did so not for the purpose of enabling him to carry out the contract, but in order to secure that the contract should not be carried out. For this purpose he has been and is in communication with the next heir of entail so as to prevent any sale by private bargain, or any approval of the sale to the pursuer. Further, the next heir has lodged answers to the petition by the defender, in which, inter alia, he founds upon section 22 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, which provides that a sale under the procedure adopted by the defender shall not be by private bargain if either the applicant or the next heir shall intimate within one month after the order for sale that he desires the sale to be by public auction, and the next heir asks the Court to dismiss the petition as incompetent."

The defender in answer stated;—"That the application is in dependence before the said Lord Ordinary, and the defender is willing to proceed with it with all reasonable dispatch. He has thus implemented so far as has been possible the terms of his agreement with the pursuer. A print of said petition is produced herewith. It is denied that it was presented in order that the said contract should not be carried out, or that the defender has been, or is in communication with the next heir of entail, so as to prevent any sale by private bargain or any approval of the sale to the pursuer. The answers to said petition are referred to. The pursuer's agents were made aware that the said petition was being prepared, and that it had been lodged, before they sent the summons in the present action to the defender's agents to accept service. In these circumstances the action is unnecessary, or at all events premature."

The defender also made the following averments, which were denied by the pursuer;—"The letter here quoted (i.e., the letter of 19th September) was copied by the defender from a draft which Mr Glen-dinning brought with him, and which he suddenly and earnestly pressed the defender to copy out and sign, there and then. The defender, who is eighty-one years of age, and in very infirm health, yielded to the pressure thus brought to bear upon him when he was in a highly nervous, flurried, and excited condition, and thus weak and facile, and wrote and signed the letter. In doing so, he did not intend to make, or understand that he was making, an offer which could, by a simple acceptance, be made finally binding on him, to the effect of excluding all further opportunity for consideration and advice, and all proper supervision of its terms by the Court, in the interests of parties. In particular, he did not intend, and would have absolutely refused, to enter into any bargain on the footing of his being obliged to disentail or sell the estates and compensate the next heir of entail. The next heir of entail is Mr Fotheringham of Pourie and Tealing, who is about twenty-six years of age. In the event of its being held that the said letter and the acceptance set forth in article 8 of the condescendence import any such obligation on the defender as the pursuer alleges, he avers that the said letter was impetrated from him under essential error, fraudulently induced by the pursuer or his representatives, and he reserves all right competent to him to reduce and set aside the transaction."

---

* When the case came before the Inner-House, the pursuer added the following conclusion after the words "in terms of the letters above mentioned," "or otherwise the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, forthwith to implement the said contract, and to execute a formal disposition of the said lands and estates by the defender to the pursuer, the said John Stewart Kennedy, containing all usual and necessary clauses, as the same shall be adjusted at the sight of our said Lords, and to make and to prosecute to a conclusion an application to the Court for the sanction and approval of the said sale and disposition, all in terms of the Acts 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, 45 and 46 Vict. c. 53, or any of them, and upon the Court sanctioning and approving as aforesaid, to deliver the said disposition to the said pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect of the letters condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and implement as concluded for. (2) Failing implement of the said contract the pursuer is entitled to damages as concluded for. (3) The defender's statements being irrelevant, et separatim, so far as material, unfounded in fact, the defences should be repelled. (4) In respect the defender has not presented, and is not prosecuting, any petition in bona fide, in order to carry out the sale, but, on the contrary, the only petition presented by him being for the purpose of securing if possible that the sale should not be carried out, the defences and pleas founded on the said petition should be repelled. (5) The pursuer being entitled to have the authority of the Court, so far as necessary for having the said sale carried out, obtained in any competent form, the decree to that effect should be granted.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action should be dismissed in respect that it is unnecessary, et separatim, that it is premature. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (3) The defender, not being bound to implement the said missives in the manner specified in the summons, should be assoilzied.

On 21st December 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the 1st, 2d, and 3d pleas in law for the defender: Finds, decerns, and declares, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons; ordains the defender to implement the contract referred to in said conclusions, and forthwith to present a summary application to the Court, as concluded for in the first petitory conclusion of the summons, or otherwise to make such application to the Court, in terms of the Entail Acts, as shall entitle him to carry out and implement the said contract: Quoad ultra continues the cause, and grants leave to reclaim."* * "OPINION.—Had it not been for the concluding paragraph of the defender's letter of 19th September 1888, I suppose it is not open to doubt that that letter, and the pursuer's letter in reply, dated 20th September (if not reduced), would have constituted a valid and binding contract of sale between the parties of the Murtly estates. It is the meaning and effect of that paragraph therefore which has to be considered. The paragraph is as follows:—'In the event of your acceptance, the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.'

"It is said by the defender that what he had in view when he conditioned for the 'ratification of the Court' was a proceeding under the Act of 1882, and not a disentail under the Rutherford Act and amending Acts. I hesitate to

No. 79:

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The action was premature. A competent petition had been presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary with a view to carrying out this bargain, and was still in dependence. This action was virtually an interdict against the Lord Ordinary proceeding in that application.

On a fair construction of the missives, the sale contemplated was to be "made subject to the ratification of the Court," i.e., it was one which might or might not be fulfilled. If it turned out that the Court either could not or would not ratify the proposed terms of sale, the bargain would be at an end, and the defender free.

A petition for authority to sell, in terms of the Rutherford Act, sec. 4, accept that statement on the evidence referred to in support of it, consisting chiefly of statements made in letters by the defender to the pursuer, when asking that he might be relieved of the bargain he had made. But, however that may be, it is not so material to inquire what the defender meant or intended; the question rather is, what he said, and what meaning the pursuer, in considering the defender's offer, might fairly put upon the language used. The circumstances surrounding the transaction, as known to both parties, afford some aid in the solution of these questions. The parties were dealing with an entailed estate, and knew that some proceeding before the Court was necessary to enable the heir of entail in possession to sell the property to a stranger. But what the precise form of the proceeding should be, and on what statute the application to the Court should be based, were matters on which neither of the parties could be supposed to have correct information, or be able to form an opinion. These were matters of detail requiring professional assistance which the parties would leave to their professional advisers. But it needed no professional knowledge or skill for the defender to make, and the pursuer to accept, such an offer as this—I will sell you the entailed estates of Murtly at a specified price, provided the Court will pronounce such an order as will enable me to carry out the sale and give you a valid title. And that, I think, is the offer which the defender made and the pursuer accepted.

"The defender, however, says that his offer was one dependent on the 'ratification' of the Court, and that the Rutherford Act and Acts amending the same make no provision in terms for such a ratification. But neither does the Act of 1882, for while that Act prescribes (sec. 19 et seq.) certain procedure under which an order for the sale of an entailed estate may be obtained, it does not provide at all for the case of the Court being asked to ratify or approve of a sale already made—or made provisionally on the Court's approval being obtained. The Court cannot, under the Act of 1882, at any time or under any form of procedure, ratify the sale by the defender to the pursuer. It could only authorise the estates to be sold publicly (for the next heir does not consent to a private sale), and at that sale the pursuer might not be the successful offerer. In short, the Act of 1882 refers to and provides for a sale yet to be effected—not to a sale already made.

"The defender pleads that this action is premature, because he has presented an application under the Act of 1882 asking the Court to ratify the sale to the pursuer. I repel that plea, because if I am right in the view I have taken of that statute the application is inappropriate; and equally so, as it appears from the answers lodged to that application by the next heir of entail, that he does not consent to a private sale; and the Court could not authorise anything but a public sale if the next heir insists upon it.

"The defender having sold the estate in question to the pursuer subject to the ratification or approval of the Court, he is bound to adopt all proper means to obtain such an approval or ratification. By disentailing, or by obtaining the consent of the next heir to a private sale to the pursuer at the price and under the conditions already fixed, he will be able to carry through the transaction with the 'ratification' of the Court, in the sense in which (according to my view) that word is used in his offer to the pursuer."

as amended by secs. 5 and 6 of the Act of 1875, and sec. 13 of the Act of 1882,* would not satisfy the spirit or the words of the contract. There was

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.

Kennedy v.
Stewart.

* The following sections of the various Entail Acts were cited :—Section 4 of the Act of 1848 provides that “it shall be lawful for any heir of entail, being of full age, and in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, with such and the like consents as would by this Act enable him to disentail such estate, to sell, alienate, dispoise, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease and feu such estate, in whole or in part, and that unconditionally, or subject to conditions, restrictions, and limitations, according to the tenor of such consents, the authority of the Court of Session being always obtained thereto in the form and manner hereinafter provided; and such heir of entail shall be entitled to make and execute at the sight of the Court all such deeds of conveyance and other deeds as may be necessary for giving effect to the sales, dispositions, charges, leases, or feus so made and granted.”

Section 5 of the Act of 1853 provides,—“It shall be lawful for any heir of entail who is or shall be in a position to sell, alienate, dispoise, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease, feu, or excamb his entailed estate, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the said recited Act, to execute without the previous sanction of the Court a deed of conveyance, or contract of excambion, or other deed for giving effect to such sale, disposition, charge, lease, feu, or excambion; and to produce such executed deed either along with an application to the Court for its sanction thereto, or at any time in the course of the proceedings under such application when he shall think fit, or when such production shall be ordered by the Court; and on such application being presented, and such consents, if any, as are required by the said recited Acts being obtained, containing express consent to and approval of such deed of conveyance, or contract of excambion, or other deed executed as aforesaid, the Court shall pronounce an interlocutor approving of such sale, disposition, charge, lease, feu, or excambion, as the case may be, and of the deed executed as aforesaid for carrying the same into effect, and thereupon such deed shall have the same force and effect in every respect as if the same had been made and executed at the sight of the Court in terms of the said recited Act.”

The Act of 1882 provides (sec. 13),—“In any application under the Entail Acts, to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir, with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained, and the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, shall apply to the nearest heir, as well as to other heirs, and shall apply to all applications to which consents are required, and to entails dated on or after the 1st day of August 1848, as well as to entails dated prior to that date.”

Section 19.—“It shall be lawful for the heir of entail in possession of any entailed estate, or where an entailed estate consists of land held in trust for the purpose of being entailed for the person who, if the land had been entailed, would have been the heir in possession, or for the tutors, curators, or administrators of such heir or other person, to apply to the Court for an order of sale of the estate or part of it.”

Section 21.—“The Court shall procure a report as to the value of the estate, and as to the rights and charges affecting it, and shall, unless it appear that any patrimonial interest would be injuriously affected thereby, order the estate, or a part of it, to be sold in such manner as they think proper. Provided that in the case of any such application by or on behalf of a married woman, minor, pupil, or other person under disability, the Court shall not make the order unless they are satisfied that it will be for the benefit of the applicant.”

Section 22.—“The Court shall fix the time, and place, and manner of sale, and may authorise the sale of the estate, or such part of it, in whole or in lots,

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

no "ratification" of a "sale" by the Court in such a proceeding. The sale authorised by sec. 4 of the 1848 Act was simply a lesser power than and flowing from that of disentail, created by sec. 3, and the "ratification," if any, in such a proceeding, was the shaking off the fetters of the entail upon evidence that the interests of next heirs of entail and of creditors on the estate had been properly provided for, and had nothing to do with the disposition, which the proprietor could grant without any "ratification" when freed from the fetters. The Court did not in such a proceeding apply any arbitrium at all to the terms of the sale, or to the adequacy of the price. The pursuer, therefore, could not insist on the defender disentailing the estate, or selling it on the footing of compensating the next heir, in terms of the Rutherford Act, amended as above.

Nor would the Act of 1853, sec. 5, help the pursuer's contention. The defender was not in the position required by that section as a condition of its exercise. The next heir did not consent to the execution by him of any disposition in favour of the pursuer, and his consent thereto could not be forced, in virtue of the sections of the Acts of 1875 and 1882 above referred to. Sections 5 and 6 of the Act of 1875 bore expressly to amend sections 3 and 4 of the Rutherford Act, but were not intended to alter, and did not alter, the Act of 1853, section 5. And the Act of 1882, while carrying the relaxation introduced by that of 1875 a step further, and making the consent of even the nearest heir unnecessary in applications under the Rutherford Act, as thereby amended, did not remove the necessity, in the case of a proprietor who sought to avail himself of the Act of 1853, sec. 5, of producing the required "consents" of the next heirs to the disposition which the Court was asked to sanction. The pursuer, therefore, could not, in the present circumstances, derive aid from the Act of 1853.

The Act of 1882 remained. It was said by the Lord Ordinary not to be applicable to the present case. If that were so, there was no means of obtaining "the ratification of the Court" to the proposed sale, and the bargain must come to an end, and the defender must be assoilzied. The defender, however, was, and had all along been, willing to obtain the ratification of the Court to the missives under the procedure prescribed by this Act, if that could competently be done. The defender submitted that it could. This Act did require the "ratification" or arbitrium of the Court, for the Court must see (sec. 21) that no patrimonial interest was injuriously affected by the sale. In the ordinary case the petition was presented, and after the estate had been exposed to sale the Court was invited to approve, or disapprove, of the proposed terms of sale. In the present case the parties submitted to the Court certain agreed-on terms of sale for approval or ratification, and invited the Court, if it saw fit, to make these terms its own. The defender, at all events, had throughout had the Act of 1882 in view. He was aware of its scope and terms, having had a petition thereunder for an order of sale depending in Court from 1885 till October 1888, as above narrated. He would not have consented, and could not be presumed to have intended to do so, to and either by public auction at such upset price, or by private bargain at such price as the Court may direct, or partly by public auction and partly by private bargain, and if more advantageous to the parties, may direct the sale to be for a feu-duty instead of a price to be immediately paid, or partly for a feu-duty and partly for a price. Provided that the sale shall not be by private bargain if either the applicant or the next heir shall intimate within one month after the order for sale that he desires the sale to be by public auction. When the estate is sold by public auction any creditor or person interested, other than the applicant, may be the purchaser."

a sale, on the footing of compensating the next heir, looking (1) to the very heavy amount of such compensation in the circumstances; and (2) to the fact that, if he outlived the one other existing heir of entail, he would possess the whole entailed estates, or entailed money, in fee-simple. If the Act of 1882 were not applicable, the bargain must fall; if it were so, the defender was willing to proceed under it, and the accident that the next heir did not and might not consent was no fault of the defender.

No. 72.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

Even if the defender's construction of the missives was wrong, the Court would not in the circumstances, order specific performance of the contract by an application under the Entail Act, but would leave the pursuer to his remedy by way of damages. The granting or refusing of this equitable remedy was always in the discretion of the Court.<sup>1</sup> There was a "want of fairness" in the contract disclosed on the record, and besides, the Court would not pronounce a decree of specific performance where a continuous series of acts was necessarily involved,<sup>2</sup> nor where there might be difficulty, or even impossibility, in working out the decree of the Court, as might be the case here, if the defender refused to present or to carry through to a conclusion an application under the Entail Acts.<sup>3</sup>

Argued for the pursuer;—The word "ratification" simply meant "sanction" or "approval." It was precisely applicable to the procedure initiated by the Act of 1848, as perfected by the subsequent Acts, including section 13 of the Act of 1882. The Act of 1882 dealt with two distinct branches of procedure; by one section (sec. 13) the consent of even the nearest heir might be dispensed with in applications under the Rutherford and other Acts to which the consents of the next heirs, or the valuation of their interests when consent was refused, was necessary. By other sections (sec. 19, et seq.), an entirely new procedure was introduced for the conversion of entailed land into entailed money. With regard to this latter process, there was no authority in the statute for the Court ratifying a sale previously entered into; the sale and the terms on which it was to be made must be initiated by the Court. It was therefore impossible for the defender to fulfil his contract by proceeding under sections 19-22 of that Act, and this was rendered the more apparent as the consent of the next heir was admittedly essential to a sale by private bargain, and was in the present case refused. But there was no impossible condition in the contract if another procedure could be found which would satisfy it, and any reading of the contract which would give effect to it must be preferred to that which would invalidate it.<sup>4</sup> Now here the defender was in a position to carry out his bargain, subject to doing certain things which were quite within his power. Under section 4 of the Rutherford Act he had to carry the Court along with him, and its authority had to be interposed before he could give a purchaser a good title. But further, that Act was amended by the Act of 1853, and there in the section applicable to this case (sec. 5) it was provided that the executed deed of sale should be produced along with the application for the "sanction" of the Court thereto, and thereafter, after certain pro-

<sup>1</sup> Moore v. Paterson, Dec. 16, 1881, 9 R. 337—see Lord President, p. 348, Lord Shand, p. 351; Winans v. Mackenzie, June 8, 1883, 10 R. 941.

<sup>2</sup> Fry on Specific Performance, 2d ed. pp. 168, and following; Wycombe Railway Co. v. Donnington Hospital, 1866, L. R., 1 Chan. 268; Thomas v. Dering, 1837, 1 Keen, 729; Blackett v. Bates, L. R., 1 Chan. 117; Hendry v. Marshall, Feb. 27, 1878, 5 R. 687.

<sup>3</sup> Fry on Specific Performance, 2d ed. pp. 36, 37.

<sup>4</sup> Bell's Prin. sec. 524, subsec. 3; Ersk. Inst. iii. 3, 87; Coutts & Co. v. Allan & Co., 1758, M. 11,549.

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

cedure, the Court was to "approve" of the sale. The later Acts which amended those statutes only introduced the novelty of the consents being obtainable after valuation, if they were refused. There was therefore no possible hitch in the matter, always supposing that enough money was forthcoming to pay creditors, and to satisfy the interests of succeeding heirs. If the price at which the defender had contracted to sell his estate was not sufficient to pay off the creditors and the claims of the heirs the loss would fall on him personally. The English law laid down in the Wycombe Railway Company's case was not applicable in Scotland, as in that country the Courts proceeded on arbitrary rules of equity to which we had no analogous rules here. [LORD PRESIDENT.—The principles of equity as systematised by Lord Kames I look upon as the equity law of Scotland.] With regard to specific implement, there would be no difficulty in carrying out a decree in terms of the conclusions. Such an order had been granted by the First Division in the case of Merry & Cunningham v. Lord Glasgow and his Trustees (13th March 1888), though the question of awarding damages as alternative to specific implement had not there been argued.* The Court frequently ordained a person to execute a disposition. All the defender would have to do here was to grant an irrevocable mandate to some person to sign an application to the Court on his behalf, and thereafter the matter would proceed automatically.<sup>1</sup> There were only two classes of cases in which the Court would refuse to order specific implement, (1) where to do so would run counter to public policy (e.g., a promise of marriage); (2) where the contract could be equally well carried out by some other person at some other place (e.g., where a firm had contracted to build a ship). The present case did not fall under either of these classes.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The conclusion of this summons is for declarator that by certain missives a valid contract was entered into between the pursuer and defender for the sale by the defender to the pursuer of the estate of Murtly, "including the lands and estates of Grandtully, Murtly, Strathbraan, and others, situated in the county of Perth, belonging to the defender as heir of entail in possession thereof, and that in respect of the said contract the defender is under a legal obligation to apply to our said Lords for authority and power under the Entail Amendment Acts to sell and dispose the said estate." The Lord Ordinary has decerned in terms of that declarator. He has gone further and pronounced a decerniture, of which I shall have something to say hereafter. But the question really at issue between the parties is completely raised by that declaratory conclusion. The missives which are said to constitute this contract of sale are dated on 19th and 20th September of last year. The defender writes in these terms,—"Murtly Castle, 19th September 1888.—Dear Sir,—Having reference to my interview and conversation with you and Mr Glendinning yesterday, I now desire to say that I am willing to dispose of the entire estate of Murtly, &c., consisting of about 33,000 acres, with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, on the basis of twenty-five years' purchase of the present, or even an appraised valuation of the nett rental thereof as may be ascertained by an agreed appraisement, you appointing one and me the other, and if the two cannot agree, a third party to be chosen by the two. Payment to be made in cash, unless it can be otherwise agreed as to any part, and possession to be given not later than the 15th May 1889. This offer to be open for your acceptance for two weeks from this date, and on your notifying to me or to my agents (Messrs Dundas & Wilson, C.S.) of such acceptance on or before the expiry of that time it will be binding on me. In the event of your acceptance, the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court."

* This case was taken out of Court on a joint minute of the parties.

<sup>1</sup> M'Arthur v. Lawson, July 19, 1877, 4 R. 1134.

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

The answer of the pursuer is this,—“Edinburgh, 20th September 1888.—Dear Sir Douglas,—I hereby accept your offer of the entire estate of Murtly &c., with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, as contained in your letter to me of yesterday's date, and I agree to purchase said estate, &c., at twenty-five years' purchase of the present nett rental thereof, and that on the conditions set forth in your said letter, a copy of which is annexed hereto.”

The defender shortly thereafter was desirous of repudiating this bargain, but the pursuer declined to accede to the proposal, and brought this action for the purpose of enforcing it. I see that on the same date on which the principal summons was signeted the defender presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary apparently for the purpose of carrying out his obligation in terms of the conclusion of the summons. The date is in both cases 6th November 1888. Now, that was a petition presented under the authority of certain sections of the Entail Act of 1882, beginning with the 19th section, which confers a new power entirely upon heirs of entail to convert the entailed land into entailed money, and the conditions prescribed as applicable to the exercise of that power are somewhat peculiar, and require very strict attention.

The 19th section provides that “it shall be lawful for the heir of entail in possession of any entailed estate, or where an entailed estate consists of land held in trust for the purpose of being entailed for the person, who, if the land had been entailed, would have been the heir in possession, or for the tutors, curators, or administrators of such heir or other person to apply to the Court for an order of sale of the estate, or part of it.”

The 21st section provides that “the Court shall procure a report as to the value of the estate, and as to the rights and charges affecting it, and shall, unless it appear that any patrimonial interest would be injuriously affected thereby, order the estate, or a part of it, to be sold in such manner as they think proper: Provided that in the case of any such application by or on behalf of a married woman, minor, pupil, or other person under disability, the Court shall not make the order unless they are satisfied that it shall be for the benefit of the applicant.”

Then by the 22d section it is provided that “the Court shall fix the time and place and manner of sale, and may authorise the sale of the estate, or such part of it, in whole or in lots, and either by public auction at such upset price, or by private bargain at such price as the Court may direct, or partly by public auction and partly by private bargain, and if more advantageous to the parties, may direct the sale to be for a feu-duty instead of a price to be immediately paid, or partly for a feu-duty and partly for a price. Provided that the sale shall not be by private bargain if either the applicant or the next heir shall intimate within one month after the order for sale that he desires the sale to be by public auction.”

Now, upon the recital of this statute and of the missives which passed between

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

the parties, what the defender prayed the Court to do was to ratify and confirm the contract constituted by the missives of sale set forth in the petition, and to grant an order of sale of the estate at the price of £372,982, 10s. 10d., which is the rental of the estate at twenty-five years' purchase in terms of the missives. Now, this petition was presented apparently for the purpose of carrying out that clause in the missives which is the concluding clause of the defender's letter of 19th September,—“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.” It appears to me that the proceeding taken by the defender under the Act of 1882 is not a proceeding for the purpose of obtaining the ratification of a sale already made, except in so far as that professes to be done by the terms of the prayer, because with reference to the sections of the statutes which are quoted in the petition it is very plain that the Court could not ratify in any sense of the word a sale already completed. And accordingly the next heir of entail appeared in answer to this petition, and he stated in the first place that the petition was incompetent in that it was not in conformity with or warranted by any of the Entail Statutes. He said further, that a sale in the manner and at the price proposed would very injuriously affect his patrimonial interests, which, I think, in other words means plainly,—“I will object to a private sale.”

Now, in these circumstances it must be perfectly obvious, I think, that that petition is an extremely incompetent proceeding. It is clearly not competent, because the prayer of the petition is not only unwarranted by the clauses of the statute, but is in direct contradiction to the provisions of the statute; and in the second place, because the petitioner has not obtained, and apparently never will obtain, the consent of the next heir to a private sale at the price fixed by the missives. Therefore it has to be considered what the defender is bound to do in execution of his contract of sale—what he is bound to do for the purpose of obtaining the Court's ratification of that sale.

I think there are means under the Entail Acts of obtaining a ratification of this concluded sale, but not under the clauses referred to in the petition and founded on by the defender, but upon other clauses altogether, and particularly under the authority granted by the Act of 1853. The first section of any statute authorising a sale of entailed estates is the 4th section of the Act of 1848, the original Entail Amendment Act. It contains power to any heir of entail who is in the same position as an heir of entail who could disentail the estate, to sell the estate with the same consents, and subject to the same conditions as he required to have under the clauses which enabled him to disentail. But the Act of 1853 introduces an amendment upon that 4th section. It is the 16th and 17th Vict. c. 94, and it is entitled “An Act to extend the benefits of the Act of 11th and 12th years of Her present Majesty for the amendment of the law of entail in Scotland.” It provides by section 5 that “it shall be lawful for any heir of entail who is or shall be in a position to sell, alienate, dispose, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease, feu, or excamb his entailed estate, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the said recited Act, to execute without the previous sanction of the Court a deed of conveyance or contract of excambion, or other deed for giving effect to such sale, disposition, charge, lease, feu, or excambion; and to produce such executed deed either along with an application to the Court for its sanction thereto, or at any time in the course of the proceedings under such application when he shall think fit, or when such production shall be ordered by the Court; and on such application being presented, and such consents, if any, as are required by the said recited Acts being obtained, No. 79.

 containing express consent to and approval of such deed of conveyance or contract of excambion, or other deed executed as aforesaid, the Court shall pro- Feb. 8, 1889.
 nounce an interlocutor approving of such sale, disposition, charge, lease, feu, or Kennedy v.
 excambion, as the case may be, and of the deed executed as aforesaid for carrying Stewart.
 the same into effect, and thereupon such deed shall have the same force and effect in every respect as if the same had been made and executed at the sight of the Court in terms of the said recited Act."

Now, the peculiarities introduced by this Statute of 1853 are these; that an heir of entail is entitled to come to the Court after having made a contract of sale at a specified price, and to lay before the Court the disposition which he proposes to execute giving effect to such sale, and if the Court are satisfied that due provision has been made for the interests of heirs of entail and creditors, then it is imperative upon the Court to approve of the sale. The words are "the Court shall pronounce an interlocutor approving of such sale." But no doubt under this clause the Court must be satisfied that the proper consents have been given by the heirs of entail interested, and also that all the burdens upon the estate have been duly provided for. Now, if there had been no subsequent statutes, of course the defender here could not have proceeded with the petition under that statute without the consent of the next heir of entail, the only existing heir of entail as it happens in this case, and he must have obtained his consent to the application and to the proposed deed of conveyance. But then there are other sections which require to be attended to before we arrive at the full effect, as the law now stands, of a petition presented under this Act of 1853.

In the first place by the Act of 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 61), there is a very important provision in the 5th section—"In any application to the Court of Session for authority to disentail an entailed estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848, the consent of any of the heirs of entail mentioned in the recited section entitled to succeed to such estate may be competently given after such application has been presented to the Court, and in the course of the same. In the event of any of the foressaid heirs, except the nearest for the time, whether an heir-apparent or not, entitled to succeed, declining, or refusing to give, or being legally incapable of giving his consent, the Court may dispense with such consent, in terms of the provisions following."

Then there follows a provision for ascertaining the money value of the expectancy of such heirs, and upon such money value being ascertained the Court shall direct the amount to be lodged in bank for the benefit of the heirs whose consents would have been required under the previous Act; and then they shall dispense with the consent of such heirs. Now, under the statute there still remains the necessity for the consent of the nearest heir, and this section is also confined to the case of disentail only, and further, it is confined to the case of tailzies executed before 1848. But the immediately following section of the same Act introduced another provision in these terms:—"The provisions of the preceding section with reference to application for authority to disentail shall apply also where an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to 1st August 1848, applies for power to sell, alienate, dispoise, charge with debts or incumbrances, lease or feu, or excamb such estate in whole or in part: Provided always that nothing contained in this Act shall render it necessary in any application with reference to an

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

entailed estate to obtain the consent (or the dispensing with the consent) of any heir of entail whose consent would not have been necessary before the passing of this Act."

Now, that makes the provision of the Act of 1875—the 5th section of the Act of 1875—cover cases of application to sell as well as to disentail. And lastly, we come to the 13th section of the Act of 1882, which introduced still further innovations. The 13th section of the Act of 1882 is an amendment of the previous Act in those particulars, and is not in any way connected with the clauses of that Act of 1882 which I have already read, for the purpose of enabling an heir of entail to convert an entailed estate from land into money. There is no connection between those two parts of the statute at all. This 13th section has reference entirely to applications authorised by the previous statute, whereas the 19th and following sections introduced a new form of application for a new purpose. The 13th section is this,—“ In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required, and such heir or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir, with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained, and the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, shall apply to the nearest heir as well as to other heirs, and shall apply to all applications to which consents are required, and to entails dated on or after the 1st day of August 1848, as well as to entails dated prior to that date.”

Now, this is a very comprehensive section. It dispenses with all consents whatever, and in place of consent introduces a rule of buying off those whose consents were previously required, including the next heir as well as more remote heirs; and it makes the provisions of the Act of 1875 applicable to all applications to which consents are required, and to all entails whatever, no matter what their date may be. Now, what is the result? It comes to this, that under the Act of 1853, as amended by these subsequent Acts, an heir of entail in possession is entitled to come to the Court and state to the Court that he has sold the entailed estate, and to produce a disposition for the purpose of giving effect to that sale. He requires no consents to enable him to do so, but the Court of course still require to see that the expectancy of the succeeding heir or heirs of entail is valued and money secured, and the burdens on the estate duly provided for, before they will sanction and approve of the sale already made. But if they are satisfied upon these two points, that the expectancies are duly valued and provided for, and that the burdens upon the estate are all provided for, then it is imperative upon the Court to sanction the sale, and the sale shall have the same effect as the Act of 1853 provides, viz., “ it shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been executed at the sight of the Court in terms of the said recited Act.”

Now, it appears to me that when an heir of entail has carried through an application under the Act of 1853 in the manner which I have now detailed, he has obtained the ratification of the Court to a sale already made, and thus has fulfilled the very words of that clause in the missives which provided that the sale shall be ratified by the Court. I am therefore of opinion that it is the duty and obligation of the defender in this case to apply to the Court under the statutes which I have thus enumerated; that he is bound to produce to the Court a disposition of the estate in terms of the missives, and to pray the Court to approve of it, and to give it their sanction—and that that is the only way in which he can fulfil the obligation imposed upon him by the contract with the pursuer into which he entered in the month of September last. Therefore, while agreeing with the Lord Ordinary that we should decern in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, it rather appears to me that the next step to be taken is to have a disposition of the estate executed by the defender in favour of the pursuer, and I think we should take the course which we did in the Earl of Glasgow's case, and appoint that disposition to be prepared at the sight of the Court by some conveyancer to whom we may remit for the purpose. And when that disposition comes before us we can then decern further in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons relating to the presenting by the defender of the requisite application to the Court for carrying that sale into effect.

LORD MURE.—The main question we have now to decide, dealing with the reclaiming note from the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, is, what is the meaning of that passage in Sir Douglas Stewart's letter in which he says—"In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court." It is contended by the defender that this is to be done by means of a petition which I understand he presented under the Act of 1882. But I think we must take it that the ordinary meaning of the words "ratification of the Court," and what must have been in the minds of the parties, was that they should apply to the Court under some of the Acts of Parliament applicable to entails, by which the Court had power given to them to sanction such a step as that which was proposed when the offer was made and accepted. Now, I quite agree with your Lordship that the only Act of Parliament which appears to point at proceedings of the nature which would come up to the expression "ratification of the Court" is the Act of 1853, dealing with the case where an heir of entail is authorised to sell an estate and make a disposition of it, and then come to the Court for ratification. I understand your Lordship's opinion to be that that is the course which the heir of entail ought to take, and I concur in your Lordship's view.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with Lord Mure in thinking that the only question to be determined in this case is in regard to the meaning of the words, "In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court," and I think in determining the meaning of these words we must have regard to what the purchaser was entitled to take to be their meaning. It is not a question entirely of what was in the mind of the seller when these words were used, but the question is, how was the purchaser entitled to read these words when he gave a written acceptance of the offer? Now, I think the word "ratification," as used here, simply means confirmation or approval. Both parties knew the estate was entailed, and of course before the Court can either confirm or approve of the sale of an entailed estate, it must be shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the interests of the heirs of entail entitled to compensation have been protected, and that creditors who may have claims against the estate have also had their debts provided for. It is essential that in every proceeding by which there is to be a dealing with an entailed estate it shall be under the statutes subject to the approval of the Court. Now, looking at the

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

contract in that aspect of it, and without going over the various provisions of the statutes to which your Lordship has referred, it is quite plain that on the one hand there is a mode of proceeding by which the seller of this estate is in a position of exercising a right to get the approval or confirmation of the Court. He may, under the section of the Act of 1853 to which your Lordship referred, execute a deed of conveyance; he may present it to the Court, and ask for the confirmation or approval of it, and the Court, if satisfied that the interest of the heirs of entail and creditors have been provided for, will grant approval accordingly. There would have been a block in the way of a proceeding of that kind if this contract had been entered into in 1853 or immediately afterwards, because the next heirs of entail who had a material interest might then have refused their consent. But in 1875 there was a statute passed which enabled the heir in possession to compel the consents of the second and third heirs next entitled to succeed, and under the Act of 1882 the heir in possession can equally compel the next heir to himself to give his consent. It is important to observe that such next heir is not entitled to enforce such a payment for his interest as shall amount to a prohibitory price for it, for the statute contains provisions declaring that a reluctant heir may be compelled to give his consent upon reasonable terms. If the consent be refused, the Court are in a position to make such inquiry as will enable them to ascertain the true value of the heir's consent, which being ascertained, the value of it is fixed, the money is consigned, and the Court has thereupon power to dispense with the consent altogether. And so it is quite clear that in that view of the case there is no difficulty whatever in this contract being carried out to the very letter of it according to the view which I think any buyer of this estate upon that letter was entitled to entertain.

The proposal that is made in defence to this action is—not to adopt a proceeding under the Entail Acts which will secure the end which the seller of the estate became bound to secure if he could—the proposal is to present an application to the Court in such a form that the approval of the Court cannot be obtained. The proposal is, as I understand, to apply to the Court for authority to have the estate sold at the price agreed on to the present pursuer for the purpose of substituting entailed money in room of the estate. But one condition of carrying out a proposal of that kind is that you must carry the next heir with you in some respects, and if he refuses to give his consent to the arrangement he can block the proceedings entirely. Your Lordship has read the section which provides that in an application of that kind to convert an entailed estate into entailed money, the next heir has nothing to do but appear and say, “I object to a private sale, and insist on a sale by auction.” In this way he can absolutely prevent a private sale. And if he takes up that position, what is the effect upon a bargain of this kind? Why, it destroys the bargain, because it is a sale by private bargain, and if a public sale were ordered, Mr Kennedy would have to appear in the market as a competitor with any others who might come forward for the estate. In point of fact, as I read the answers which Mr Fotheringham, the next heir, has lodged in the application by Sir Douglas Stewart, in which he says he declined to consent to a sale “in the manner proposed,” I understand he means that if a sale were to take place under that petition, he would insist that it should be a sale by public auction.

Now, I think in that aspect of the case the question is quite simple. On the one hand the seller, who has stipulated for a ratification or approval of the sale, proposes to adopt a proceeding under the Entail Acts under which he cannot obtain the approval of the Court, because the next heir, having the power under the statute to do so, has interposed a block which will absolutely prevent that. On the other hand, the seller has it in his power to carry out the sale by taking a proceeding, not for selling this estate with a view to substituting entailed money, but for selling the estate so that he shall himself get the reversion of the price. He can have the interest of the next heir valued, and so he can carry out his contract of sale in that way. I am clearly of opinion that upon the question of construction of this contract and obligation the defender is bound to adopt a proceeding which will enable him to fulfil the contract, which it is clear he can fulfil, the matter being absolutely within his power, and that it is no implement of that contract to offer to take proceedings of another nature which a third party has power to frustrate, and with reference to which in this particular case the next heir of entail intimates that he will exercise his power, and so frustrate and prevent the sale being carried out. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordships that, following out the proceedings which are authorised by the Statute of 1853 and subsequent Acts, the defender should be ordained to execute a deed as your Lordship proposes, and that the terms of this deed in the meantime should be adjusted by a man of business.

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

It is right to notice that when the point as to the mode of working out the different stages of the case with the materials for so doing was argued before the Lord Ordinary when the case was before him, the conclusions of the summons did not describe the proper course to be adopted, but there has been an amendment made on the conclusions to the effect that the defender should be decerned and ordained to execute a disposition of the estate, and thereafter to take and follow out proceedings to have the sale and disposition approved of, and I think that alternative conclusion enables the Court to deal practically with the case as your Lordship proposes.

LORD ADAM.—In my opinion if this had not been an entailed estate, and missives in the terms of the offer and acceptance had been exchanged, in that case there would have been a completed contract of sale, and that would be all that was required. But this was an entailed estate, and therefore such a contract of sale could not be carried out without—to use the statutory words—the “approval” or, as it is sometimes called, the “sanction” of the Court,—because an application must be presented to the Court to obtain approval in respect of the interests of the heirs of entail and creditors upon the estate. Therefore we find that the concluding words of the offer here are,—“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.” As I read that it means this—subject to the sanction or approval of the Court. I think that is the only sensible meaning that can be given to the word ratification there. Well then, if that be so, so far as I am aware, there is only one way in which the approval or sanction or ratification of the Court can be obtained, and that is by a proceeding under the 5th section of the Act of 1853, because that gives authority to the heir of entail to execute and produce, either during or before he presents an application, a disposition of the estate. Now, it is quite true, as Lord Shand pointed out, that if the entail legislation had stopped with the Act of 1853, this sale could not have been carried out, and the sanction or approval or ratification of the Court could not have been obtained, because at that date the consent of the heir or heirs of entail was

No. 79.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Kennedy v.
Stewart.

requisite, and there would have been a bar, just as there is a bar to any other proceedings under the Act of 1882 here, because the consent in this case clearly would not have been given. But then have come the subsequent Entail Statutes, which I think it would be a waste of time, after your Lordship's exposition of them, to go over again; but the result of them is just this, that under the Act of 1882 there is a means by which the consent of the heir of entail, which was necessary under the Act of 1853, may be dispensed with, by ascertaining the money value of his expectancy or interest in the entailed estate. That is entirely a matter which can be done, and done as a matter of certainty. The Court, if it be done, cannot say anything against the sale; it must just give its sanction and approval of the sale if all the statutory formalities are carried out. There is no difficulty here, it appears to me, therefore in Sir Douglas Stewart doing what he is bound to do, I think, by the offer and acceptance, viz., in the first place, to execute a disposition of this entailed estate, and after having done that to proceed under the 5th section of the Act of 1853 and the subsequent Entail Statutes, and get the sanction and approval of the Court, which will follow as a matter of course if the statutory requisites are all attended to. Therefore I agree with your Lordship that the first thing is to ordain Sir Douglas Stewart to execute a disposition of this estate.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to said interlocutor in so far as it repels the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defender, and find, decern, and declare in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra recall the interlocutor in hoc statu, and appoint the pursuer to lodge in process within fourteen days the draft of a disposition by the defender of the estate of Murtly and others in favour of the pursuer, in fulfilment of the contract of sale constituted by the missives of sale, dated 19th and 20th September 1888, founded on by the pursuer."

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 80.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Macgregor v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

DONALD MACGREGOR, Appellant.—C. S. Dickson.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—*Sol.-Gen. Darling—
A. J. Young.*

Revenue—Property and Income-Tax—Casualty—Superior and vassal—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 60, schedule A—Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19), sec. 60.—A singular successor paid to the superior for his entry a casualty of a year's rent of the lands, without deduction of income-tax. The Crown, after receiving payment from the superior of income-tax on the casualty, assessed the vassal for income-tax on the rent. The vassal objected to the assessment, on the grounds (1) that the superior had received the whole rent for the year, and (2) that a casualty was of the same nature as feu-duty, for which deduction was allowed. The Court sustained the assessment.

DONALD MACGREGOR of Ardgartan, in the county of Argyll, appealed to the Income-Tax Commissioners against an assessment of £16, 9s. 6d., under schedule A of the Property and Income-Tax Acts, for the year 1888 to 1889. The assessment was based upon £659 as the annual value of Ardgartan. Macgregor's objection to payment was that he had, as a singular successor, been called upon to pay, and had paid, to his superior, the Duke of Argyll, "a casualty of superiority amounting to a full year's rent of the lands."

The Commissioners refused the appeal, on the ground that "the statute

Exchequer
Court.
2D DIVISION.
I.

contains no provision authorising any allowance from an assessment under schedule A in respect of the payment of a casualty of superiority." No. 80.

Macgregor took a case for appeal.

Feb. 8, 1889.

The facts were that Macgregor had paid the casualty to the superior without deduction of income-tax, the superior refusing to allow the deduction on the ground that he had been charged income-tax upon the casualty, and had paid it.

Macgregor v.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Argued for the appellant;—The assessment was a double assessment on the same fund, for the year's rent had already paid income-tax. The charge in question therefore fell to be vacated as an overcharge in the manner provided by the Taxes Management Act, 1880.* Further, the rents for the year, which formed the casualty, were not income or profit in the hands of the appellant, for he had been obliged to pay them to the superior. The appellant ought to be relieved on the principle of the case of Sharp,<sup>1</sup> in which a tax-collector was held not entitled to assess a proprietor of subjects, which were twice entered in a Valuation-roll, upon both entries. The case was provided for under rules 9 and 10 of the general rules under schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 60.† A casualty was a payment of the same nature as feu-duty. But even if it were not, the superior was proprietor in right of the rents for the year in which he obtained the casualty of a year's rent, and his feudal remedy—prior to 1874—was to enter into possession of the subject.<sup>2</sup> So, in the case of Allan,<sup>3</sup> the Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) said,—“The lands being in non-entry the superior is presumed to be in possession, and what the singular successor must render for his entry is the value of the beneficial enjoyment or income of the lands, for which it is the equivalent.” Such being the nature of the superior's right, the appellant, his vassal, could not be called on to pay income-tax out of the rents of the year, for they were not really his.

Argued for the Crown;—The casualty exacted by the Duke of Argyll from the appellant was merely the price payable for his entry. The appellant must pay income-tax on the rent of the year (unless he could shew a claim for exemption) just as he must pay income-tax on any other sum which became his, though he might have to pay it away to a creditor. There was no double charge on the sum any more than on any other sum which might become in the same year the income of one person, and, by his paying it away, might become the income of another. The appellant had not, in the words of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, sec. 60 (supra),

* The Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19), provides by sec. 60,—“Double Assessments.—Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the board that a person has been assessed more than once to the duties for the same cause and for the same year, they shall direct the whole or such part of such one or more of the assessments as appears to be an overcharge to be vacated, and thereupon the same shall be by such order vacated accordingly.”

<sup>1</sup> Sharp v. Latheron Parochial Board, July 12, 1883, 10 R. 1163.

† The Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, by sec. 60, rule 9, provides that the occupier of lands or heritages, being tenant, shall deduct the duty out of the rent, “and the occupier of lands charged on the amount of any composition, rent, or payment for tithes arising therefrom, and paying the said duties, shall be entitled to make the like deduction from such composition, rent, or payment on paying the same.”

Rule 10 provides,—“Where any such lands . . . are subject or liable to the payment of any rent-charge, . . . or any . . . quit-rent, feu-duty, teind-duty . . . ” the owner shall deduct the duty out of the rent-charge, feu-duty, &c.

<sup>2</sup> Hill v. Caledonian Railway Co., Dec. 21, 1877, 5 R. 386, Lord Deas at p. 390.

<sup>3</sup> Allan's Trustee v. Duke of Hamilton, Jan. 12, 1878, 5 R. 510.

No. 80.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Macgregor v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

"been assessed more than once to the duties for the same cause and for the same year." Express exemption must be made out, for the statute (sec. 159) provided that it should not be lawful to make any other deductions "than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act." That was the answer to the appellant's supposed right of relief by comparing the case to that of a feu-duty. The particular deductions allowable were specified in No. 5 of schedule A, and the case did not fall under any of the deductions there specified. The payment made by the appellant was a capital payment, and the Act of 1842 contained no provision for allowing such a payment to be deducted from the yearly value in assessing for income-tax.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE—LORD YOUNG absent) was delivered by LORD LEE.—The objection of the appellant is that the effect of the assessment imposed upon him is to charge doubly the rent for the year 1888 to 1889—that is, to charge it with duty, firstly, in his hands, and again in the hands of his superior, the Duke of Argyll.

This objection of the appellant is founded on the idea that a composition paid to a superior by a singular successor for his entry makes the superior the proprietor in right of the rents for the year in which the entry is obtained.

My opinion is that this is a fallacious view. I think that the composition is exigible not as rent, but as the price payable for entry, and that it is a mere accident that in some cases the amount of the price is measured by a year's rent. The vassal's right to the rents remains unimpaired so long as the superior is not in possession, and the superior could not uplift the rents without legal proceedings equivalent to a declarator of non-entry.

I therefore think that the decision of the Commissioners was right, and should be affirmed, with costs.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—D. CHOLE, Solicitor for Inland Revenue—Agents.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.*
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

THE STEEL COMPANY OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers (Respondents).—

D.-F. Mackintosh—Sir Charles Pearson—Salvesen.

TANCRED, ARROL, & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Jameson.

Contract—Specification—Construction—"30,000 tons more or less"—Words of estimate or expectancy.—A steel company made the following offer to T., A., & Co., the contractors for the construction of the Forth Bridge. "We hereby offer to supply the whole of the steel required by you for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices. . . . The estimated quantity of the steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less." T., A., & Co. wrote in reply,—"We hereby accept your offer to supply the whole of the steel required by us for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained." The terms and conditions in the offer were repeated, and among these the sentence, "The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less."

One of the conditions was that T., A., & Co. should have power to cancel the contract should their "contract for the erection of the bridge be from any cause determined," as provided in their principal contract with the Forth Bridge Railway Company, T., A., & Co. paying for the steel completed up to that date, and for any loss the steel company might sustain by the cancelment of the contract. No. 81.

Another condition was that delivery should be made in such quantities as might from time to time be required, extending over four years, it being understood that T., A., & Co. should furnish specifications, "so that deliveries shall be as nearly as possible made in equal monthly quantities over the period named." Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

In an action brought by the steel company against T., A., & Co. for declarator that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers the whole steel required in the construction of the bridge, and for damages in respect of the defenders having supplied themselves elsewhere with steel required for the bridge, the defenders pleaded that the contract was limited to the supply of 30,000 tons, more or less.

Held that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers the whole steel required for the bridge, the mention of the 30,000 tons being merely by way of estimate of the quantity to be required.

(VIDE previous report, Dec. 22, 1887, 15 R. 215.)

On 27th February 1883 the Steel Company of Scotland sent the following letter to Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company, contractors for the construction of the Forth Bridge,—“Gentlemen,—We hereby offer to supply the whole of the steel required by you for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices, viz. :—

Steel plates, per ton,	. . . . .	£10	0	0
Angles,	. . . . .	8	10	0
Tees, up to 12 united inches,	. . . . .	8	10	0
Tees, 12" x 6½" x 1",	. . . . .	12	0	0
Channels, 10" x 3",	. . . . .	10	10	0
Do., 12" x 4", or, 14" x 3",	. . . . .	14	0	0
Flats,	. . . . .	8	10	0
Rivet bars,	. . . . .	9	10	0"

Then followed a set of general conditions to the same effect as those after mentioned.

On 7th March 1883 Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company returned the following reply,—“Gentlemen,—We hereby accept your offer, dated 27th February, to supply the whole of the steel required by us for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices, viz.,” [the prices as above and the general conditions were then repeated]. Under head “General Conditions,” there were these stipulations,—“The work and material herein described or referred to is to be executed and supplied in strict accordance with the specification attached to our contract for the construction of the Forth Bridge, and to the entire satisfaction, in all respects, of the engineer for the time being of the Forth Bridge Railway Company, who shall have full liberty at all times to inspect, in person or by deputy, the entire process of manufacture, and to reject any of the material or portions of the work which in his judgment are inferior or unsatisfactory, or not in accordance with the said specification, and his decision is to be final and conclusive. . . .

“Upon the first day of each month you shall render us an account of the material delivered during the preceding month, and the amount found due by us thereon is to be paid by us to you in cash on or before the first Tuesday of the following month.

“We are to have the power to cancel this contract should our contract for the erection of the bridge be from any cause determined, as provided in our principal contract with the company, upon the condition that we

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
C.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

give you three calendar months' previous notice in writing, and supply you with specifications for those three months to keep you fairly employed for that time, and upon the further condition that we will pay to you the contract price for all steel you may complete according to specification at or before the expiry of such notice, whether the steel be delivered or not within that time.

"Further, we undertake to pay you the amount of loss (if any) you may sustain by the cancelment of your contract or materials (pig iron, ores, &c.), which you may have purchased before notice as against this contract.

"The steel to be manufactured at the works of the Steel Company of Scotland, Limited, and deliveries are to be made at such times and in such quantities as we may from time to time require, and to extend over four years, unless otherwise specially agreed, or unless the contract be cancelled as already provided, it being understood that we will furnish specifications so that deliveries shall be as nearly as possible made in equal monthly quantities over the period named.

"The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less."*

* The specification of the contract between Tancred, Arrol, & Company and the Forth Bridge Railway Company referred to was as follows:—

"CONTRACT No. 1.

(VIADUCT ACROSS THE FORTH.)

SPECIFICATION.

GENERAL CONDITIONS.

"3. The railway and works intended to be constructed, and included in this specification, consist of,—

"First, A continuous main double line, from a point marked about 440 yards south-east of the end of Newhalls Pier, in the parish of Dalmeny, to a point about 580 yards north of the end of West Battery Pier, in the parish of Dunfermline. Length one mile and a-half or thereabouts.

"Second, A viaduct of the same length, constructed of steel, iron, masonry, and concrete, with spans as follows, or thereabouts:—

"2 spans of 1700 feet.

2	"	675	"
15	"	168	"
5	"	25	"

"IRONWORK IN CAISSONS.

"51. The whole of the iron for the permanent and moveable caissons, &c. . . . The cutting edge of the caissons will be formed of steel-plates, or of a cast-steel curb, as may be determined by the engineer. . . .

"SUPERSTRUCTURE.

"53. The engineer will give instructions as the work proceeds as to the particular form, sectional area, and detail of the several struts, ties, girders, floors, parapets, bed-plates, holding down bolts, and other parts constituting the superstructure of the main spans and of the viaduct approach. . . .

"54. The contract sum must be based upon the assumption that the superstructure will include 42,000 tons of steel work in main spans, and 20 tons of cast steel in bed-plates and sundries, 3000 tons of wrought-iron in approach viaduct, 200 tons of cast-ironwork in bed-plates of approach viaduct and sundries, 2000 tons of old iron to weight ends of cantilevers,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles of permanent way for double line, with expansion joints complete, and asphalted side-walks with hand-rails, as shewn on the drawings, and any alterations or omissions in,

Following on the offer and acceptance, the Steel Company supplied No. 81. steel up to 31st May 1887 to the extent of 26,230 tons.

On 28th June 1887 the Steel Company raised an action in the Court of Session against Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company, concluding for declarator "that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge at present being constructed at Queensferry, and that at the prices and subject to the terms and conditions contained in offer by the pursuers, dated 27th February, and acceptance thereof by the defenders, dated 7th March 1883, and the defenders should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £100,000 sterling, or such other sum as shall be ascertained in the process to follow hereon, as the damages due to the pursuers in respect of the defenders having supplied themselves elsewhere with steel needed for the construction of the said bridge."

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

They averred;—(Cond. 5) "It has recently come to the knowledge of the pursuers that the defenders have been supplying themselves with steel for the purpose of being used in the construction of the said bridge from other sources over and above the said excepted amount of 12,000 tons, as to which no question is raised. This they have been doing at prices considerably under the contract prices above mentioned."

In their statement of facts the defenders averred (Stat. 4) that by the custom and practice of the iron and steel trade the contract libelled was regarded as for 30,000 tons of steel as an estimated quantity. That the words "more or less" were understood to mean, and were intended by parties to mean, that the quantity delivered should not exceed or fall short of the estimated quantity by more than 5 per cent. That the parties had since the contract was made acted on the footing that if the defenders took 30,000 tons of steel from the pursuers they might get any extras elsewhere as not being within the contract of the parties. In statements 5-9 inclusive they averred that they had, with the acquiescence of the pursuers, purchased steel from other companies, such as rivet bars (Stat. 5), steel for temporary purposes (Stat. 6), steel shoes for the caissons (Stat. 7), steel for the approach viaduct (Stat. 8). In statement 9 they averred that the pursuers had failed to deliver timeously the required steel, and that but for that delay the defenders would have taken from them by 7th March 1887 not less than 32,000 tons of steel.

On 26th November 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) allowed the defenders a proof of their averments contained in their statement of facts 4 to 9 inclusive, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation.

The defenders having reclaimed to the First Division of the Court, their Lordships, on 22d December 1887,<sup>1</sup> altered the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it allowed a proof of the averments of custom and practice of trade contained in the 4th article of the defenders' statement of facts; quoad ultra adhered to the interlocutor, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

or additions to, the above quantities will be estimated at schedule rates and be added to or deducted from the contract sum as the case may be. . . .

"MAIN SPANS.

"56. The main spans include two openings of 1700 feet centre to centre, and two of 675 feet spanned by continuous girders. . . .

"STEELWORK.

"70. The whole of the metal in the main spans will be steel, of a make specially approved of by the engineer, and no wrought or cast-iron will be used unless hereafter ordered by the engineer. . . ."

<sup>1</sup> 15 R. 215.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tannered,
Arrol, & Co.

On 21st February 1888 a proof was led, the import of which sufficiently appears in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra, and in the opinions of the Judges in the Inner-House.

On 2d March 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers, the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge at present being constructed at Queensferry in so far as such steel is or may be required in the construction of the four main spans of said bridge, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—The first question to be decided in this case is, What is the meaning of the contract between the parties which was constituted by the letters of offer and acceptance set forth upon record? The pursuers maintain that that contract is to be read literally according to its expression, and that it binds the pursuers to provide and the defenders to take the whole steel required by the defenders for the construction of the Forth Bridge at the prices specified. On the other hand, the defenders maintain that the contract is one for 30,000 tons of steel, more or less, but not a contract for the whole steel required for the bridge.

"The defenders aver that, according to the custom and practice of the steel trade, 'a contract for the supply of a quantity of manufactured iron or steel, in which the quantity to be supplied is described in general terms, and not definitely fixed, but which has a clause expressing the estimated quantity to be delivered and taken under said contract, is regarded and held to be a contract only for the estimated quantity so expressed.' According to the said custom and practice, the contract libelled is a contract for 30,000 tons of steel, more or less. When this case was debated before me in the Procedure Roll, I allowed the defenders a proof of this averment of custom, reading the defenders' statement as amounting to this, that the contract was framed in such a manner as technically to express (in the particular trade referred to) a contract for 30,000 tons, with a certain margin, more or less. The Court, however, on a reclaiming note, took a different view, holding that there was nothing technical about the contract or its expression requiring or admitting of interpretation by proof of custom; and accordingly the proof (so far) which I had allowed was refused. Dealing, therefore, now with the contract as one in no way technical, and one which is to be enforced according to the natural and ordinary meaning of its terms, I have no hesitation in holding that it binds the defenders to take from the pursuers the whole steel required for the construction of the Forth Bridge, 'less 12,000 tons of plates' ordered from another firm. This is a matter which does not admit of any argument; it is simply a question of what the contract says, and its words do not appear to me to have more than one meaning.

"The defenders, however, further aver that 'the parties have, since the contract was made between them, acted on the footing that if the defenders took 30,000 tons of steel from the pursuers they might get any extras elsewhere, as not being within the contract of the parties,' and in support of this averment the defenders condescend on several specific transactions. Of this averment, as well as of the alleged specific transactions, a proof was allowed, and has now been led, with the result that, in my opinion, the defenders have failed to establish their averment. The directors of the pursuers' company (so far as available at the proof), and their manager and secretary, distinctly deny that they ever acted in regard to the contract in question on the footing averred by the defenders; and the several specific transactions are explained satisfactorily, and in such a way as to shew that they were neither known to, nor regarded by, the pursuers as in any way infringing or modifying the contract.

"A word or two in regard to each of the specific transactions will be sufficient to indicate my view of the evidence bearing upon each.

"(1) In 1883 the pursuers supplied 3000 tons of steel to Messrs P. & W. McLellan, to be used by them in the construction of the viaduct approaches to the Forth Bridge. These viaduct approaches it had been originally intended to form of wrought-iron, but it was afterwards determined by the engineer that

On the 12th May the parties lodged a joint minute, in which they concurred in making, inter alia, the following statements:—“(1) That they should be constructed of steel. P. & W. M'Lellan had made a contract with the defenders for the iron work, and their contract was continued after the change to steel had been resolved upon. The steel obtained by them from the pursuers was for the purposes of this contract. The defenders rely on this transaction as shewing that the pursuers did not read their contract as one for the 'whole steel required for the Forth Bridge,' as they supplied steel to P. & W. M'Lellan in the knowledge that it was to be used in the construction of the bridge. The pursuers explain in reply that they did not regard the viaduct approaches as part of the 'bridge,' as that word was read by them in their contract. They regarded the bridge as the four main spans—nothing else. It may be that the contract in question, strictly read, covers the approach viaducts, and that the pursuers were wrong in law in giving it the limited construction which they did. They do not now wish to depart from that limited construction, rightly or wrongly; it is the view they have always held, and they are willing to abide by it. If they are right, then the transaction with P. & W. M'Lellan has no bearing upon the case; but if they are wrong, it does not avail the defenders. For if Mr Riley's explanation is an honest one (as I do not doubt it is), their supplying steel for what was believed not to fall within the pursuers' contract could not be regarded as a departure by them from their contract rights as understood by them. And it is worthy of notice that in 1883 no question had arisen between the parties as to the meaning of their contract. But the pursuers' position as regards their contract came out very distinctly when the second transaction took place, to which I shall now refer.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.

“(2) In 1884 the defenders ordered from the Clyde Rivet Company a large quantity of steel rivets. The Rivet Company applied to the pursuers to know at what price they would supply the necessary steel bars, informing the pursuers that the rivet bars were 'for Forth Bridge contract.' The pursuers at once communicated on this subject with the defenders, and afterwards there was a meeting between the defender Mr Arrol and the manager and secretary of the pursuers' company. What took place at that meeting appears from the proof. Mr Arrol says that he maintained that it was no matter to the pursuers where he got his rivet bars (although they formed a specific item in the pursuers' contract), provided he took from the pursuers the 'contract quantity' of 30,000 tons of steel in all, which he said he would do. Mr Riley and Mr M'Lellan say, on the other hand, that 30,000 tons, as 'contract quantity,' was not mentioned; that Mr Arrol said he had ordered rivets, not rivet bars, and was not therefore violating the contract; that his partners wished rivets ordered and not rivet bars; and that the pursuers should let the matter pass, as there would more steel be required than was originally expected, which would fall to be supplied by the pursuers under their contract. This meeting, and what took place at it, having been reported to the directors of the pursuers' company, it was agreed that they should waive their rights in reference to the rivet bars, in order to get on smoothly with Mr Arrol.

“I do not hesitate to accept, in this conflict of evidence, the statements of Mr Riley and Mr M'Lellan rather than the statement of Mr Arrol. It is, besides, the statement of two witnesses against the statement of one—the two having no pecuniary interest in the matter, the one having great interest. At the very lowest, it is impossible to hold on such evidence that the defenders have proved (and the onus lies on them) that in the transaction about the rivets the pursuers acted upon a reading or construction of their contract such as the defenders aver they acted upon.

“(3) The steel for the shoes of the caissons stands in the same position as regards the steel sold to P. & W. M'Lellan for the viaduct approaches, and I need not say more on this transaction.

“(4) The fourth transaction was steel sold for 'temporary purposes,' and it is admitted by the defenders that the evidence on this matter is not very strong in support of their view. I think the evidence is distinctly against them. The steel sold for temporary purposes was sold by the pursuers to the defenders on

Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

the defenders had ordered outside the contract, and have used or will use for the permanent work of the four main spans of the Forth Bridge not less than 5000 tons of steel, viz., 2400 tons plates, 2000 tons angles, 300 tons tees up to 12 united inches, and 300 tons flats. (2) That, assuming the previous interlocutors in the cause to be well founded, the pursuers are entitled to damages in respect of said 5000 tons. (3) That the measure of damages in respect of said 5000 tons shall be held to be the difference between £6, 5s. per ton overhead and the contract prices for the different classes of steel specified in article 1 hereof. That the amount of damages represented by this admission is £14,850. (4) That the pursuers' claim in respect of all further quantities of steel already used, or which may be used by the defenders for the said four spans, and their whole rights as to the assessment of damages in respect thereof, are reserved for subsequent determination, the defenders also reserving their whole pleas and rights thereanent, but it is agreed that the 5000 tons in article 1 shall be held to be the steel of the different classes mentioned, first taken by the defenders outside the contract."

the statement of the latter that it was not to be used in the permanent structure, and the correspondence about this steel distinctly bears that it was 'not to be placed against contract, being intended to be used merely for temporary purposes,' and was at the defenders' request advised, priced, and invoiced 'so as to keep them distinct from the bridge construction.'

"The defenders relied very much on the terms of the minute* of the pursuers' directors, dated 23d September 1885. I agree with Mr M'Lellan in thinking that that minute is 'unfortunate' in its expression; but I also agree with him as regards the explanation to be given of it, and which is given by him. I will only say further with regard to this minute and the explanation, that it appears to me that the pursuers would never have ventured to approach Mr Arrol with the proposal that he should pay for steel 'at our contract prices for the Forth Bridge,' if they had been asking him for orders which their contract did not cover. The prices of steel had by September 1885 fallen so much below what they were in 1883, when 'the contract prices for the Forth Bridge' were fixed, that any such proposal would only have made the pursuers ridiculous, as Mr Arrol would not have been slow to shew them. As regards what took place at the meeting on 2d October 1885, I again prefer the evidence of Mr Riley to the evidence with which he is in conflict. I regard the minute* of 7th October 1885 as an honest statement of what took place at the meeting on the 2d. Further, I accept as correct the evidence of Mr Riley and Mr M'Lellan as to the meeting held on 29th April 1887.

"On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the defenders have failed to establish the averments on which their fourth and fifth pleas are based, and that these pleas ought therefore to be repelled."

* [The minutes to which his Lordship referred were these:—"23d September 1885.—Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company asked that the company accept bills occasionally in payment of their account and bear one-half the charge of discounting. It was decided that Mr Riley wait on them and agree to do this, provided they agree to give us the order for any steel they may require over our contract quantity and at our contract prices for the Forth Bridge." "7th October 1885.—Mr Riley reported that he had seen Messrs Arrol and Philips, of Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company, and had arranged with them that this company would, when desired by their firm, draw upon them in payment of their account, and only one-half of the costs of discounting to be charged.

"In consideration of this concession these gentlemen agreed that our contract with their firm should be taken as covering the whole of the steel required for the completion of the Forth Bridge, except that covered by the contract with the Landores Siemens Steel Company, which is for 12,000 tons plates.

"Messrs Arrol and Philips pledged themselves to carry out this arrangement, but stated that they did not think it judicious to embody it in a formal letter."]

On 13th June 1888 the Lord Ordinary interponed authority to the joint minute, and in respect thereof, decerned against the defenders for £14,850, and found the defenders liable in expenses.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The reference to the 30,000 tons of steel occurred in identical language in both the offer and acceptance, and that was against the idea that it was there merely for information. The quantity of the steel was amongst the very conditions of the contract, and the language used with reference to it, viz., “the understanding is,” &c. was language appropriate to define obligations, and to signify a term of a contract. The words “more or less” were words used to leave a latitude, but a latitude only needed where the parties were bargaining.<sup>1</sup> It was not a question of repugnancy at all. Instead of defining the quantity hard and fast the term of the contract was constituted by a condition inserted into both documents. Both parties (and most of all the pursuers) would have to know beforehand pactionally what was the quantity of steel to be supplied. The pursuers would never have undertaken an absolutely blind contract. Then, again, the clause as to deliveries made this necessary. The word “understanding” was used every day in mercantile documents as “agreement.” The clause should have read “to supply the whole steel which we concur in contracting shall be required for the bridge, 30,000 tons.” That was a reasonable consensus in idem for something more or less indefinite. There was no general rule of law to be deduced from the cases, which were each decided on their own special circumstances, but the cases cited below favoured the defenders’ view.<sup>2</sup> The case of Gwillim v. Daniel<sup>3</sup> was different from this. There the subject of the sale and contract was notoriously a by-product, and the Court construed the words, “say from 1000 to 1200 gallons” as words of expectancy, on the ground that it would be unreasonable to expect the seller to make so much of the product as would be necessary to produce the exact quantity of the by-product. In M’Connel v. Murphy<sup>4</sup> the words “say about 600 red spars” were held to be words of expectancy, and not of warranty, but only because it was held impossible to construe strictly a contract by a timber merchant for his winter’s cutting. The contract, then, on every principle of legal construction, being one to supply 30,000 tons of steel, with a percentage latitude covered by the words “more or less,” the second question was, what parts of the bridge did it include? This was of importance, looking to the view taken of the specification by the pursuers at the proof. They had now broken the universality and integrity of the contract which they maintained on record. Under stress of the proof adduced by the defenders that they had, with the acquiescence of the pursuers, purchased steel from other parties for certain portions of the bridge, they maintained that what was contained in the specification and imported into this contract was merely the superstructure of the four main spans. This was not so, however, for it included the approach viaducts, the rivets, and the cutting edge of the caissons. The Lord Ordinary had erred in his view of the proof. The defenders had proved that they had, with the acquiescence of the pursuers, bought steel for these parts of the bridge as well as steel for temporary purposes from parties other than the pursuers. Argued for the pursuers;—(1) As to the construction of the docu-

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arnol, & Co.

<sup>1</sup> Benjamin on Sale, p. 499, 4th ed.

<sup>2</sup> Morris v. Levison, Feb. 10, 1876, L. R., 1 C. P. Div. 155; Leeming and Another v. Smith, Jan. 17, 1851, L. R., 16 Ad. and Ellis, 275.

<sup>3</sup> Gwillim v. Daniel, 1835, 5 Tyr. Exch. Rep. 644.

<sup>4</sup> April 22, 1873, L. R., 5 P. C. 203.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arol, & Co.

ments which embodied the contract.—Had the offer and acceptance stood alone, it was not suggested that there could be two constructions. It was just a covering contract to embrace the whole steel required for the bridge, and made more emphatic by the deductions in respect of the previous contract of 12,000 plates with another party. The specification shewed clearly that what was covered by it was the steel required for the superstructure of the four main spans, and for nothing else. To this the pursuers had consistently confined their claim at the proof. It was said, however, that the natural definition of the subject of the contract was overridden and altered by the expression, “the estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less.” Surely such a cardinal alteration would have been found among the terms and conditions of the contract, and not near the end of the deed immediately before the clause of arbitration. It was just as if it was sought to qualify the dispositive clause in a disposition by something at the end of the deed before the clause of registration. The alteration was an impossible one for the parties to adopt. It was highly improbable that the defenders would tie themselves down to a contract for 30,000 tons of steel when the pursuers were to give them “more or less” as they required, and when, according to the statement on record, the work contracted for by the defenders was one of great magnitude, and the engineer had full power to increase or diminish, &c. The word “estimated” merely meant “presently estimated.” It was true the word belonged to the category of contract, e.g., in a building contract “estimated price” meant a calculated fixed price, but there was no analogy between that case and the present. In a sale of land boundaries and measurements were given, and then an estimated acreage or rent was adjected, but the latter could not override the boundaries or the measurements by which the parties had contracted. The words, then, were words of “expectation,” and necessary to the working out of the clause for monthly deliveries and the clause of cancellation, the object of which was to protect the Steel Company if there was a stoppage of the works. The cases bore out that there was no general rule as to the effect to be given to a specification of quantity adjected to a general contract, but in the cases cited infra<sup>1</sup> it had been held that the quantity was only inserted as an estimate of what would be required. The case of Leemings was very special. The only force which could be given to the words, “not less than say 100,” was that at least 100 should be given. In the case of Morris the Court, in construing the words, “say about 1600 tons,” proceeded upon the view that the owner of the vessel must be dealt with as a person who knew the carrying capacity of his own vessel, and that it would have been unreasonable to require the person who was to provide the cargo in ignorance of this, to deliver more than the quantity estimated as necessary by the owner of the vessel himself. The contract, then, upon a sound construction, and read in the light of the specification, was a contract to supply all the steel required for the superstructure of the four main spans of the bridge. But (2) assuming that the contract was ambiguous, and required construction from the actings of parties, it was not enough for the defenders to prove that the pursuers had adopted an erroneous construction. They must shew that they had adopted the particular construction for which the defenders contended. The Lord Ordinary was right in his views upon the evidence on the subject.

<sup>1</sup> Gwillim v. Daniel, supra, 5 Tyr. Exch. 644; M'Connel v. Murphy, supra, L. R., 5 P. C. 203; Brawley v. United States, Oct. 1877, 6 Otto's Amer. Rep. 168; North British Oil and Candle Co. v. Swann, May 27, 1868, 6 Macph. 835, 40 Scot. Jur. 444.

At advising,—

No. 81.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have now before us the evidence which has been led under the authority of Lord Trayner's interlocutor of the 26th of November 1887, as modified by our interlocutor of the 22d of December 1887, and with the additional light thus afforded we now resume consideration of the terms of the contract between the parties.

Feb. 3, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

The offer which was made by the pursuers and the acceptance by the defenders are precisely in the same terms, that is to say, the one is just an echo of the other, both being expressed in the very same words, making allowance for the difference of expression arising from the parties being different. And therefore it is quite plain that the terms of this contract, although it is expressed in letters, must have been the subject of very careful and anxious consideration between the parties, and that is not surprising, because it was a contract of a very heavy kind involving great interest and great risks both on the one side and on the other. The contract is for the supply of steel work, the pursuers of the action being steel manufacturers, and the question comes to be what is the steel work that falls under the contract, or, in other words, what is meant when the one party offers to supply "the whole of the steel work required by you for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates," and the other in the same words accepts of that offer.

There seems very little room for construction or doubt in regard to the words that I have quoted, "the whole steel required for the Forth Bridge." But there are considerations arising from other terms in this contract that require to be taken into view, in order to understand what is meant by the term "required for the Forth Bridge."

Now, the first observation that occurs to one is that in specifying the prices which are to be charged for each kind of steel we get a view of what sort of steel—what form of steel work—is intended to be supplied under the contract. There are enumerated steel plates at £10 per ton, angles at £8, 10s. per ton, and in like manner so much a ton for tees of a certain size, for tees of another size, for channels and for channels of another size, for flats, and for rivet bars. Therefore it is natural to suppose that the kind of steel—by which I mean the form of the steel—that is to be supplied for the purpose of this contract consists of these different things—steel plates, angles, tees, channels, flats, and rivet bars.

Now, the next observation that occurs to one is that there are immediately after this enumeration of the forms of steel work that is to be supplied certain general conditions, and the first of these appears to me to be very material, "the work and material therein described or referred to is to be executed and supplied in strict accordance with the specification attached to our contract" (that is, Tancred, Arrol, & Company's contract) "for the construction of the Forth Bridge, and to the entire satisfaction in all respects of the engineer for the time being of the Forth Bridge Railway Company, who shall have full liberty at all times to inspect in person or by deputy the entire process of manufacture, and to reject any of the material or portions of the work which in his judgment are inferior or unsatisfactory or not in accordance with the said specification, and his decision is to be final." Now, this reference to the specification applicable to the contract between the defenders and the Forth Bridge Railway Company is extremely important, because it shews very clearly upon the face of it what is the steel work required according to the terms of that

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

specification for the construction of the Forth Bridge. It shews, quite in accordance with the enumeration of the forms of steel which I have already referred to, that the steel required is just the steel that has been priced in the contract between the two parties before us. It shews that that steel work is to be used exclusively for the construction of the superstructure of the four main arches of the bridge, and has nothing to do with any other part of the bridge whatever. There is just one exception to that statement which it is necessary to notice in passing, and that is that in the specification, in speaking of the caissons upon which the main pillars of the bridge are to stand, it provides that "the cutting edge of the caissons will be formed of steel plates or of a cast-steel curb, as may be determined by the engineer." Now, that occurs under the head "iron work in caissons," and therefore the steel there mentioned is a mere incident of the very heavy iron work required for the caissons. It is the cutting edge of the caissons, by which I understand from the evidence we have had the lowest part of the caissons,—which cuts into the ground below water,—and to say that that is a part of the steel work required for the Forth Bridge is I think a misconception altogether of that part of the specification. That is not dealt with in the specification as steel work. It is dealt with as iron work, the edging of steel being a mere incident. Therefore I return to what I said before, that the steel, which, according to the specification in the contract between the defenders and the Forth Bridge Railway Company, is required, is steel that is to be applied exclusively in the construction of the superstructure of the four main arches of the bridge.

Now, by these means we are enabled to fix, I think, with precision and accuracy what is meant by the words of the contract between the parties before us when they say that the pursuers are to supply the whole of the steel required for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons. It means, and can mean, at the date that these letters were written, nothing but the steel work specified in the specification of the principal contract. Now, the words, "the whole of the steel required" are certainly very emphatic. It is difficult to understand that the parties could have meant something less than the whole of the steel which is according to the specification of the principal contract necessary for the construction of the bridge. Surely the words "whole of the steel" would never have been used unless that was in the contemplation of the parties. But if these words are emphatic, I think they are rendered even still more emphatic by the exception which is introduced, "with the exception of 12,000 tons of plates," which, as we learn, had been already secured by the defenders and paid for to another steel company altogether. It is to be the whole steel that is required by the contract with the Forth Bridge Company less 12,000 tons, but less nothing else.

Now that being so, I think the contract could not have admitted of the slightest doubt as to its meaning if it had not been for some words which are used at the very end of the conditions to which I have already referred, and upon which indeed the whole argument of the parties turns. The words are these—"The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less." Now, it is contended that that limits the words of obligation to supply and of obligation to take to 30,000 tons or thereabout. It appears to me that these are not words of contract at all, but the expression of an understanding: and it was certainly most natural and convenient that there should be some such understanding between the parties. A contract of this kind is of course a very serious one, and it is very difficult to foresee what might be the extent of the furnishings likely to be required under its leading words. It is a very extensive and a very large contract, and of a most unusual and novel kind; and therefore in the course of the communications between the parties which must have preceded this very carefully expressed letter and answer, it would of course naturally come to be considered what about the quantities expected? The pursuers would naturally say—"We should like to have some idea of what you are likely to require"; and the answer to that is—"Well, 30,000 tons, more or less." Does that limit the obligation in the principal part of the contract? I think not. I think these are mere words of expectation or understanding or estimate, but certainly do not limit the very emphatic words with which the contract begins. There is another reason why this expression was introduced in the place where it is, because it is immediately preceded by this condition—"The steel to be manufactured at the works of the Steel Company, and deliveries are to be made at such times and in such quantities as we" [that is, Tancred, Arrol, & Company] "may from time to time require, and to extend over four years, unless otherwise specially agreed, or unless the contract be cancelled as already provided, it being understood that we will furnish specifications so that deliveries shall be as nearly as possible made in equal monthly quantities over the period named." If these equal monthly quantities were to be supplied according to the demands of the defenders over a period of four years, it certainly was all the more necessary that the pursuers should have some notion of what kind of quantities were to be required each month, or what was likely to be the total quantity required to be delivered in equal portions over four years. If the parties had gone blindly into this contract, not knowing whether the quantities ultimately to be required might be 30,000 or 300,000 tons, it would have been a very awkward position for both parties. And therefore it is that they come to an understanding as to what is probably to be required during that period. If the pursuers had not had this hint given them as to what they were to provide for, they would have been placed in the greatest possible difficulty in managing their works. Their works might require to be kept in more or less constant operation for the purpose of this contract than they would otherwise be if the quantity were larger or smaller; and very possibly, in order to fulfil their obligations under this contract they might require additional machinery in their works or even an extension of the works themselves if the quantities had been of such an amount as to require that that should be done. And therefore they naturally said, "What quantity is it that you expect us to deliver within these four years?" And the answer is, "The estimate, the understanding"—that is all, an estimate or an understanding—"is 30,000 tons." I come without any hesitation to the conclusion that these words do not in any way limit the legal obligation in this contract, and that the pursuers are entitled to supply and the defenders are bound to take the whole quantity of steel required by the specification of the principal contract to be supplied for the purpose of constructing the Forth Bridge; but that is limited in the specification to the superstructure of the four main spans.

Now, when the parties came into Court, it seems to me that they were both in the wrong. The claim made by the pursuers was a great deal too large, and quite unjustified by the contract as I have now construed it, because they came into Court demanding that they should have the right to supply under their contract not merely the steel which within the meaning of the contract was required by the specification of the principal contract for the construction of the

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

four main spans, but also all the steel which by subsequent alteration of the principal contract had come to be used for portions of the bridge other than the four main spans. And that, I think, was an entirely unfounded claim. The defenders, on the other hand, have maintained throughout that they are not bound to take from the pursuers the steel requisite for the four main spans of the bridge as specified in the specification of the principal contract, and therein they were wrong.

There is only one part of the case remaining to be noticed, and that is, that the defenders contend that the pursuers have by their actings interpreted this contract in a sense different from that for which they now contend, and that their actings must be taken to override the terms of the contract, and to shew that the true meaning of the parties, whatever the words used may be, was different from that which I have now explained.

Now, I think this attempt upon the part of the defenders has proved quite a failure. In the first place, in regard to the supplying of steel for other parts of the bridge, that would have been a very good answer if the true construction of the contract in itself had been that the pursuers were entitled to supply all the steel that might be required for any part of the bridge according to the altered contract afterwards made between the defenders and the Forth Bridge Company. But that not being the meaning of the contract as I construe it, and the meaning of the contract plainly being that the steel to be supplied is limited to that which is necessary for the superstructure of the four main spans, this fact of the defenders taking steel for the other parts of the bridge from other manufacturers, with the knowledge and without the objection of the pursuers, only shews that at that time the pursuers were construing their contract a great deal more correctly than they did when they afterwards came into Court. Then there was another matter regarding the steel for temporary purposes. I cannot conceive that the fact that that was supplied and taken by the defenders from other dealers than the pursuers could possibly have been objected to by the pursuers as being a departure from the contract which they had made as we now construe it, because they are not under any obligation to supply, and the defenders are not under any obligation to take under the contract before us, any steel for temporary purposes. Then there is another matter in which it is said the contract has been departed from as now construed by the pursuers, and that is in regard to the matter of rivet bars. Rivet bars was one of the things specially within the contract, and were to be supplied at £9, 10s. a ton. Now, it certainly is the case that the defenders were desirous, in place of receiving delivery of rivet bars, to purchase rivets in a manufactured state—not merely the materials for making rivets, but manufactured rivets ready to be used. There was a good deal of communing between the parties on this subject, and there is a good deal of conflicting evidence about it. I am disposed to take the view that the Lord Ordinary has done in preferring the evidence for the pursuers on this subject to that of the defenders. But really I do not think it of very much consequence to determine exactly which of them is giving the more precise and accurate account of the communings on this subject, because it is, to my mind, perfectly obvious that the pursuers were not disposed to press this matter, seeing that the defenders were very anxious to have their rivets direct from the rivet-maker instead of taking the rivet bars from the Steel Company. They say, and say most naturally—"It would not do for us to quarrel with the defenders on this matter; our interests are bound up with theirs in this great contract in such a way that nothing could be more inexpedient than that we should give them any cause of No. 81.

 quarrel, and therefore by all means let us yield this point rather than have any question about it." It is impossible to say that that is an acting of the parties Feb. 8, 1889.
 which is sufficient to take off the plain meaning of the contract itself, and to Steel Co. of shew that the words used are not used in their natural sense, but in some dif- Scotland v.
 ferent sense altogether. Tancred,
 Arrol, & Co.

Lastly—for I think this is the last point—reference is made to certain minutes of the pursuers which seem to imply that they were not of the mind that they were entitled to supply the whole of the steel work of the bridge, and that they would like very much to have their contract so construed and extended as to include the whole. The minutes, so far as I see, were not communicated to the defenders, and therefore could not have misled them in any way, and the verbal communication which the pursuers say was made to the defenders on this subject, and which formed the subject of an agreement or arrangement, is entirely denied by the defenders. They deny that there was any such communication or any such arrangement. Now, is this an acting by which the contract can be construed? I think not. It is not an acting of the parties at all. I can quite understand what was in the minds of the pursuers, or some of the directors—that in consequence of that little controversy about the rivets and the rivet bars they would like to have had some very plain assurance that no other question of that kind should be raised. The cause—the beginning of the whole affair—was that the defenders had proposed an alteration on the terms of payment under the contract, that they were to give short bills instead of cash as stipulated in the contract, and the pursuers very naturally thought, "Well, this is a very good opportunity for requiring a little concession from the other side, and we should like to have a positive assurance that there is to be no more question about our right to deliver the whole of the steel required." That seems to have been the origin of the thing, but I really do not attach any importance to this point, for the reason I have already stated, that I think it is not an acting of the parties that can construe the contract. The proof therefore, it appears to me, which was allowed does not contribute to throw any material light on the question before us, and I think we are just driven back to the construction of the contract itself, coupled, however, with the specification of the principal contract, which is directly imported by reference into the contract between the pursuers and the defenders for the purpose of shewing what are the obligations laid upon Tancred, Arrol, & Company as to the use of steel in the construction of the bridge, and upon that question I have already expressed an opinion and do not require to say anything further on the matter. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, that is to say, to the interlocutor of 2d March 1888, which, of course, was brought up along with the last interlocutor which is expressly reclaimed against, and if we adhere to the interlocutor of 2d March 1888 it is quite unnecessary for us to consider anything further than that, because it is matter of arrangement between the parties by the minute which is before us, that if that interlocutor of the 2d March is well founded and is to stand, then the measure of the damage and the amount of damage is settled by agreement.

LORD MURK.—I also concur in thinking that the Lord Ordinary has come to a sound conclusion upon the main question brought before him, and which he decided on 2d March. I have very little to add to what your Lordship has so

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

clearly stated as to the meaning of this contract. It appears to me that the words of the offer and acceptance are in themselves very clear and distinct. The steel to be furnished was the whole steel required for the Forth Bridge, and if these words had stood alone they could scarcely have given rise to any dispute. But it is said there are certain words in the latter part of the offer which qualify and control these expressions, and these are the words—"The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less." It is said that by these words the leading provision of "the whole steel" is controlled. I cannot adopt that construction. The nature of this contract, the very expensive character of the works that were to be put up, and the time that was required to carry the work to a conclusion, would naturally lead the parties who furnished so large a proportion of iron or steel to ask to have a general idea as to the quantity that might be required in order to enable them to go on with the work, and I think therefore that these words were merely put in as a statement of the general understanding of the parties as to the probable amount of steel that would be required for the bridge. "Thirty thousand tons, more or less," evidently means that in this particular contract there might be less than 30,000 required, or there might be more than 30,000 required. That is pretty clear reading these two passages alone, but when we come to look at the terms of the specification it is made quite distinct that the whole steel required for the Forth Bridge meant the whole steel to be used in the formation of the four main spans of the bridge, because it is upon that part of the work alone that at that time steel was to be required. I think, therefore, the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken, and which the pursuers themselves have taken since the case was last before us, is that the fair meaning of the contract was the whole steel required for the erection of the superstructure of these four main spans. On these general grounds I concur in what your Lordship has stated with reference to the effect of the proof upon the reading of the contract. The parties were allowed a proof that certain actings of the pursuers in this matter shewed that they construed the contract differently. I have gone over the evidence carefully on the four points that the Lord Ordinary has dealt with, viz., the approaches to the four main spans, the rivets, the caissons, and the temporary purposes, and I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion on all these four points, and I have nothing to add.

LORD SHAND.—The words of this contract which have raised any question of difficulty are contained in the conditions appended to the offer and acceptance respectively relating to the quantity of steel to be furnished by the Steel Company, the pursuers, to the defenders, and they are these,—“The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less.” And upon the construction of the contract the question to be determined is, whether these are words of expectation and estimate only, or are words of contract which fix a quantity with a certain percentage up or down, “more or less,” which of course could not be taken to be of unlimited amount. I had not the advantage of being present at the first discussion which took place on this case, when your Lordships had to consider the contract, and allowed a proof which has now been taken, and which has formed the subject of much of the debate, and I confess that throughout a considerable part of the argument, which has taken place under the present reclaiming note, I was in considerable doubt as to the true effect to be given to the words I have quoted. I thought it a question of very considerable difficulty whether these words were not to be interpreted as words of contract, and the consideration which weighed with me in feeling that difficulty was this, that the contract was one involving very large liability upon the part of the contractors the Steel Company, who had agreed to supply the whole steel for this bridge. It seemed to me that it was not a likely thing that dealing with a great undertaking of this kind they would enter into a contract without any limit, which might be a protection to them against claims involving very serious liability. Of course in making a contract like this they had to buy the quantity of steel that was likely to be required, so as to be ready to supply it, unless indeed they wanted to run the risk of a very speculative market—the iron market, which, as one knows, has fluctuations of very considerable amount. They had also to arrange for labour in connection with the large amount of work to be done. It might even be, as your Lordship has suggested, that they might have had to extend their works. If they had proceeded to purchase a very large quantity of material on a mere rough estimate of what might be required, and if afterwards a great deal of that material had been dispensed with, they might have suffered very serious loss. On the other hand, if they purchased a very limited quantity, and if a much larger quantity was afterwards demanded, they might have had to make large purchases of material at great loss after the market for iron had risen. This led me to think that it was a serious question to be determined, whether these words had been intended to express a matter of mere expectation or estimate, or were not rather really inserted as words of contract for the purpose of protection to the pursuers. But the result of the argument, and particularly the closing argument submitted on behalf of the respondents in the reclaiming note, has satisfied me that the construction of the contract is as your Lordship has explained it.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.

In the first place, the offer itself is perfectly distinct apart from the conditions. It is an offer to supply the whole steel required for the bridge less a certain specified quantity, while what is said to have the effect of limiting that obligation occurs not in the body of the contract itself, where one would naturally expect it, but in one of the series of conditions appended to the contract. The first of these conditions imports to a certain effect the specification attached to the contract for the construction of the bridge. In regard to that matter, I am bound to say that looking at the reference to the specification in the conditions as a reference I think only in regard to the nature and quality of the "work and material" to be executed and supplied, I am not prepared to say that on the sound construction of the contract the Steel Company were not entitled to supply the steel for that part of the bridge which has been called the viaduct, and that part of the steel which was also required for the feet of the caissons for the support of the four spans, to which your Lordship has referred. I think that was a question attended with considerable difficulty, and I am not satisfied that the reference to the general specification would have controlled the words "the Forth Bridge" in the earlier part of this contract so as to limit their meaning to the superstructure of the four spans. But I think it unnecessary to form any final opinion on that matter, because as parties proceeded it was made clear that they were both agreed in acting on the footing that the steel furnished, as falling under the contract, was the steel for the superstructure of the four spans alone. It has been made clear upon the proof that that was the view upon which the Steel Company, at least, were willing to act, and of course the defenders, with a falling market for iron, would be quite ready to close with that view, because it

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

saved them a large sum of money. I have only said this in passing, because I was considering the effect of the words of estimate or words of contract as to the quantity of the steel. Now, in regard to these words, it appears to me that we find in the other conditions of the contract a key to their presence where they are. It might very well be said that there is no need for putting in such words as these, "the estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less," in these documents in framing a contract, if they are to be used as mere words of expectation or estimate of what would likely be required, for this might have been done as well in conversation between the parties, or in a separate letter after or about the time the contract was concluded. The strength of the defenders' argument lies in this, I think, that this estimate is not given in conversation or in a separate letter, but that it is in the contract. We have to find, if we can, a reason for these words being in the contract, and yet for not giving them the full force of words of contract fixing a contract quantity. Now, I think that looking at these conditions we have a sufficient explanation of the presence of these words there. One of the reasons your Lordship has fully dealt with, viz., that arising from the immediately preceding clause in regard to the deliveries under the contract. I think these words receive an appropriate meaning, and have an appropriate place in these conditions, because something had to be arranged in reference to the measure of the deliveries, and the company were fairly entitled to get an estimate which would guide them in their preparations as to what amount of deliveries would be required each year and each month. Having got this estimate they would be entitled, I think, to found upon it in the event of unreasonable demand for delivery having been made, by saying there must be some check on that, and we have that check in this clause. But, as was pointed out by the Dean of Faculty, there is a more important consideration to account for the words of quantity, and that is the earlier provision in the deed containing the clause that Tancred, Arrol, & Company should be entitled to cancel the contract in the event of their principal contract being cancelled. In that case there would have been a very grievous hardship on the Steel Company if they had made all their arrangements. The Steel Company provided that in that case the defenders should undertake to pay them the loss which might be sustained on materials which the company might have purchased before notice as against the contract. The purpose of putting in the estimated quantity was, as I take it, for the protection of the Steel Company, and I cannot doubt that if the company had purchased 30,000 tons of material under this contract, and if a month or two afterwards the contract had been brought to an end, they might have appealed to the clause of expectation or estimate, and said that before the notice they had purchased 30,000 tons of material and they were entitled to do so because of that estimate. I think when we examine the contract as a whole, this case is in a position which distinguishes it from the previous cases that have occurred in England or in America, because we have in the agreement itself a special reason which accounts for the words being inserted, and a special ground, therefore, for the presence of such words of estimate in the contract. They would have a clear bearing on any questions of damage which might arise, and on the claims in reference to the time of delivery under the contract. And so I have come to have a clear opinion that the sound construction of the contract is as I have stated.

I may add that this view is strongly corroborated and supported by the decisions to which reference was made in the law of England and of America.

There were two classes of cases referred to. The first were cases entirely, I think, of contract of purchase and sale; and in all of these the view contended for by the pursuers received effect in these Courts. The first of these was Guillim v. Daniel. There the contract was for all the naphtha manufactured by A B, say from 1000 to 1200 gallons per month during two years. It was held that although the quantity supplied was much smaller than had been contemplated—there were 7000 gallons of a deficiency in nine months—yet as the manufacturer had supplied all the naphtha which he had made, that was sufficient, and that the words referring to quantity were mere words of expectation. So again in M'Connal v. Murphy, where the contract was all the spars manufactured by M'Connal, say about 600 of a certain size, it turned out that there were only 496; but there again the Court held that as all that had been manufactured were supplied, that was sufficient, and that the other words were words of expectation merely. The third case of the same class was the case of Brawley, in the American Court, and there the same principle received effect. The quantity of cords of wood expected to be supplied in that case was stated at 880 cords more or less, but it was qualified “as shall be determined to be necessary” by a third party named or pointed out. The quantity ultimately ordered was only 40 cords or some small quantity. But there again the principle received effect that the quantity mentioned was to be regarded as a mere estimate, and the ruling words, “as shall be determined to be necessary,” were held to be operative. So here we cannot hold that the words referring to quantity are to control the more important words “the whole of the steel required for the bridge,” more particularly as we find in the contract a special explanation of the use of these words in the clause referred to. The cases quoted on the other side do not, I think, affect the authority of the three cases just noticed. They were special. One was the case of Leeming. The words there were that the party should take such a quantity not less than say 100, and the only possible force that could be given to the words was that at least 100 should be given. The only other case referred to was Morris v. Levison, and there there was this specialty, that an owner of a vessel stipulated for a full cargo at a foreign port, but he added the words, “say about 1100 tons,” and the Court, proceeding upon the view that the owner of the vessel must be presumed to know the carrying capacity of his own vessel, must be taken to have been contented with 1100 tons if he got that when dealing with one who did not know the carrying capacity of the vessel, and who had to provide the cargo in ignorance. It was held that it would be unreasonable to require the party who was to present the cargo to have ready in a foreign port more than the quantity which the owner of the ship himself estimated as necessary. On these grounds I am of opinion that both on the special terms of the contract, and on the authorities, it must be construed in the way your Lordship proposes—that the Steel Company were entitled to provide the whole steel for this bridge in the limited sense of the word bridge as applying to the superstructure of the four main spans.

As to the proof which has been taken, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that it can have no substantial effect on the question to be now decided. If the meaning of the contract be clear, any proof as to the actings of the parties could not have the effect of changing that meaning. If, however, it could be made out that though the meaning of the contract was clear, the actings of the parties shewed unequivocally that they agreed to make a new contract in some

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

particular, or to modify its original terms, then the actings might have that effect. The proof should no doubt receive effect to this extent, that if it appears that the Steel Company had agreed to abandon their right to supply steel for certain parts of the bridge which they had the right to supply, and Tancred, Arrol, & Company acquiesced in this, so far the contract would be modified; and if there be difficulty, as I think there is, in the question whether this contract would not, if strictly construed, include the steel for the whole bridge, the proof then is very material, because it shews that whatever might be the decision of the Court on that question, both parties have by their actings agreed that the supply shall be limited to the superstructure of the four spans. I am not sure that the Steel Company in their actings have ever contended for anything more, or that one can infer from their actings that they ever maintained that they had anything to do with the supply of steel for any part of the bridge except the superstructure of the four spans. I think the proof shews that they never said or maintained in their communings with the defenders in reference to the supplies,—“ We insist that we have right to supply the 3500 tons for the viaduct,” or “ We are entitled to supply the steel plates or curb for the shoes of the caissons.” I cannot say so much for their pleading in Court. I think they erred in their pleading, though their actings in regard to this matter seem to have been consistent throughout. In statement 7 the defenders say,—“ The caissons for the Forth Bridge were originally intended to be made entirely of iron, but afterwards the engineer of the works requested, under the powers given him in the contract, that steel shoes should be used for these caissons. For this purpose 500 tons of steel were needed. The defenders gave this work to Arrol Brothers of Glasgow, who bought the steel from Neilson Brothers in Glasgow, who again bought it from the pursuers, who were well aware that it was required for the Forth Bridge.” And what is the answer to that? “ Admitted that the pursuers tested 500 tons of steel which was bought from them by Neilson Brothers of Glasgow. Explained that at the time they were not aware that the said steel was for work which fell under the contract, and that consequently they did not at that time raise action against the defenders.” That means this, they never raised any question in point of fact about it. But now when they come to plead their case, in order, I fancy, to support their view of the contract, and apparently in some dread lest if they made a concession that the contract was limited to the superstructure of the four spans it might hurt their cause otherwise, they say what I have just quoted. The same observation may be made as to the approach viaduct to the bridge. In statement 8 the same statement is made, and the answer is,—“ Explained that at the time they were not aware that the said steel was for work which fell under the contract, and that consequently no action was taken by them.” These answers and the proof satisfy me that in point of fact the Steel Company never claimed to supply either the 3500 tons of steel work for the viaduct nor the steel for the caissons, although they have pleaded that they were entitled to make such claims under the contract, and the conclusions of the summons indicate no limitation of the bridge to its four leading spans and to the superstructure of these spans only.

The next point in the proof was in regard to the rivet bars. I have a strong opinion that if the Steel Company had thought right to object to the proceeding about the rivets they were entitled to do so. They had undertaken to supply all the steel for the bridge, and as part of that steel rivet bars were specified.

The view undoubtedly was that they should get the rivet bars ready, and Tancred, Arrol, & Company were to convert these steel bars into rivets. I do not think it was in Tancred, Arrol, & Company's power to say, "We will supply steel ourselves for part of the bridge, and not take any rivet bars from you, but make our own rivets even for the work on the four spans." But I agree with your Lordships in thinking that on this part of the case the proof shews that while the Steel Company thought this was an invasion of their contract they resolved that they would not make a question about it. They thought it was not a large enough matter to get into conflict with Tancred, Arrol, & Company about, and I attribute no importance to that point.

The only other point that remains is the matter of the minutes, and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that there was no acting of parties proved in reference to this subject. As to the second minute, I think nothing can be made of it. It is quite properly expressed with reference to the position in which the parties stood. It is dated 7th October 1885—"In consideration of this concession" (about taking bills instead of cash) "these gentlemen agree that our contract with their firm should be taken as covering the whole of the steel required for the completion of the Forth Bridge"—that is to say, the question having been raised as to whether the contract did include the whole steel, the Steel Company maintaining that it did, and Tancred, Arrol, & Company maintaining that it did not, they agreed that the contract should be construed as the Steel Company construed it. There is nothing in that to shew that the Steel Company construed the contract otherwise than in the manner to which effect will now be given. The earlier minute is more loosely expressed:—"23d September 1885.—It was decided that Mr Riley wait on them and agree to do this, provided they agree to give us the order for any steel they may require over our contract quantity, and at our contract prices." Undoubtedly these words are quite fitted to bear the meaning that the Steel Company thought there was a "contract quantity" only stipulated, and that they were asking a new and extended arrangement in this respect, but my opinion on the evidence as a whole is that the minute is not truly expressed so as to bear out what was in substance the controversy. I think the real question between the parties was not as to having a fixed contract quantity, but rather that the Steel Company were maintaining the view that they were entitled to supply the whole. But in any case it would be a novelty, if the contract be clear in itself, to say that if the defenders can find in the books or documents of the pursuers, recovered under a diligence, something that tends to shew that the pursuers had a view of the contract differing from its legal meaning and effect, and that was more favourable to the defenders, this should control or alter the contract. If these were very clear minutes—and a series of minutes—making it clear beyond all question that the pursuers took the same view as the defenders maintain, that the true contract was for a limited quantity, this might raise a question of difficulty as to whether the Court should not construe the contract as both parties by their actings declared they interpreted it. But there is no such state of the facts. I am of opinion that the solitary passage in a single minute can have no effect whatever in controlling the written contract of parties, constituted by letters which passed between them. And accordingly I think that in this matter of the minutes the proof gives no assistance in the determination of the case. It is a case which must be determined entirely on the contract. The parties are now agreed that the limit of the claim of the Steel Company shall

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.

Steel Co. of

Scotland v.

Tancred,

Arrol, &amp; Co.

No. 81.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Steel Co. of
Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

be the steel for the superstructure of the four spans, and I am of opinion that on the contract the Steel Company clearly had right to supply, and were bound to supply, the whole steel required for that superstructure.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur with your Lordship, and wish to make only one observation, and that is, that the reference in the contract between the Steel Company and Tancred, Arrol, & Company to the main specification is not limited to the material to be supplied. The reference is to the work to be executed by Tancred, Arrol, & Company “in strict accordance with the specification,” and I think that that being incorporated in the Steel Company’s contract gave a right to the Steel Company to see what the work to be executed by Tancred, Arrol, & Company with reference to this steel was in that specification. It is in that view that I concur with your Lordship that we are entitled to look at the specification as to that matter, and to incorporate it in the Steel Company’s contract with Tancred, Arrol, & Company. And if that is done, we see quite plainly that the work required to be executed by Tancred, Arrol, & Company is the superstructure of the four main spans.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I would suggest to your Lordships a slight variation of the interlocutor of 2d March 1888, where the Lord Ordinary finds that they are entitled to supply, and so forth, “in so far as such steel is or may be required in the construction of the four main spans,” so as to make it read “in the construction of the superstructure of the four main spans.” That is in accordance with all the opinions that have been delivered, and it is necessary in order to exclude the steel for the cutting edge of the caissons.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the defenders as a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor of 2d March 1888, and all the subsequent interlocutors in the cause, vary the said interlocutor of 2d March 1888 by inserting after the words ‘construction of,’ and before the words ‘the four main spans,’ the words ‘the superstructure of’: Recall the interlocutor of 13th June 1888, in so far as it finds the defenders liable in expenses, and in place thereof find them liable in expenses with the exception of the expenses of the proof: Quoad ultra adhere to the whole interlocutors reclaimed against.”

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 82.

SCOTTISH UNION AND NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—
Balfour—Jameson.

NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—
Asher—Maconochie.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—*D.-F. Mackintosh—
J. C. Thomson.*

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

SCOTTISH PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—*D.-F. Mackintosh
—J. C. Thomson.*

SURVEYOR OF TAXES, Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Robertson—Sol.-Gen. Darling—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Income-tax—Fire and Life Insurance Company—Profits or gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842 (Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), schedule D, First Case.—In a question as to the assessment of income-tax, under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D,* on the profits or gains of a company carrying on the businesses both of fire and life insurance, held (1) that the nett profits and gains from the two branches of the business must be massed together as one undivided income assessable according to the rules applicable to the First Case under schedule D; (2) that in estimating profits and gains there fell to be taken into account interest on investments which had not suffered deduction of income-tax at its source; (3) that as fire insurance policies are contracts for one year only, the premiums received for the year of assessment, or on an average of three years, deducting losses by fire during the same period, and ordinary expenses, may be fairly taken as the profits and gains of the company without making any allowance for the balance of annual risks unexpired at the end of the financial year; (4) that the profits or gains upon the life business could be ascertained by actuarial calculation only, and that this actuarial calculation might be obtained by taking the result of the quinquennial investigation prescribed by statute, or of the periodical investigation in use in companies established before the statute, or by an investigation covering the three years prescribed by schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts; and (5) that where a gain is made by the company (within the year of assessment or the three years prescribed by the Income-Tax Act, Schedule D) by realising an investment at a larger price than was paid for it, the difference is to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company.

THE SCOTTISH UNION AND NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY, incorporated under a special Act of Parliament (41 Vict. cap. 53), appealed to the Commissioners of Income-tax for the county of Midlothian against an assessment under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts for the year 1885-86 upon the following amount:—

Fire profits on an average of seven years,	.	.	£24,373
Fees and untaxed interest, &c., estimated,	.	.	5,000

In all,	.	.	£29,373
---------	---	---	----------------

Upon which the duty was £979, 2s.

* The Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, First Case, Rule First, enacts,—“The duty to be charged in respect thereof” (i.e. “in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act”), “shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, &c., upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the day of assessment in which the accounts of the said trade, &c., shall have been usually made up,” &c.

Exchequer
Court.
1ST DIVISION.
M.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

On 1st February 1887 the Commissioners issued the following deliverance:—"The Commissioners are of opinion that the insurance companies should be assessed on their nett revenue, including therein premiums, untaxed interests, and profit from investments, and giving credit for all payments under policies, expenses, and losses, such revenue to be determined on the average of three years, if that be the only legal course, but the Commissioners would suggest that the parties and the Crown should arrange that the average should be determined by the number of years adopted by each respective office as the period of its investigation, and they remit to the surveyors and insurance companies to adjust the figures on this basis. The result to be reported to the Commissioners. In the event of its being found that the profits of life assurance companies must be determined by actuarial valuation, the Commissioners are of opinion that the Crown ought not to be bound by the rate of interest or other elements arbitrarily adopted by the companies themselves to the effect of reserving profits for future distribution."

Thereafter a statement upon the basis prescribed by the Commissioners was drawn up, the summary of which was as follows:—

Fire profits for 1882-83-84,	.	.	.	.	£112,113
Life profits for 1882-83-84,	.	.	.	.	324,727
					3436,840
Average for one year,	.	.	.	.	£145,613
Less taxed interest—Fire,	.	.	.	.	£13,816
—Life,	.	.	.	.	91,866
					105,682
					£39,931
Balance of annuities paid by the company in the year ended 31st December 1884, from which income-tax was retained by the company, and for which they are accountable to the revenue,	.	.	.	.	7,290
					£47,221
Total estimated liability,	.	.	.	.

The Commissioners accordingly, on 20th May 1887, found that the sum assessable to income-tax for 1885-86 was £47,221, and they assessed accordingly, having power on appeal to increase an assessment under the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 57 (8).

The Insurance Company then took a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, in which the following were the facts as stated by the Commissioners;—"1. The appellants carry on the business of fire and life insurance, including the sale of annuities and other ordinary branches of the said businesses within the limits defined by their special Act, which is referred to. They have a common seal and one body of shareholders, with a paid-up capital of £282,571. Their central office is in Edinburgh, and all the branches of their business are managed by the same directorate. The results of their business in all departments, so far as their shareholders are concerned, are thrown together into one account, called the profit and loss account, and dividends to the shareholders are declared out of the balance of profit shewn upon this account, and not out of profits made in any particular department.

"2. The profits of the appellants' fire insurance business are ascertained from year to year. In respect of the premiums in hand at the end of each year, risks are still running under existing policies, which risks may be taken as equivalent on an average to one-third of the premiums received during the preceding year. It has been the custom for many years to reckon the profits of fire insurance business with reference to income-tax upon a seven years' average, but the appellants are satisfied to accept the ruling of the Commissioners, and reckon these profits upon a three years' average.

"3. The whole interest, dividends, rents, and other revenue from invested funds received by the appellants, are divided into two portions, one of which, being the proportion of the whole which is earned from the investment of the paid-up capital and reserves belonging to the shareholders, passes to the credit of their profit and loss account, and forms a portion of their yearly profits. The remainder of the interest, dividends, and other revenue from invested funds, is earned from the investment of the accumulated life and annuity premiums, and goes to provide for the company's obligations under its life assurance and annuity policies.

"4. In carrying on the business of life insurance the appellants issue policies upon lives in return for payment of a premium or premiums. Such payments are made in one sum, or in sums spread over a few years, or in sums spread over a whole lifetime, and by the said policies the appellants undertake to pay certain sums upon the death of the person assured, or on his attaining a certain age, or on the happening of other contingencies connected with human life.

"5. The liabilities of the appellants to the holders of their life and annuity policies are discharged partly out of the premiums received and partly out of the interest or other annual returns arising from the investment of the premiums. These liabilities embrace an obligation not only to pay the specific sums named in the policies but to account to the policy-holders for any surplus that may arise in the business, and to appropriate nine-tenths of that surplus by way of bonus to the policy-holders. This surplus, ascertained in the matter hereafter explained, is popularly known as 'profits,' but as regards the application of nine-tenths of it, it forms, so far as the appellants are concerned, a debt due by the company to its policy-holders, equally with the sums named in their policies. The appellants, however, admit, for the purposes of this case, that income-tax falls to be calculated on all such 'profits.'"

* The Commissioners further stated in the case the following grounds of their opinion :—" In this case the appellants conduct fire and life insurance, and the returns embrace the results of both branches.

"In respect of the former branch, if it stood alone, there is no question as to the form and proper statement of the return. On the debtor side of the account will appear the premiums received for insurance against fire ; the interest on the capital and reserve funds, with income-tax resumed if it has been deducted ; the profit, if any, made on investments. On the creditor side will appear the payments for expenses ; payments for losses by fire ; losses, if any, on investments ; the balance will be profit assessable to tax, and to account of the tax so assessed will be imputed the tax already paid by retention from interest or dividends received.

"The difficulties which have been presented arise as to the profits on the life business.

"The main contention of the appellants, briefly stated, is that in their life business the income-tax paid by them by way of deduction from the interest which they receive, is more than is due by them on any profits they earn, so that even when tax is restored to revenue, the tax already paid equals, if it does not exceed, the whole tax duty exigible from them.

"If the facts are as stated, there can be no answer to the case. If a company shows a profit of £1000, and that profit is proved to arise exclusively from interest on capital, and income-tax has been deducted from all that interest as it accrued, it is plain no charge can justly be made in respect of profit which has

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

The Insurance Company contended * :—“(1) That they are only liable to pay income-tax under schedule D on the actual gains and profits arising thus already borne its proportion of the impost. Assume the tax to be five per cent, or 1s. per £1, then the gross income of the Company has been really . . . £1050 of which it has paid tax by way of retention made by its debtors, . . . 50

Leaving its profit . . . . . £1000 and it would be manifestly unjust to assess it again on that profit.

“But the actual case presented is by no means so simple. The profits of a life insurance company are not derived exclusively from interest; the interest is

* The company put in a statement, exhibiting the total amount of their profits for one year, taking fire profits and interest upon an average of the three years ending 31st December 1884, and the life profits on an average for the period embraced in the last periodical investigation made at 31st December 1884 :—

“The average yearly profits for the three years 1882-83-84 were—

From interest on capital and reserve, . . . . .	£20,228
„ fire profits, calculated upon an average of three years, and carrying forward each year one-third of the premiums to provide for unexpired risks, . . . . .	16,028
„ life profits, ascertained upon the valuation made at the statutory quinquennial investigation of 1884, . . . . .	57,878
	£94,134

“The whole interest, dividends, rents, &c., received during the three years ending 31st December 1884 were as follows, including the interest in the foregoing statement :—

Year 1882, . . . . .	£115,107
„ 1883, . . . . .	117,883
„ 1884, . . . . .	123,027
Together, . . . . .	£356,017

Yearly average, . . . . . £118,672

Deduct for interest on which income-tax has not been paid by way of retention, taken at the amount charged by the Crown, . . . . . £5,000

Deduct also the amount of annuities paid from which income-tax was retained by the company, viz :—

Year 1882, . . . . .	£6,545
„ 1883, . . . . .	8,037
„ 1884, . . . . .	10,207

£24,789

Yearly average, £8,263 8,263†

13,263

£105,409

“ABSTRACT OF THE FOREGOING.

- 1st. Average of the total yearly profits, . . . . . £94,134 per annum.
- 2d. Average nett amount on which income-tax has already been paid at its source, . . . . . £105,409 per annum.”

† This deduction was ultimately not insisted in by the company.

to them from the whole departments of their business, including therein their life business, their fire business, and the interest on invested funds so far as belonging to shareholders.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

not the only element which contributes to its profit; the rate of mortality experienced may prove less than the rate of mortality assumed and provided for in its calculations; the charge made against the insured for expenses may yield a surplus after defraying the expenses actually incurred; the additional charge made against a class of insurers called 'participating,' in respect of advantages accorded to them, may exceed the amount of these advantages as paid; the forfeiture of policies for non-payment of premium may infer the gain to the office of a large proportion of the premiums actually already paid; all these and other contingencies incidental to the business may contribute to the profits, and of course the profits, if any, from these sources, are liable to assessment.

"The Commissioners are further of opinion that the difficulty of dealing with the profits of life insurance companies and corporations for income-tax is mainly due to an exaggerated importance attached to those elaborate actuarial calculations which they make for their own safety and guidance in the conduct of their business.

"But, viewed as an ordinary transaction, life insurance is just like fire and ship insurance, a wager in which the insured gives certain odds against his own life; if he lives for the period covered by the premium he gets nothing, just as a shipowner, whose ship arrives safely, gets nothing under his policy. The insured may renew the wager by paying another premium, and if then he dies, the office loses, just as underwriters lose when a ship is lost.

"The office may, no doubt, require to make elaborate calculations to determine on what terms it can safely do such business, but for the question of income-tax assessment the Commissioners do not see why, if against the premium paid to it the company puts the losses paid by it, the balance is not its income assessable to tax. By applying the doctrine of chances and of averages, the office may reduce the irregular and variable accidents of numerous transactions to an orderly procession of events; but that does not alter the fact that on each transaction the office stands to win or to lose, and makes profit or suffers loss as an underwriter, according as it wins or loses on the risk it undertakes.

"Such a position, if imposed on the insurance companies as regards their premiums, is by no means singular; there are many people who every year pay income-tax on income, the precise equivalent of the company's premiums. If A B goes to an insurance company and undertakes to pay £50 a-year, provided the company will pay him £1000 at his death, the company would appear, according to the contention of the appellants, to maintain its exemption from income-tax for that £50 a-year, which A B may continue to pay until the company has accumulated the full £1000 which it has undertaken to pay, and probably something more. But if the transaction be reversed, and A B takes his £1000 to the company, and in consideration of that sum gets an annuity of £50 from the company, A B must pay tax on that £50 as long as he draws it. If the tax is not leviable on the one £50, the Commissioners do not see why it should be paid on the other.

"But, if it be incompetent to assess the company on the annual balance of their premium income, there can, the Commissioners apprehend, be no doubt that they are liable to assessment in respect of the profits admittedly made, as ascertained or ascertainable by actuarial valuations.

"The Commissioners cannot, however, but feel that to assess on such a basis introduces many difficulties inconsistent with that simplicity and directness which characterises the incidence of the income-tax on other trades and businesses. The tax is levied in ordinary cases on the profits of each year, or on the results annually ascertained; an average of a few years may be accepted as the measure or test of one year to save detail or equalise results. But the actuarial calculations of an insurance company run into a very distant future, and embrace considerations all problematical and hypothetical, and some of

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

"(2) That the amount of said profits falls to be calculated and ascertained—(a) As regards interest, by taking the average of the amount of interest belonging to the shareholders on capital and reserve as appearing in the appellants' profit and loss account for the three years immediately preceding the year in which the assessment for income-tax is to be imposed; (b) As regards fire business, by taking the average of the fire profits for the three years immediately preceding the year for which the assessment for income-tax is to be imposed; (c) As regards life business, by taking the proportion applicable to one year of the amount of life profits as ascertained at the last periodical investigation into the company's life business made in terms of the statutes. These statutory investigations are made on well recognised principles, under competent scientific advice, and with a view to ascertain what surplus or profit may be reckoned on as having already been realised, as distinguished from any profits which may or may not arise in the future working of the business. Before any realised profit can be reckoned on, provision has to be made for the whole liabilities of the company, on certain assumptions as to the rate of mortality, the rate of interest, and the amount of expenses likely to be experienced in the future. These assumptions are made by all insurance offices which have regard to their future solvency, not on the principle suggested by the Commissioners, that the business of insurance is a system of wagering—a suggestion which the appellants regard as unfounded and mischievous,—but with the express view to the certainty that they will be realised. The importance of these estimates cannot be exaggerated, as it depends on their soundness whether the company will be in a position in the future to meet its obligations, or whether the expectations of its policyholders will be disappointed, as it is impossible to predict with certainty what the future rates of mortality or of interest will be; and as the rate of interest in particular is likely to be much lower in the future than it has been in the past, it is necessary to make assumptions on these subjects within the limits of safety; but if, as may be hoped, the experience of a company proves more favourable than has been assumed, the surplus or profits thence arising will, at future investigations, come into account, and be assessable for income-tax.

"(3) That calculating the amount on which income-tax fell to be assessed for the year 1885-86 on the principles above contended for, the assessable income of the appellants, under schedule D, for that year amounted to £94,134, but that, as the appellants have already paid income-tax for that year (calculated upon an average of the three immediately preceding years) on a sum of £105,409, they ought not to be assessed for any further payment.

"(4) That the principle introduced for the first time into the mode of assessment of insurance companies by the Commissioners' deliverances of 1st February 1887 and 20th May 1887 is erroneous. That principle appears to be that the appellants are assessable for income-tax under schedule D, not on their gains and profits, but on their gross revenue for an average of three years, subject to deduction of their gross outgoing for the same three years. An account of profits cannot be made out on this principle without leading to erroneous and absurd results. Thus the returns made by the Board of Trade to Parliament for 1885 shew that the them purely arbitrary; the Commissioners think it hardly in accordance with the spirit of the assessment that its results should depend on guesses as to what may be the rate of interest, or the rate of mortality, or the rate of expense, fifty years hence. If equal latitude were allowed to the imagination of other traders, the result would not be favourable to the Exchequer. . . ."

---

premium income of the whole life assurance companies of the United Kingdom for that year was . . . £12,555,797

While the amount paid for claims, cash bonuses, surrenders, commission, and expenses of management was . . . 13,919,792

Shewing a deficiency for the year of . . . £1,363,995

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

which was only provided for out of interest received, which amounted to £5,918,058. Thus if income-tax were charged against the whole life offices together, upon the principle laid down by the Commissioners, there would be no balance of profit which could be assessed, whereas there can be no doubt that a large amount of aggregate profit was earned by these companies during that year. This will be made more clear by reference to the accounts of a few of the best known and most prosperous English insurance offices. Taking the expenditure of these offices during 1885 for claims, cash bonuses, surrenders, commission, and expenses; and setting against this expenditure their incomes from life premiums, the following were the amounts by which the expenditure exceeded the premiums:—Guardian, £106,345; Provident, £31,140; Rock, £61,624; London Assurance, £20,970; Equitable, £141,334; Law Life, £155,718. The appellants therefore submit that by this method it is impossible to arrive at the profits truly made by the appellants in their business, more particularly in connection with their life business and the funds appropriated thereof. Their annual gross revenue, so far as their life business is concerned, consists partly of life assurance premiums and partly of interest arising on their life fund. Life assurance premiums are in no sense a gain or profit either to the company which receives them or to the policyholders. So far as the company is concerned each premium carries with it a corresponding obligation of a postponed and contingent character, but quite definite and capable of scientific measurement. So far as the policyholders are concerned, the premiums paid by them are in effect an investment out of their savings, to be repaid to them or their heirs on the emergence of whatever contingency is stipulated in the policy. The individual insurer, or his heirs, may receive more or less than he has paid according as he lives a shorter or longer time, but the policyholders, as a body, practically receive back what they have paid, with the interest of it. Under the Income-Tax Acts persons are under certain conditions not liable to be charged with income-tax upon the amount of such premiums, but, if the principle contended for by the Commissioners be sound, one of the purposes of these Acts would be defeated, for all insurers of lives would practically be compelled to pay income-tax on their premiums of life insurance."

The Surveyor of Taxes, "in support of the assessment by the General Commissioners, submitted that the principle of the assessment by the Commissioners in respect of the fire insurance and annuity profits was not understood to be disputed. That the General Commissioners have assessed the income-tax on life insurance profits on the same lines as the fire insurance profits. He also submitted—(1) That if the company invest their accumulated funds from premiums, &c., in heritable property, or in the acquisition of mortgages by taking transfers to them, or otherwise, income-tax will be assessed under schedule A on the heritable property. It will be deducted in the payment of the interest on the mortgages. These are tradings with the money, and the profits arising will bear the income-tax according to their nature and amount. If the company entered with the accumulation of premiums, &c., into other trades, if profits were made, such would be assessed to income-tax. (2) That interest on foreign securities is liable to assessment to income-tax,

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

schedule D, No. 4. This is trading also, and the profit received in this country is liable to assessment without deduction. (3) That bank interest on the company's current account and other interest received, where income-tax is not deducted, is also assessable to income-tax, schedule D, No. 3. (4) That the profits of the fire and life assurance business are chargeable under schedule D, No. 1. The income-tax is assessed in respect of the profits of the year of assessment. The year of the assessment in the present case is the year 1885-86. The profits of the year of assessment are ascertained by estimate—Trade Schedule D, No. 1; Profession Schedule D, No. 2, on an average of three years. (Professions 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34, sec. 48.) Profits of uncertain amount, such as interest not being annual interest, schedule D, No. 3, on the preceding year. Foreign securities, on the amount which has been or will be received in the current year, schedule D, No. 4. The income-tax on annuities and yearly interest of money is paid by way of deduction from the payments by the person making the payments, if such person's income, out of which the payments are made, has been assessed. By section 102 provision is made for the case where the income is not assessed from which the payments are made. Section 52 provides that the income-tax return or statement, which all persons are required to make, shall be exclusive of the profits and gains from annual interest of money, &c. That it is the profits in the year of assessment which are in question is evident from section 133. By that section, if the actual profits fall short of the computation, provision for relief is made. There is no provision for correction if the profits turn out to be more than computed. The same company or person may have these various descriptions of profits, and have to pay tax upon each of them. The payment of the tax upon one cannot be set against the other. By the statutes there is a grant of duty on each of them, and the payment of the duty on one is no reason why it should not be paid on the others. In this case there was sufficient income in each of the three years upon which the assessment for the year 1885-86 was based to pay all the claims and expenses of management, and leave profit from the premiums and bank interest without the application of any part of the accumulated or invested funds to such purpose. The materials for assessment on the company (appendix) for 1885-86 are made up on the principle of leaving altogether out of the reckoning the accumulated or invested funds or the income from them. This is in accordance with the Statute 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 52. The result brought out is the same as the finding of the General Commissioners. The Commissioners took in the income from investments on one side, but they deducted it on the other. The contention of the company is that they have right to place against the tax on, for instance, the profits from the fire insurance business the tax they have paid by way of deduction on the income from investments."

It was stated at the bar that, previously to the bringing of these cases, the plan which had been adopted by the Inland Revenue, in assessing for income-tax insurance companies carrying on both fire and life businesses, had been to treat the fire and life businesses as separate, and not to attempt to ascertain the life profits, the interest on investments being taken in lieu of the latter.

Argued for the appellants, the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company;—The principle of assessing a company doing fire and life business, and having invested funds, by putting the revenue for any one year on one side and the expenditure on the other, and holding the balance to be assessable income, was entirely new. (1) So far as the life business was concerned, the profit as ascertained by the statutory quinquennial investigation<sup>1</sup> was the proper basis of assessment, and the taxation each year should be on the proportion effeiring to the year of the profits shewn at the last statutory quinquennial investigation. (2) As regarded the fire business, the Commissioners proposed to take each year by itself. That seemed to assume that the business was stationary, which it was not. Future contingencies must be taken into account in fire just as in life policies. A right course would be to take say 33 per cent of the gross premium income for the year as the average of unexpired risks, and carry it forward for contingent losses. (3) There was a further point as to the assessment of interest upon invested funds which had escaped taxation at its source.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

It was admitted that Last's case<sup>2</sup> settled that income-tax fell to be calculated both on the profits divided as bonuses among the policyholders, which was nine-tenths of the whole, and on the remaining one-tenth which was paid to the shareholders. A good test to apply to the principle which had been adopted by the Commissioners was to take the case of a young office; their premiums would all fall to be taxed at first, because there would probably be no deaths, if they were careful to select good lives to begin with. And yet these premiums would represent payments towards liquidating obligations which would run on into future years. Take, too, the case of a single premium payment. That premium, according to the Commissioners, was to be held to be profit in the year in which it was paid, although it might never be profit at all.

Taking the words of the Income-Tax Acts, 1842, schedule D, and 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, schedule D, what were the annual profits or gains on the life insurance business of a company? The incomings and outgoings of an office in any particular year had no relation to the question whether the office was doing a profitable or a losing life business. An ordinary trader, making his income-tax return as at 5th April, would rightly take into account any bills he had to meet for goods supplied to him from the wholesale house and sold by him, before he could arrive at the amount of profit he had made upon these goods. But the Commissioners here would leave altogether out of account the future bills—the liability which the payment of the premiums involved. The profits and gains of a life insurance business could only be settled by an actuarial calculation as to whether the accumulated premiums paid by all the policyholders, plus the future premiums which might be received, were sufficient to meet the company's liabilities. The Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 61, secs. 4, 5, 6, and 7, shewed that the Legislature recognised a particular system of ascertaining the gains and profits of a company of this kind, and it was upon the statement made up in terms of that Act that its profits were divided. The analogy drawn by the Commissioners between marine and life insurance was quite false—even assuming that the Commissioners were right in their facts as regarded the payment of income-tax by the underwriter. Ship, like fire insurance, only extended over a short period, and as soon as the risk expired the underwriters could divide the proceeds among themselves. But what underwriters really did was to carry forward so much of their income at the end of each year for unexpired risks upon current policies.

Last's case settled that in calculating the profits of an insurance business the whole branches of it were to be treated as one.<sup>2</sup> The question of how premiums were to be dealt with was not appealed to the House

<sup>1</sup> Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 61, secs. 4 to 11.

<sup>2</sup> Last v. London Assurance Corporation, March 14, 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 389, Nov. 15, 1884, 14 Q. B. D. 239, July 14, 1885 (H. L.), 10 App. Ca. 438.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

of Lords. The Inland Revenue acquiesced in the judgment of the Queen's Bench upon that matter, and their judgment was exactly in point. It was true that as regarded the question of the carrying forward or not of unexpired risks upon the figures brought out by the company, the whole difference was one of £1670,—the difference between £66,600 and £68,270,—being the one-third of the premiums received in 1881 and 1884 respectively. But the sound principle was, that unexpired risks must be provided for.

The average of the total yearly profits, as brought out by the company, was £94,134, and the average nett amount on which income-tax had been paid was £105,409. Accordingly, on the authority of Last's case, the company was not bound to pay any income-tax, as it had already been paid on a larger sum than the whole amount of gains or profits.

Besides the questions of the carrying forward of the unexpired risks in the fire business, and of the right to treat the life premiums annually received as income, there were two other questions in the case. The first was, "Were the Crown entitled to receive income-tax on interest which had not suffered payment of income-tax at its source?"—i.e., on the £5000 sum stated in the accounts. Admittedly the decision in The Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Society<sup>1</sup> was against the company's contention. But although the company might not be able to get back the sum overpaid by way of income-tax,—that was the difference between £94,134 and £105,409,—and under the Income-Tax Acts it was admitted they could not,—yet the interest which had escaped payment of tax at its source ought not now to be charged with tax, as tax had been already paid on a larger sum than the whole amount of the annual gains or profits. The second was, "Were the company bound to account directly for income-tax deducted by them when they paid their annuities?" or, as the company submitted, did these deductions fall to be included in the ordinary computation of gains or profits? That question arose under the Income-Tax Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 40. It was like the payment of an annuity out of land where the annuity was deducted, but income-tax was not paid upon it. Here the fund out of which the annuity was paid was taxed at its source. The income-tax which the company retained from the annuity was put to the credit of profit and loss, and tax was paid upon the balance.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—The main question between the parties was, how were the profits of the life business to be computed? The charge was made under the 1st rule, case I., of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), to which the Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, schedule D, referred back. It was on profits or gains, but these might mean profits not distributed. The Commissioners proposed to treat both the fire and life business on the same footing. The proper course in both cases was to put the receipts against the outgoings, and by taking an average of years a reliable index of the profit actually earned was obtained. This was supported by the definition of profits given in the Court of first instance by Mr Justice Day in the case of Last,<sup>2</sup> and afterwards endorsed by the Master of the Rolls. The judgment no doubt was reversed, but that was not because the definition of profits was wrong, but because of the way in which it was applied. The case of the policyholder was different from that of the ordinary trader who had granted bills for goods received. The policy-holder had no absolute contract with the company beyond the period to which the premium applied, and there was no absolute obligation on the company to pay except for that period. Further, the Crown objected to take the quinquennial period in place of the three years as affording a fair criterion of the profits of the company. For instance, if there had been an actuarial inquiry, say in 1884, the Crown would have had to tax as upon the figures then settled for a period of five years afterwards, although the circumstances of the company might be in a much better position. To have had an independent actuarial inquiry would have been a very expensive matter for the Crown, hence the Commissioners had suggested the simple remedy proposed. If the Court did not approve the view taken by the Commissioners, then they should adopt the assessment as originally laid on by the assessor, with this alteration, that an average of three instead of seven years should be taken for the fire profits.

<sup>1</sup> The Clerical, Medical, and General Life Assurance Co. v. Carter, July 1888, L. R., 21 Q. B. D. 339.

<sup>2</sup> Last v. London Assurance Corporation, March 14, 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 389, L. R., 14 Q. B. D. 239.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

The Court thereupon intimated that they did not desire to hear any further argument on the view taken by the Commissioners as regarded life profits, which they could not sustain. Senior counsel were then heard.

Argued for the appellants the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company;—Assuming the view taken by the Commissioners to be untenable, the question was, whether the original assessment adopted by the assessor could stand, first, in regard to the assessment of the fire profits on an average of seven years, and, second, in regard to the liability of the £5000 of untaxed interest to assessment? In regard to the first point, the sound course was to mass both branches of the business together. The question whether there was divisible profit or profits and gains depended on the nett result of the combined dealing. The business was treated as a unit, and the shareholders were the same. The legal persona was one. No doubt the fire business was the simpler case, but even it did not terminate every year. Fire policies were taken out at all periods of the year, and might be for shorter periods than a year. So that policies taken out during one bookkeeping or Inland Revenue year ran into another, and it was impossible to treat all the premiums as assets earned during the year, seeing that many risks fell to be carried forward to the next year. In the Imperial Fire Insurance case<sup>1</sup> the English Judges treated the matter in the rough, and held that with a going company each year could be taken by itself, and that when a loss from an unexpired risk took place, matters would be equalised by the profits being diminished for the year in which it occurred. Such reasoning was unsatisfactory, and the case was not in point. In dealing with the life business it was necessary to have regard to a tract of future time. The interest of investments on the life fund was not profit, but was for the most part like the premiums themselves, required to meet the liabilities of the company. That question was already settled by the case of Last,<sup>2</sup> in which the Crown did not take this point to the Appeal Court. That authority settled that the fire and life businesses could not be separated for assessment purposes. In the Clerical Life Assurance case<sup>3</sup> there was a statement of the schedules as adjusted in Last's case after the judgment of the House of Lords, which was very important as illustrating the present case.

<sup>1</sup> Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Wilson, Oct. 1876, 35 L. T. 271.

<sup>2</sup> Last v. London Assurance Corporation, March 14, 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 389, Nov. 15, 1884, L. R., 14 Q. B. D. 239, July 14, 1885, L. R., 10 H. L. 438.

<sup>3</sup> Clerical, Medical, and General Assurance Co. v. Carter, L. R., 21 Q. B. D. 339.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
 Scottish Union
 and National
 Insurance Co.
 v. Inland
 Revenue.

Putting the nett profits of the business on one side, and the taxed interest on the other, what remained was what fell to be assessed. This principle had been recognised in some recent cases in the Scottish Courts.<sup>1</sup>

As regarded the question of assessment upon untaxed interest, amounting to £5000, that did not fall to be decided, because, assuming it to be just, that sum fell to be deducted from the £118,672; but even then the Crown had been overpaid by the difference between £118,672 and £94,134. If the Crown proposed to make a separate assessment on the £5000, and to found upon the Clerical, Medical, and General Life case,<sup>2</sup> the appellants contended that that case should not be followed.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—Under the Taxes Management Act, sec. 59, the Court had ample power either to confirm, reverse, amend, or remit the assessment to the Commissioners with their opinion expressed. (1) The principle of the assessment made by the Commissioners was, in the first place, to take the interest on invested funds. The greater part of that was taxed at its source, and there was no reason why any such interest, probably derived from foreign investments, should escape taxation. It was impossible that the Income-tax Acts could have contemplated anything so irrational as that interest of funds invested at home should be taxed, but that of funds invested abroad should not be. The Clerical, Medical, and General Assurance Association case<sup>2</sup> was a direct authority in support of this view. The Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company case<sup>3</sup> was different, as it did not involve the massing of two different businesses. There the interest which it was proposed to tax was of a very fluctuating character, and was held to be like interest on banker's advances, and not interest on investments. The present case was quite different. (2) The investments here were all made from the income derived from the life funds, and were not available for fire purposes; the two branches of the business were entirely separate, and the fire profits fell to be separately assessed. The two businesses were very different, and the mere fact that they both yielded profits and were carried on by the same corporation in no way made them the same business. Their characters and incidents were different, and the funds of the two branches were separately treated by this company in terms of the Act of 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 61, secs. 4, 5, 6, and 7. It was no doubt true that there was only one profit and loss account, but that was merely because this was a company which required such an account to present to its shareholders, and, besides, for income-tax purposes it did not matter what became of the profits. The fact was, as stated in the case, that the interest from invested funds went to the life policies. The fire funds could not be diverted to meet losses on the life department, nor vice versa. Section 101 of the Income-tax Act of 1842 dealt with the case of a man carrying on two businesses, and allowed him, where there was loss on one of them, to set it off against the profits on the other, but that was only where the businesses were carried on with the same capital, and where there was no separation of the funds, and it did not apply here.<sup>4</sup> Last's case was no doubt against this view, but it was not binding on the Court, as this point did not go to the House of Lords, and besides, it did not appear that the 4th section of the Act of 1870, providing for a separation of businesses, applied to the company in that

<sup>1</sup> Inland Revenue v. Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico, Nov. 19, 1886, 14 R. 98; Inland Revenue v. The Northern Investment Co. of New Zealand, May 31, 1887, 14 R. 734; Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co., July 12, 1888, 15 R. 872.

<sup>2</sup> L. R., 21 Q. B. D. 339.

<sup>3</sup> Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co., July 12, 1888, 15 R. 872.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Brown v. Watt, Feb. 20, 1886, 13 R. 590.

case, the company having been in existence before the passing of the Act. The method of arriving at the £57,000—the amount of their life profits as calculated by the company upon their quinquennial investigation—had no warrant in the statute. What the company did was to make a series of calculations for the future, depending upon the rate of mortality and the rate of interest, and they admittedly took a rate of interest so safe as to represent in this company only 2 per cent as against £4, 7s. 6d. which they were actually receiving, thus falling far short of ascertaining their true profits. For instance, one of the appellant companies—the North British and Mercantile—contended that income-tax was to be paid only on profits so far as divided, and not upon profits which were carried to reserve; but this was quite inadmissible, because in revenue questions any distinction as to profits had no place. Accordingly the only just course was to take the interest simply as representing the profits. In any view, the onus was upon the companies to shew that they had adopted a system which was fair and within the statute. The figures produced by the company were not admitted, and all that the Court was asked to do was to adopt the principle taken by the surveyor.

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
 Scottish Union
 and National
 Insurance Co.
 v. Inland
 Revenue.

As to the deduction of 33 per cent per annum from the fire profits for future risks, although, so far as figures went, the matter might not be an important one, the case of the Imperial Fire Company was in point, and assessment ought to be allowed upon the full amount, without deduction, from year to year.

The case of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company was not separately argued. That company admitted that interests on its investments was liable to income-tax, but on other points adopted the argument which had been presented for the Scottish Union and National Company.

The case of the Northern Insurance Company presented some features of difference. The assessment in that case had been made upon the profits of both the fire and life funds, without separating the two businesses, and it was left to the option of the Inland Revenue to assess either upon the profits proper of the year or upon the income derived from the company's investments, and to consider whether they would treat the company as a trader or as a capitalist and investor. The question of the principle of that assessment was now brought up, but was considered to be exhausted by the argument in the Scottish Union and National case. The only points on which additional argument was offered related to the question of what were proper profits to be taken into account in framing the balance-sheet, and ultimately the only point which was treated as being undisposed of by the argument in the Scottish Union and National case had regard to the right of the Inland Revenue (which had been given effect to by the Commissioners) to include among the profits of the business "profits on investments realised, £8863, 0s. 10d."

The appellants (The Northern Insurance Company) contended "that profits on investments realised were capital and not income; that their business was not that of buying and selling shares of other companies, but of fire and life insurance; that when they sold an investment at an enhanced price from that at which it was bought, this was not a transaction in the nature of their own business, but a capital transaction, and therefore not coming within the scope of the Income-Tax Acts."

The Surveyor of Taxes contended "that the company in their accounts treated profits on realised investments as income, that they brought the amount of such into their 'profit and loss account' out of which they paid their dividends, and that it was thus income assessable to income-tax."

Argued for the appellants;—The profit on the realisation of invest-

No. 82.

Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

ments no doubt entered the profit and loss account, and was carried from that account to reserve. But it could not be held to be profit, apart from the manner in which it was dealt with in the accounts. It was an elementary principle in regard to the incidence of the income-tax that no regard was to be had to either the increment or the depreciation of capital. At least no allowance could be made for diminution of capital,<sup>1</sup> and by implication it followed that no tax could be levied upon increment. It was said that this was to be accounted for by the fact that although a loss of capital could not enter income, yet a profit did. But that was a non sequitur. It was conceded that so much of the £8800 as was derived from the life fund was taken account of and entered into the calculations at the quinquennial investigation, and the present question could only relate to such investments as resulted from the fire fund. These investments were made outside the proper business of the company. If this assessment was justified in the case of profits realised, it must also apply to profits earned, and so if at the date of a man's death an investment which he held realised four times what he had paid for it, the Crown would be entitled to demand income-tax on it as for the year of his death. But such a claim had never been made. In any view, inquiry would be necessary in this case to determine what of the profits belonged to the fire fund, and what to the life fund.

In regard to the provision of the statute that a three years' and not the five years' average of the quinquennial investigation was to be taken, it would be impossible to work that in the case of large offices, as it took eighteen months to make the present investigation. The matter must be worked from the data of the quinquennial investigation.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—It was admitted that with regard to the profits on investments realised, these were to be limited to fire profits so far as this question was concerned. As matter of fact, the company treated these as profits; they entered the profit and loss account, and they formed an item which went to swell the profits of the shareholders. It had been held that though the profits of a concern might be applied so that the shareholders got none of them, and they were expended on the extinction of debt, they were still liable to taxation.<sup>2</sup> Income-tax notices all contained a heading asking for a return of any profit made on realising investments.

The case of the Scottish Provincial Insurance Company was similar to that of the Northern Insurance Company, and was not separately argued.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (consisting of the LORD PRESIDENT, LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that the assessment as originally imposed cannot be sustained. But the mode of ascertaining the profits and gain of the company in the department of the life business adopted by the Commissioners is fundamentally wrong, and quite inadmissible.

We shall therefore reverse the determination of the Commissioners, and remit the case to them with the following instructions, which sufficiently embody our reasons for differing both from the Assessor and from the Commissioners, and may at the same time form a useful guide to Revenue officers and the General Commissioners of Income-tax in dealing with cases of this description.

1. In assessing to the income-tax the profits and gains of a company carrying on the businesses both of fire insurance and life insurance, the nett profits and gains from the two branches of the business must be massed together as one undivided income, assessable according to the rules applicable to the first case under schedule D (see Smiles v. The Australasian Mortgage Company, 15 Ret. 872, as contrasted with The Scottish Mortgage Company of New Mexico v. Inland Revenue, 14 Ret. 98).

<sup>1</sup> Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sch. D, First Case, Rule Third.

<sup>2</sup> Mersey Docks v. Lucas, June 1883, L. R., 8 App. Ca. 891.

No. 82.
Feb. 8, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Inland
Revenue.

2. Interest on investments which has not suffered deduction of income-tax at its source must be taken into account in ascertaining the assessable amount of profits and gains of the company.

3. Seeing that fire insurance policies are contracts for one year only, the premiums received for the year of assessment, or on an average of three years, deducting losses by fire during the same period, and ordinary expenses, may be fairly taken as the profits and gains of the company, without taking into account or making any allowance for the balance of annual risks unexpired at the end of the financial year of the company (see The Imperial Fire Insurance Company v. Wilson).

4. But this rule is not applicable to the ascertainment of profits and gains on the life business. Life policies are contracts of most variable endurance, and the premiums are in many cases not annual payments. The contract may endure for the policyholder's life, or for a certain number of years stated, or till the holder attains a certain age, and the company may be bound, on the expiry of the fixed number of years, or on the attainment of a certain age by the policyholder, either to pay a lump sum or an annuity for the remainder of the policyholder's life.

The premiums paid for such insurance may be paid all in one sum or by instalments within a fixed number of years, or annually during the holder's life, or during the subsistence of the policy. The premiums therefore do in no sense represent the annual profits and gains of the company. In like manner the amount of claims in any one year arising on the death of persons insured or otherwise, as a deduction from the company's receipts for the year, cannot afford any criterion for ascertainment of profits. A recently established company will receive a large amount of premiums, and have few or no claims to meet. The profits and gains can be ascertained only by actuarial calculation. And this actuarial calculation may be obtained by taking the result of the quinquennial investigation prescribed by statute, or of the periodical investigation in use in companies established before the statute, or by an investigation covering the three years prescribed by schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts.

In the case of the Northern Insurance Company,—

5. Where a gain is made by the company (within the year of assessment or the three years prescribed by the Income-Tax Act, schedule D), by realising an investment at a larger price than was paid for it, the difference is to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor in each of the cases:—"Reverse the determination of the Commissioners, and remit the case to them with the following instructions"—1 to 4 as above,—the 5th instruction being added in the case of the Northern Insurance Company: "Find the appellants entitled to expenses," &c.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.—
AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

No. 83.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Macrae v.
Sutherland.

DONALD MACRAE, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—Forsyth.
ANGUS SUTHERLAND, Defender (Reclaimer).—J. C. Thomson—Rhind.

Process—Caution for expenses—Pursuer resident in England—Notour bankruptcy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 6.—In an action of damages for slander brought by a person residing in England, the defender averred that he had obtained a decree for payment of £20 against the pursuer, that a charge for payment had expired without payment, and that the pursuer was therefore notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880. He pleaded that the pursuer should, ante omnia, be ordained to find caution for expenses.

The Court refused to ordain the pursuer to find caution.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Innuendo.—The proprietor of a house wrote to the agent of his tenant (Macrae), who had ceased to occupy the premises,—“That horrid man Macrae will never get a penny from me, and you know that as long as he keeps the key he is liable for the rent. There were several applicants for the place at a reduced rent, on account of its being occupied by him. I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath. His statement of facts were a tissue of falsehoods.” In an action of damages for slander by the tenant, held that the words would bear the innuendo “that the pursuer is of dishonourable character.”

1st Division.
Ld. Wellwood.
B.

DONALD MACRAE, M.D., entered into possession at Whitsunday 1886 of a house called Lochiel Villa, Strathpeffer, under a lease for ten years at £100 per annum, from the proprietor, Angus Sutherland. He continued to occupy it until the end of November 1887, when, in consequence, as he alleged, of its being in an uninhabitable condition, he left it.

Sutherland afterwards brought an action against Macrae for payment of the rent of the house, and on 10th July 1888 obtained warrant of ejectment from the Sheriff.

Macrae thereafter removed to London, and when he was engaged in negotiating for the lease of a house there the landlord of the house received an anonymous letter, in the following terms:—“Sir,—I think it my duty to inform you that Dr Macrae, who is in negotiation with you about your house has left Strathpeffer very much in debt; his landlord there will give you his true character. I enclose his address. Dr Macrae has been followed to Dalston and his movements watched; he is a man of no means, and has swindled many. Such a man ought not to be allowed to take honest people in. From one who has suffered. Late landlord's address—Mr Sutherland, Little Ferry, Golspie, Sutherlandshire, Scotland, N.B.”

Subsequently Macrae's agent in Tain received the following letter:—“Little Ferry, Golspie, 21st June 1888.—Dear Sir,—Thanks for your attention, that horrid man Macrae will never get a penny from me, and you know that as long as he keeps the key he is liable for the rent. There were several applicants for the place at a reduced rent, on account of its being occupied by him. I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath. His statement of facts were a tissue of falsehoods . . . Yours truly, A. SUTHERLAND.”

Macrae, in September 1888, brought an action of damages for slander against Sutherland, alleging that the first as well as the second of the two letters was written by him. With regard to the second, he alleged as follows:—“The statements here made are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious and malicious. They were intended to mean, and do mean, that the pursuer is of fraudulent and dishonourable character, and that in consequence thereof if he visited Strathpeffer he would be mobbed by the people in that locality.”

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having left the country and being notour bankrupt, the defender is entitled in the circumstances, to have him ordained, ante omnia, to find caution for expenses. (4) The letter of 21st June 1888 not being slanderous, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

No. 83.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Macrae v.
Sutherland.

In support of his first plea he stated;—"On 12th October 1888 decree was granted against the pursuer for the sum of £20, 13s. 6d., expenses of said process and appeal" (i.e., of the action for payment of rent). "The decree was extracted on 15th October, and on the 17th of that month the pursuer was charged to pay the sums contained therein. The days of charge have expired without payment, and the pursuer is therefore notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880. Further explained that the pursuer quitted the premises as stated, and left the country without informing the defender of his whereabouts."

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 16th January 1889, repelled the defender's first plea, and adjusted the following issues for the trial of the cause:—" (1) Whether, on or about 7th May 1888, the defender caused to be written and sent to Mr Bidgood, 117 Osbaldiston Road, Stoke-newinton Common, Clapton, a letter in the terms set forth in the appendix hereto, marked A, which letter was received by the said Mr Bidgood? Whether the same is of and concerning the pursuer, and is false and calumnious, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) It being admitted that on or about the 21st June 1888 the defender wrote and sent to Robert Munro, writer, Tain, a letter in the terms set forth in the appendix hereto annexed, marked B, and received by the said Robert Munro, Whether the same is of and concerning the pursuer, and whether the words 'I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath,' were intended to mean, and do mean, that the pursuer is of fraudulent and dishonourable character, and that, in consequence thereof, if he visited Strathpeffer he would be mobbed by the people in that locality; and are false and calumnious, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £1000."

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) In the circumstances stated by the defender, the pursuer was bound to find caution for expenses. This case was not so strong as that of Clarke.<sup>1</sup> There was notour bankruptcy under the provisions of the 6th section of the Debtors Act, 1880. It was not necessary that the pursuer should have been divested of his estate in order to have him taken bound to find caution,<sup>2</sup> and the fact that he had left the country, and that his present address was unknown, were sufficient to induce the Court to order him to find caution. (2) He had no objection to the first issue. As to the second, there was nothing actionable in the words which had been used in the second letter libelled, and therefore they could not be innuendoed.<sup>3</sup>

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The pursuer here was not divested of his estate; he was only notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors Act, 1880, and for the purposes of that Act only. There was no reason for his being ordained to find caution,<sup>4</sup> and the fact that he was resident in England, although it might have been of importance previously, was not now of so much weight, since the passing of the Judgments

<sup>1</sup> Clarke v. Muller, Jan. 16, 1884, 11 R. 418.

<sup>2</sup> Samuel v. Greig, July 12, 1844, 6 D. 1259; Maxwell v. Maxwell, March 3, 1847, 9 D. 797, 19 Scot. Jur. 357.

<sup>3</sup> Fraser v. Morris, Feb. 24, 1888, 15 R. 454; Broomfield v. Greig, March 7, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 568; Brydone v. Brechin, May 17, 1881, 8 R. 697; Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty & Sons, 1882, L. R., 7 App. Ca. 741.

<sup>4</sup> Scott v. Johnston, June 2, 1885, 12 R. 1022.

No. 83. Extension Act, 1868.<sup>1</sup> (2) He was willing that the innuendo should be made to cover the whole of the second letter, and to amend the issue to that effect.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Macrae v.
Sutherland.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in so far as he has repelled the first plea for the defender. The circumstances under which the plea is repelled are to be found in the answer to the third article of the condescendence, in which the defender alleges that on 12th October 1888 decree was granted against the pursuer for £20, 13s. 6d., that on 15th October the decree was extracted, and on 17th October the pursuer was charged to pay. The statement then goes on—"The days of charge have expired without payment, and the pursuer is therefore notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880." It is conceded that the definition of the term notour bankrupt in the 7th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, does not cover such a case as the present. That section, it is to be observed, is not applicable to proceedings in a sequestration alone, but is a general provision as to the circumstances which shall be held to constitute notour bankruptcy. The 6th clause of the Debtors Act of 1880, to which the defender refers, was introduced in consequence of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, except in certain very special cases, and it was therefore necessary that there should be some extension of the modes of constituting notour bankruptcy, just because the mode of constituting it by imprisonment had been thereby removed.

The 6th clause of the Debtors Act of 1880 is,—“In any case in which, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment followed by the expiry of the days of charge without payment, or where a charge is not necessary or not competent, by insolvency concurring with an extracted decree for payment followed by the lapse of the days intervening prior to execution without payment having been made.” I read that section as intended solely for the purposes of the Act in which it occurs. It is such notour bankruptcy as will enable a debtor or creditor to sue out a cessio, and I do not think the law relating to notour bankruptcy was intended to be altered for any other object. Accordingly, I think there is no notour bankruptcy in the circumstances of the present case. This is enough to enable us to dispose of the defender's first plea, for the notion that a person must find caution because he lives in another portion of the kingdom can receive no countenance now that the provisions of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, allow of the enforcement of a Scotch decree for expenses in any part of the United Kingdom.

With regard to the second issue, I think it is objectionable as it stands, but if it is altered in the way proposed by Mr M'Kechnie, I think the objections are removed. The letter which has been put in issue bears,—“That horrid man Macrae will never get a penny from me, and you know that as long as he keeps the key he is liable for the rent. There were several applicants for the place at a reduced rent, on account of its being occupied by him. I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath. His statement of facts were a tissue of falsehoods.” The meaning of that letter is certainly far from clear, and it seems to me that various interpretations may be put upon it. The writer may have intended to convey, and perhaps he did convey, the meaning that Dr Macrae was a horrid man in the sense that he was disagreeable, and would be mobbed because he was unpopular, and that his statement of facts were not consistent with the truth as it appeared afterwards. If so, the words are not actionable. But may they not also mean, what the pursuer says he is ready to prove they did mean, that he was dishonest? That is a possible meaning, and I do not think it is a very forced meaning. The case is not like any of those which have been cited, where the innuendo put upon the language was so forced and unnatural that the pursuer was held not entitled to appeal to a jury. With the alteration now suggested, I am disposed to allow the second issue.

<sup>1</sup> Lawson's Trustees v. British Linen Co., June 20, 1874, 1 R. 1065.

No. 83.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Macrae v.
Sutherland.

LORD MURR concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I think the view which the Court now takes in every case where it is asked to order caution for expenses is, that the matter is one for the exercise of its discretion. Here, no doubt, there are circumstances which must be taken into account in considering the matter. The pursuer has left the country, he has not paid his debts, and he is notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors Act, 1880. If the action had been an ordinary one for the recovery of money, it might have been different. But it is brought for the vindication of character, and the letters upon which it is founded were deliberately written. I think that in the exercise of our discretion we ought not to order the pursuer to find caution in such a case.

As the pursuer is willing to take the second issue, as he has now amended it, I have no objection.

LORD ADAM concurred.

The second issue was altered as follows:—"It being admitted," &c., "Whether the same is of and concerning the pursuer, and was intended to mean, and does mean, that the pursuer is of dishonourable character, and is false and calumnious, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to said interlocutor, in so far as it repels the first plea in law stated for the defender: Quoad ultra recall said interlocutor: Approve of the issues as now adjusted at the bar: Appoint the same to be the issues for the trial of the cause, and reserve all questions of expenses," &c.

DAVID BARCLAY, Solicitor—THOMAS DALGLEISH, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE DISTILLERS COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants (Reclaimers).—Balfour No. 84.
—Goudy.

ADAM DAWSON (W. & J. Russell's Trustee), Respondent.—Jameson—Salvesen.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

Sale—Constructive delivery—Possession—Bonded warehouse.—A, a distiller, sold certain parcels of whisky to B, who paid the price, leaving the whisky undelivered in A's bonded warehouse, where none but whisky from his own distillery was kept. The whisky was sold by B to a purchaser, and there were subsequently several other sub-sales, extending over a period of six years—a delivery-order being in each case intimated to A, who noted the transfer in his books and intimated to the transferee that he would be charged warehouse rent. C, the last subvendee, having become bankrupt, the trustee upon his sequestrated estate demanded delivery from A of the whisky, which had all along remained in A's warehouse at a specified rent. Held (by the Lord President, Lords Adam and

No. 84. Kinnear, diss. Lords Mure and Shand, and rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that A continued undivested owner of the whisky, and therefore had a right to retain it for a debt due to him by C.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

ON 15th October 1887 the estates of the firm of W. & J. Russell, wine-merchants, Edinburgh, were sequestrated, and Mr Adam Dawson was appointed trustee.

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
C.

The Distillers Company, Limited, who carried on business as distillers of whisky at Edinburgh, Cambus, Cameron Bridge, Carsebridge, and other places, lodged a claim on the sequestrated estate for £2335, 15s. 4d., but deducted from that sum the value of certain parcels of whisky which were in their possession, and over which they claimed a right of retention. The trustee in his deliverance ranked the company for a nett balance of £946, 4s. 2d., but he added the following qualification:—"Before drawing a dividend the trustee calls on the claimants to deliver to him the following goods purchased by the bankrupts from third parties, and lying with the claimants in their capacity as warehousekeepers, the deduction or retention of which by the claimants the trustee has disallowed as above, or otherwise to pay to the trustee the value thereof, viz.,—

2 pipes Cambus, Jany. 1884,	.	.	.	£28 13 3
7 hhds. Cambus, Aug. 1884, .	.	.	.	57 14 6
2 qrs. Cameron Bridge, May 1881, .	.	.	.	18 6 4
12 do., Feby. 1884, .	.	.	.	56 11 10

£161 5 11

And also to deliver to him 20 qrs. Carsebridge, . . .

January 1886, . . . or otherwise to pay to him the sum of . . . . . 62 18 5 as the value thereof.

£224 4 4*

The company appealed to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills against that qualification, and claimed to be ranked for a balance of £742, 13s. 10d. without the restriction proposed by the trustee. They stated,—(Cond. 1) " . . . . For the storage of whisky and other purposes of their business, bonded (or, as they are sometimes called, duty free) warehouses are owned and occupied by them at their distilleries. No whisky but such as is made by the appellants in the course of their business is kept by them in said warehouses, and, subject to the right of the Excise authorities to enter them for Excise purposes, the appellants retain the uncontrolled possession, both of the warehouses and the whisky stored therein." (Cond. 4) " . . . . The stocks or parcels of whisky, . . . . amounting in value to £224, 4s. 4d., were originally purchased from the appellants by third parties, by whom or their assignees they were subsold or assigned to the said W. & J. Russell prior to their sequestration.* Although intimation of their having acquired said stocks was made by W. & J. Russell to the appellants by transmission of delivery-orders in their favour, . . . . and although acknowledgment of said intimation was made by appellants' representatives, transferring said stocks in the appellants' books to the name of the said firm, yet said stocks were never removed out of appellants' possession but continued all along to lie in their bonded warehouses, and delivery thereof was never demanded prior to the sequestration. Forms of the appellants' acknowledgments of delivery-orders in use at Cambus, Cameron Bridge, and Carsebridge respectively are produced." *

* A memorandum lodged by the parties shewed the various transmissions. The first lot was sold by the Distillers Company to J. & G. Stewart on 12th January 1884 and paid for by them, and transferred to Watters on 25th February 1886, who transferred to W. & J. Russell on 2d March 1887.

The trustee stated, inter alia, in answer,—(Ans. 4) " . . . Explained that by the custom and practice of the whisky trade throughout Scotland, as well as at common law, delivery-orders, such as those above referred to, followed by acknowledgments thereof by warehousekeepers, constitute an absolute conveyance of the property of the whisky therein mentioned (which is specified and distinguished by the Excise numbers of the casks) from the person in whose name the whisky formerly stood in the bonded warehouse to the person in whose favour the delivery-order is granted, and that after the intimation of said delivery-order the distiller or other warehouseman in whose warehouse the whisky may be deposited holds the whisky for the person in whose favour the delivery-order is granted, as warehouseman for him. . . ."

The appellants pleaded;—(1) The appellants having a right of retention over the said stocks of whisky specified . . . are entitled to hold the same in security of W. & J. Russell's general debt, subject to their deducting the value thereof in ranking. (2) The said stocks of whisky being the undelivered property of the appellants, they are entitled to retain it against the subpurchasers' trustee for any debts due to them by the subpurchasers on general account.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Constructive delivery of the said whisky to the bankrupts having taken place by means of the intimated delivery-orders and acknowledgments and entries following thereon, and the appellants' former possession of said whisky having been converted into possession for the bankrupts or their trustee, the appellants have no lien or right of retention over said whisky for general account. (4) The appellants having no right of retention such as claimed by them over the said whisky, are bound to deliver the same to the trustee, or pay to him the value thereof as claimed in the deliverance, by way of set-off against their dividend or otherwise.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 4th July 1888, dismissed the appeal, and sustained the deliverance appealed against.†

* The delivery-orders were in these terms:—"Messrs The Distillers Company, Limited.— . . . Please deliver to the order of . . . the under-mentioned . . . butts, &c. whisky, and oblige, yours truly, . . ." The acknowledgments were in these terms:—"Dear Sir,—We beg to acknowledge receipt of delivery-order, dated 18 , granted by in your favour, and we have to intimate that rent on the casks therein specified will be charged to you from .—We are, yours obediently., THE DISTILLERS COMPANY."

† "OPINION.— . . . The facts are shortly these: The appellants sold the stocks or parcels of whisky now in question to certain persons, who paid the full price thereof. The whisky was not delivered to the purchasers, but remained in the possession of the appellants (the sellers) in their bonded store. It was quite distinguishable (by Excise marks and otherwise) from the whisky in the same store belonging to the appellants. The purchasers of the whisky in turn sold the same to the bankrupts, and received payment of the price, in return for which they granted a delivery-order addressed to the appellants intimating the sale to the bankrupts. These delivery-orders were duly intimated to the appellants, who acknowledged their receipt, and in consequence thereof transferred the said whisky in their books from the name of the original purchasers to that of the bankrupts. The whisky accordingly stood at the date of the bankruptcy in the name of the bankrupts, who were entitled to demand and obtain delivery thereof on payment of any warehouse rent or other charges due in connection therewith. At the date of the bankruptcy the bankrupts were indebted to the appellants in

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

No. 84.

The Distillers Company reclaimed.

After the case had been argued before the First Division, consisting of

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

the sum for which a ranking has been allowed by the trustee. In these circumstances, the appellants claim a right of retention over the whisky in question, not merely for warehouse charges, but also for the debt due by the bankrupts to them. The trustee disputes this right, and claims delivery of the whisky, subject to payment of warehouse charges only.

"The ground on which the appellants maintain that they have a right of retention for the debt due by the bankrupts is, that they were not merely warehousemen or custodiers of the whisky, but were at the date of the bankruptcy the undivested owners of the same. Never having delivered the whisky to the original purchasers, the property in the whisky did not pass to them, and they could not confer on the bankrupts a higher right than they had themselves, namely, a right to demand delivery. Therefore, as owners of the whisky, they plead the right to retain it on account of debt due to them by the person demanding delivery, on the authority of Melrose v. Hastie (13 D. 880), Harvey v. Wyper (23 D. 606), and other cases. I am of opinion that the right of retention claimed by the appellants cannot be sustained.

"It is undoubtedly still the law of Scotland (notwithstanding the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856) that the property in moveables does not pass to a purchaser without delivery; and if the appellants were here in a question with the original purchasers of the whisky the doctrines laid down in Melrose v. Hastie and other cases would fall to be applied. But these doctrines are plainly inapplicable to a case where delivery has taken place; and I think, in the present case, that there was delivery of the whisky to the bankrupts. The intimation of the delivery-order to the appellants, and the consequent transfer in their books of the whisky to the name of the bankrupts, operated, in my opinion, constructive delivery. 'When a delivery-order in absolute terms is presented to a warehousekeeper, and given effect to by him in the warehouse-books, that makes a complete transfer of the goods sold from the previous owner to the possessor of the delivery-order, and puts the possessor of the delivery-order in possession of the goods to the same effect as if he had bought the goods and obtained actual delivery on a contract of sale' (per L. J. C. Inglis in Anderson v. M'Call, 4 Macph. 768). The case I have just quoted from was cited to me as an authority, shewing that an intimated delivery-order was insufficient to pass the property, for in that case the delivery-order was held not to have that effect. But Anderson v. M'Call differs materially from the present case. In that case there was no sale at all; what was really attempted was to effect a security over moveables retenta possessione. Dealing with it, however, as a case of sale, it was held that the delivery-order was insufficient to pass the property, because it was a delivery-order by the seller, intimated to the seller himself, in whose custody the goods were. There was no more effected towards passing the property by entering the delivery-order in the seller's books than was effected by the entry in the seller's books debiting the purchaser with the price of the goods. The judgment in that case proceeded on the identity of the seller with the warehouseman; and in reference to that fact in its legal consequences the Lord Justice-Clerk observed,—'In order to operate constructive delivery by means of a delivery-order there must be three independent persons—the vendor, the vendee, and the custodian of the goods; and if the custodian of the goods be identical with the vendor, there ceases to be a third independent person, and therefore constructive delivery cannot in that case be effected by a delivery-order.' I think the conditions thus stated as necessary to constructive delivery are fulfilled here. There were three independent persons—Watters, the vendor; the bankrupts, vendees; and the appellants, warehousemen. The appellants were not both sellers and warehousemen quoad the bankrupts. They had sold to Watters, and been warehousemen for Watters, but the only relation in which they ever stood to the bankrupts was that of warehousemen or custodians of the goods. Whatever right remained in the appellants, arising from non-delivery to the original purchaser, was surrendered or lost when they de-

Lords Mure, Adam, and Kinnear, a joint minute was put in for the parties, No. 84. in which they concurred in the following statement:—“(1) That the parcels of whisky in question, . . . were at the date of the original sale by the appellants lying stored in bonded warehouses which belong Feb. 9, 1889. Distillers Co., Limited, v. Russell's Trustee. to the appellants at their distilleries of Cambus, Cameron Bridge, and Carsebridge; that said parcels of whisky continued to lie in said warehouses at the dates of the several subsales and of the bankruptcy of Messrs W. & J. Russell, and are still there lying; that said warehouses are occupied solely by the appellants, but are subject to the surveillance of the officers of Excise for payment of the Excise duties, and are known in Excise law as ‘distillers’ bonded warehouses’; that the appellants do not keep, and under the Excise rules it is not lawful for them to keep, any whisky in the said ‘bonded warehouses’ but such as is manufactured by themselves, but that they own and occupy a general bonded warehouse at Queensferry, in which they keep whiskies purchased by themselves for the purpose of blending, and which are there blended; that the appellants do not store any whisky except what has been, as above mentioned, either manufactured by them or purchased by them for blending. (2) That the books of the said warehouses are kept by the company's clerks as a part of their office work, and that the Excise authorities have a clerk of their own at the several warehouses for the purpose of making out and granting warrants for removal of spirits; that the appellants' clerks keep a warehouse ledger, in which is entered in separate columns the whiskies sold (described by separate numbers, indicating the quality and amount in gallons), the name and residence of the purchaser, the date of the sale, and the date from which warehouse rent is charged (it being explained that the appellants do not as a rule charge any warehouse rent for whisky unless it lies for more than six months), the date of delivery, any transfer or transfers which may take place, with the date of the transfer, and the date from which warehouse rent is charged against the transferee—these last-mentioned entries being made upon presentation by purchasers of delivery-orders by sellers in their favour.”*

It further appeared from the company's books that in the case of the first four parcels of whisky in question there had been respectively 3, 5, 7, 3, and 5 transfers, the last in each case being to W. & J. Russell.

The case was subsequently reheard by Lords Mure, Adam, and Kinnear, and was ultimately again argued before these Judges, along with the Lord President and Lord Shand.

Argued for the reclaimers;—There was no room in this case for the doctrine of constructive delivery. It had no place where, as here, there was actual possession on the part of the person to whom it fell to make delivery. It was only where the custodier was a neutral person—some livered the goods constructively to a third and independent party, who had no connection with the original sale. I am of opinion, therefore, that constructive delivery of the whisky was given to the bankrupts when it was transferred, in respect of the delivery-order to their name in the appellants' books. It follows that the appellants have no right to retain the whisky; their only right is the warehousemen's lien for warehouse charges connected therewith.”

* The following “conditions of sale” were, inter alia, intimated to all purchasers, and were printed on the back of the acknowledgments of delivery-orders granted by the company:—“Spirits in Bond.—All spirits sold and stored in the company's bonded warehouses are subject to the following conditions:— . . .
II. The spirits will be subject to a rent-charge as follows:—For casks 80 gallons and upwards, 2d. a-week; and for smaller casks, 1d. a-week, payable on demand.
III. The company reserves power to order removal of spirits from their warehouses when from want of room or other cause they find it necessary to do so. . . .”

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

one other than the original seller—that the doctrine was recognised. Here the original seller remained undivested owner, and he could give delivery in no other way than by tradition. This at anyrate was clear as in a question with the original purchaser, and it made no difference that the goods were marked off and that warehouse rent was paid for them. All that the original purchaser could give to a subpurchaser was a personal right to demand delivery of the goods—a jus ad rem, not a jus in re.<sup>1</sup> The respondent's contention came to this, that the fact of a sub-sale by the first purchaser and the acknowledgment of the receipt of the intimation of his delivery-order and the corresponding entry in the reclaimers' books of the name of the subpurchaser converted the undivested owner into a warehouseman. But why should the granting of a delivery-order give the subpurchaser a higher right than the first purchaser had had? All that the subpurchaser got from the original purchaser was, as had been argued, an assignation to a personal right to demand delivery. It was an assignation to a jus crediti, and nothing more. The cases of M'Ewan and of Melrose were cases where the goods were held in neutral custody; but that of Mathison was exactly similar to the present, only it was the seller there and not the buyer who was sequestered, and there were no subpurchasers. The Lord Ordinary in his note had misapprehended the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in Anderson v. M'Call.<sup>2</sup> There were only two persons in the present case, because the seller and the custodier were the same. It made no difference that the warehouse here contained private goods only. That fact was rather in the reclaimers' favour. And the concursum and right of retention existed all the same, however numerous the transfers were. The respondent must admit that as in a question with the original purchaser the right of retention existed. It was therefore necessary for him to say when and how the original seller became divested of his title of ownership, and this he had failed to do. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, did not touch the present question, and so far from its infringing upon the law of retention as contended for, it was an exception which was carved out of it, and was to be confined strictly within its own limits.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary's opinion was well founded. I. There was constructive delivery as between the original seller and purchaser. The decision in the case of Gibson<sup>3</sup> was not applicable to the present case, but the principles of law laid down there by Lord Moncreiff (13 S. 921) were in point. Mathison's case<sup>4</sup> did not alter that law, for the decision in that case was founded upon the doctrine of reputed ownership, which had no application here. But it was to be observed that the opinions of Lords Deas and Benholme in that case seemed to recognise that the creditors of the sellers had a higher right than the sellers themselves; and this was a view which was supported by some later authorities.<sup>5</sup> II. At anyrate, there was constructive delivery here as

<sup>1</sup> Wyper v. Harveys, Feb. 27, 1861, 23 D. 606, 33 Scot. Jur. 398; Bell's Comma. i. (5th ed.) p. 180 (7th ed. p. 191), and observations there on Broughton v. Aitchison, Nov. 18, 1809, F. C., and on Gibson v. Forbes, July 9, 1833, 11 S. 916; M'Ewan v. Smith, Jan. 14, 1847, 9 D. 434, 19 Scot. Jur. 173, aff. H. of L., 6 Bell's Appa. 340; Melrose & Co. v. Hastie & Co., March 7, 1851, 13 D. 880, 23 Scot. Jur. 398; Mathison v. Alison, Dec. 23, 1854, 17 D. 274, 27 Scot. Jur. 111.

<sup>2</sup> Anderson v. M'Call, June 1, 1866, 4 Macph. 765, 38 Scot. Jur. 405; cf. also Pochin & Co. v. Robinows & Marjoribanks, March 11, 1869, 7 Macph. 622, Lord President, p. 628, 41 Scot. Jur. 334.

<sup>3</sup> Gibson v. Forbes, 13 S. 916.

<sup>4</sup> Mathison v. Alison, 17 D. 274.

<sup>5</sup> Orr's Trustee v. Tullis, July 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 936, 42 Scot. Jur. 566; Dun-in a question with subpurchasers. The only relation which the original sellers held to the subpurchasers was that of warehousemen, and from the date of the second sale they held the goods under a limited and lower title than that of owners. The contention of the reclaimers came to this, that what was sold was not the whisky, but a jus ad rem, a right to demand delivery of it, a result which could be supported by no authority. In M'Ewan's case,<sup>1</sup> and also in that of Melrose,<sup>2</sup> there was neither actual nor constructive delivery, for the goods were in the hands of independent storekeepers. The case of Wyper<sup>3</sup> fell within the category of Mathison's case, and the law of all these cases had been modified in Orr's Trustee v. Tullis.<sup>4</sup> Taking the Lord President's definition in Anderson v. McCall of what was required to make constructive delivery, everything was satisfied here.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question we have to decide in this case arises upon a balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, and of course what is to be done in a case of that kind is to state both sides of the account as they stood at the date of the sequestration, and to strike a balance accordingly. The trustee and the appellants (the Distillers' Company) have adjusted the accounts so far between them with one exception. The bankrupts were owing the appellants considerable sums of money, and the appellants held in their hands parcels of whisky which had been bought by the bankrupts from them, but the price of which had not been paid, and in regard to these there is no question at all.

But there were other whiskies in the hands of the appellants which stood in a different position, and with reference to which this question has arisen. These parcels of whisky were sold some time ago by the appellants to a person in the trade, and the price was paid, but the goods remained in the hands of the appellants, the sellers. There are certain very important admissions in regard to this matter which it is necessary to keep in view at the outset.

In the joint minute of admissions for the parties it is stated "that the parcels of whisky in question were at the date of the original sale by the appellants lying stored in bonded warehouses which belong to the appellants at their distilleries of Cambus, Cameron Bridge, and Carsebridge; that said parcels of whisky continued to lie in said warehouses at the dates of the several sales and of the bankruptcy of Messrs W. & J. Russell, and are still there lying; that said warehouses are occupied solely by the appellants, but are subject to the surveillance of the officers of Excise for payment of the Excise duties, and are known in Excise law as 'distillers' bonded warehouses'; that the appellants do not keep, and under the Excise rules it is not lawful for them to keep, any whisky in the said 'bonded warehouses' but such as is manufactured by themselves, but that they own and occupy a general bonded warehouse at Queensferry, in which they keep whiskies purchased by themselves for the purpose of blending, and which are there blended; that the appellants do not store any whisky except what has been, as above mentioned, either manufactured by them or purchased by them for blending."

Anderson v. Jefferies' Trustees, March 4, 1881, 8 R. 563; Robertson v. M'Intyre, March 17, 1882, 9 R. 772; cf. also Bell's Comma. i. 5th edn. 183 (7th edn. 194), and English cases there quoted.

<sup>1</sup> M'Ewan v. Smith, 9 D. 434.

<sup>2</sup> Melrose & Co. v. Hastie, 13 D. 880.

<sup>3</sup> Wyper v. Harveys, 23 D. 606.

<sup>4</sup> Orr's Trustee v. Tullis, 8 Macph. 936.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

Now, with regard to the bonded warehouses at the appellants' distilleries, it is necessary to keep in view that these are, in a question like the present, simply the premises of the sellers. They are "bonded warehouses" in this sense, that the goods have not paid duty, and they are therefore under the control of the officers of Excise in this sense, that the appellants cannot deliver goods out of these warehouses except upon payment of the Excise duties. That is the single particular in which a warehouse of this description differs from the premises of an ordinary dealer in spirits. In the next place, this admission establishes one very important fact—that from the date of the original sale no delivery of these goods had been made in any sense whatever. The goods were lying at the date of the original sale in the very same warehouse in which they are now. This warehouse is not a warehouse in any other sense than this, that it is a place of custody for the use of the appellants, and of no one else. It is not a warehouse in the sense that the appellants store the goods of other people in it. That is very distinctly admitted in the passage I have just read from the joint minute. Therefore it seems to me that the state of the fact as regards the original sale is just this, that the goods were sold but not delivered.

But the party who originally purchased the goods resold them, and the question comes to be, what is the condition and what are the rights of the subvendee in such a case. The original purchaser cannot sell the goods in any proper sense, because they do not belong to him. They belong to the undivested owner, and therefore the only thing which the original purchaser can give to the subvendee is a personal right to demand delivery of the goods,—that is to say, a jus ad rem; but the original purchaser having no jus in re, he cannot give anything more. So that the goods still remain the property of the original seller. No doubt the subvendee, having received a delivery-order from the original purchaser, intimated that delivery-order to the original seller, in whose hands the goods were. What is the effect of that? Nothing but this, so far as I can see, that it is an intimation to the original seller that the original purchaser has parted with the right he had to demand delivery. He could give no more to the subvendee than he had himself. If he himself had only a jus ad rem, he could not convey to the subvendee a jus in re. The delivery-order was intimated to the original seller, and the intimation was acknowledged, and a note was made in the original seller's books that the right to ask for delivery of the goods had passed from the original purchaser to the subvendee. It is plain that that cannot operate constructive delivery, because the goods were not in the custody of a third party, but were still in the hands of the original owner of the goods, who remained undivested. Suppose that process of subvencion were repeated seven or even twenty times over, the effect would have been just the same in each case. What was passed in each subsale was just the same right that the original vendee had, and nothing more,—that is to say, the jus ad rem—the right to ask for delivery. The goods could not pass by constructive delivery, because they remained in the possession and control of the original seller.

The Lord Ordinary has, I think, somewhat misunderstood the position of the case in this respect. His Lordship quotes an observation which I made in the case of Anderson v. M'Call to this effect (4 Macph. 768),—"In order to operate constructive delivery by means of a delivery-order, there must be three independent persons—the vendor, the vendee, and the custodier of the goods; and if the custodier of the goods be identical with the vendor, there ceases to be a third independent person, and therefore constructive delivery cannot in that case be effected by a delivery-order." His Lordship then goes on to say,—

 "I think the conditions thus stated as necessary to constructive delivery are fulfilled here. There were three independent persons—Watters, the vendor; the bankrupts, vendees; and the appellants, warehousemen. The appellants were not both sellers and warehousemen quoad the bankrupts. They had sold to Watters, and been warehousemen for Watters, but the only relation in which they ever stood to the bankrupts was that of warehousemen, or custodiers of the goods." Now, there, I think, the Lord Ordinary is in error. There are not three independent persons in this case, but only two, because the vendor and the custodian of the goods are identical; and while that continues to be the case there cannot be three independent persons. There are only two—the vendor and the vendee or his representative, the subvendee—for the subvendee is only the representative of the original vendee, and comes precisely into his shoes.

No. 84.
 Feb. 9, 1889.
 Distillers Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Russell's
 Trustee.

Upon these grounds it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary is in error, and I think the goods in this case, according to all the authorities, remain the property of the original vendor. Therefore in balancing accounts with the bankrupts he is entitled to set off the security which he held over these goods by way of retention against any claim made against him on behalf of the bankrupt estate.

LORD MURK.—The whisky here in question belonged at one time to the appellants. It was sold by them several years ago, some of it as far back as 1881, to various parties, by all of whom the price was paid at the time of sale. None of it was actually delivered, but, upon the sales being effected the whisky was duly invoiced to each of the purchasers, and entered in the books of a bonded warehouse belonging to the appellants as having been sold to those purchasers, who were charged with warehouse-rent by the appellants. When stored in this warehouse the casks were so marked and numbered as to admit of their being easily identified and distinguished from casks belonging to other parties which were stored in the same warehouse, and the appellants thus became custodiers of the whisky for the purchasers.

Some time after the whiskies were so stored, they were sold by the original purchasers, and the price paid to them. On the respective sales taking place an order was given by the original purchaser, who had then become the seller, upon the appellants to deliver to the new purchaser the whisky then sold, which was duly accepted by the appellants. The name of the new purchaser was then entered by the appellants in their warehouse-book as the party to whom the whisky had been transferred, with a notandum as to the time from which warehouse rent was to be charged against him.

On that being done a letter of acknowledgment of the delivery-order in the form used by the appellants, of which copies have been produced, was sent by the appellants to the purchaser, who had presented the order, intimating that "rent on the casks therein specified will be charged" against the new purchaser by the company, which was accordingly done. The appellants in so acting were in all material respects acting as warehousemen, and as such, became custodiers of the whisky for the party who had purchased it. Each of the five parcels of whisky in question were in this way transferred by the appellants to various purchasers, whose names were entered as transferees in the appellants'

No. 84. books. By the month of May 1887 the whole five parcels had been acquired by the bankrupts, W. & J. Russell, wine-merchants in Edinburgh, and so the matter stood till the sequestration of that firm in October 1887.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

Since then the respondent, the trustee on the bankrupt estate, has applied to the appellants to hand over the whisky to him, as carried to him by the sequestration, with a view to the division of the proceeds among the creditors of the bankrupts, including the appellants. This the appellants have declined to do, on the ground that at the time of the original sale the whisky belonged to them, that it had never been actually removed from their warehouse, and was consequently never delivered, so that the property had never actually passed from them either to the first or any of the other purchasers.

The ground of the claim of retention, therefore, is that the right of property is still in the appellants, and that they are entitled to retain the whisky in payment pro tanto of their claim against the bankrupts on a general account, and to that extent to obtain a preference over the other creditors of the bankrupts. This plea has been rejected by the Lord Ordinary, on the ground that there had been constructive delivery of the whisky, as explained in his note, and in that judgment I concur.

The case is attended with some nicety and difficulty, arising from the circumstance that the appellants were the proprietors of the whisky at the time of the first sales. But apart from that circumstance, to which I will immediately advert, it was not, and I do not think it can be, disputed that what was done by the appellants, in acknowledging and giving effect to the delivery-orders in the way I have described amounted to what is called constructive delivery.

In dealing with this question Mr Bell, in the part of his work to which we were referred (vol. i. p. 183, 5th ed.), thus expresses himself,—“Where goods are lying in the hands of a warehouseman or wharfinger at the time of the sale, the transfer of them in the wharfinger's books to the name of the buyer, by order of the seller, completes the delivery, making the wharfinger henceforward the custodier for the buyer.”

In support of this view he refers to various cases both in this country and in England, and in particular, to the opinion of Lord Ellenborough in a case of this description, that of Harman v. Anderson (2 Camp. p. 243), where his Lordship said,—“The goods having been transferred into the name of the purchaser, it would shake the best established principles still to allow a stoppage in transitu. From that moment the defendants became the trustees for the purchaser, and there was an executed delivery as much as if the goods had been delivered into his own hands. The payment of the rent in these cases is a circumstance to shew on whose account the goods are held; but it is immaterial here, the transfer in the books being in itself decisive. I am clearly of opinion that the assignees are entitled to recover.” And the law is laid down to the same effect in the passage in your Lordship's opinion in the case of Anderson (4 Macph. p. 765) quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note.

Applying this rule to the present case, it is of importance to attend to what occurred at each of the transferences in question, and I take, by way of illustration, the first of the five transfers mentioned in the joint minute for the parties, that of J. & G. Stewart, the original purchasers. They sell their whisky, which was in the appellants' custody as warehousemen, to Watters, and grant an order on the appellants as their custodiers to deliver it to Watters, and that order is accepted. This the appellants could not refuse to do, for the price had been paid, and they had no claim to hold as against J. & G. Stewart. They were therefore bound to deliver, either actually or constructively, whichever was required. Watters did not want actual delivery at the time, and knowing that the appellants kept a bonded warehouse in which they stored, and held themselves out to the trade as warehousemen ready to store, whisky on payment of warehouse-rent, it was arranged that he was to get constructive delivery in the manner I have described, and that delivery is given by the appellants as in compliance with the order.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

Now, the effect of this was to give Watters constructively full possession of the whisky, "just as much," to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, "as if the goods had been delivered into his own hands." After that delivery the right, which in the person of J. & G. Stewart was a jus ad rem, became in Watters a jus in re, by the joint action of J. & G. Stewart and of the appellants, who were custodiers for Stewart. The appellants were thus by their own act divested in favour of Watters of the right of property in respect of which they now claim to retain the whisky; and the full and complete right of property passed to Watters, and through him to the bankrupts, and so was transferred to the trustee by the sequestration. The appellants therefore cannot now, in my opinion, be allowed to revert to and found upon their original right of property in the whisky as still to any extent remaining in them. It passed from them, as I have explained, and the whisky now belongs to the trustee for the general creditors of the bankrupt.

This appears to me to have been beyond doubt what must have been held to have been effected in the case of an ordinary warehouseman. The question is, Was there constructive delivery to Watters? If the whisky had been stored by J. & G. Stewart in a warehouse belonging to another party than the appellants, such a transfer as was here made would admittedly have been constructive delivery of the whisky. But it is said not to be constructive delivery, because the forms of delivery were gone through by warehousemen who had been owners of the whisky, which was still in their possession. Now, it humbly appears to me that the present is on that account rather an a fortiori case. I can myself see no good reason why the original sellers should not be allowed to make constructive delivery to Watters of property, the price of which had been paid to them, and which they had then no right to retain. They were at the time bound to deliver, for they had, by accepting the delivery-orders, agreed to deliver either actually or constructively. It is admitted that they could have done so actually, and why they should not be held to have done so constructively I must confess myself unable to comprehend. In the view I take of the case, I do not consider myself entitled in justice to parties situated as Watters then was to interpose such a difficulty in the way of a man getting possession constructively of the goods he had paid for, and of which he was entitled to get full possession; and yet that is what the appellants now contend for, and on this broad ground, as I understood the argument, that in no case could constructive delivery be given by a seller of goods which remained in his possession. But this is, I think, a misapprehension of the law in this respect.

In the part of Mr Bell's work to which I have already referred, he gives (p. 176) several instances of cases of that description to which the rule of constructive delivery would apply. One case is that of trees sold standing, which it is the practice to mark for the buyer, as to which he says,—"Such marking is good constructive delivery." Another case is that of cattle sold in a field, which

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

it is the practice "to mark with the buyer's mark, and to leave them for grazing in the enclosure of the seller, the buyer paying the rent." In England a similar rule seems to prevail. For in the case of Hurry (1 Camp. p. 462), quoted in a note by Mr Bell, goods sold and warehoused by the seller, who also kept a warehouse and charged rent against the buyer, were held to be constructively delivered. Mr Bell doubts the authority of that case, in so far as the charging of rent was of itself held to be sufficient to constitute constructive delivery; but, assuming the charging of warehouse-rent to be constructive delivery, it is a distinct decision to the effect that the circumstance that the goods warehoused had belonged to the seller, and had never been removed from his warehouse, was no bar to the application of the doctrine of constructive delivery.

So also in the case of Elmore v. Stone (1 Taunton, p. 460) where a horse-dealer who also took horses in at livery, sold a horse, and at the request of the purchaser immediately took the horse into livery at his stables, where it was taken charge of by the horsedealer's servants. In a dispute about the price the question turned on whether there had been delivery, and it was held that the horsedealer's charge of it when at livery must be held as possession for the purchaser, although the horse had never been out of the seller's possession. In giving judgment Mansfield, C. J., said—"In the present case after the defendant had said that the horses must stand at livery, and the plaintiff had accepted that order, it made no difference whether they stood at livery at the vendor's stables, or whether they had been taken away, and put in some other stable. The plaintiff possessed them from that time, not as owner of the horses but as any other livery stables' keeper might have them to keep."

Plainly therefore there is no fixed rule of law, to the effect contended for by the appellants, as applicable to their position; and, holding the question thus raised by them to be open, I am quite unable to see any grounds in law, and there are certainly none in equity, for holding that their proceedings in acting as warehousemen, and giving, in obedience to delivery-orders served on them by the sellers of goods of which they were the paid custodiers, what in law is constructive delivery of those goods, are not to receive effect.

The appellants have been holding themselves out to the trade as warehousemen who store goods on certain conditions as to payment of warehouse-rent as other warehousemen do, and goods are stored with them on those conditions, and warehouse-rent paid. They accept orders made upon them for delivery of those goods, and by doing so they undertake and contract to deliver them, and, as I have already remarked in regard to the case of Watters (and the same observation applies to all the other cases of transfers by the first purchaser), they could not have refused delivery, for they had received payment of the price of the goods, and had no grounds for refusing to act upon the orders or for withholding delivery. Watters did not require actual but asked for constructive delivery and they gave it, in a form which in law was good constructive delivery, and so passed the full right of property to Watters, which was transferred by him to the bankrupts. By so acting the appellants gave up, as it appears to me, any right of property that remained to them in the goods. Now, all this was done by the appellants in their character of ordinary warehousemen, and they cannot, as I conceive, now be allowed to set up their alleged right of property, as a ground for refusing to hand over the goods to the trustee. I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that their plea to that effect should be repelled.

In coming to this conclusion, I do not think that I am in any respect disregarding the decisions in the cases of Mathison (17 D. p. 274) or of Anderson No. 84. (4 Macph. p. 765) founded on by the appellants, in both of which judgments I should have concurred. In the case of Mathison there were only two parties concerned, viz., Mathison and Alison, the trustee on Dunlop & Company's estate, who had sold the whisky to Mathison. The sale had been entered in the sellers' books, but nothing more had been done. There had been no resale to any other party, and no delivery-order granted. The Court were unanimous in preferring the trustee on Dunlop & Company's estate, on the ground that there had been no constructive delivery, and held that the purchaser must just rank as an ordinary creditor of the bankrupt. And so also in the case of Anderson there were only two parties, viz., the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the seller and McCall & Company the purchasers. An attempt was made to shew that the goods had been transferred by an order on a third party, Angus, a storekeeper, who had entered the purchasers' name in his books. On inquiry, however, it turned out that the alleged storekeeper was only a servant acting for the seller, and that the form he had gone through could not be held to amount to more than a mere entry of the sale, and of the purchasers' name by the seller in his own books, so that there was in reality no third party concerned. The claim of the purchaser was therefore rejected.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

In the present case, however, the facts are altogether different. In each transaction, after the date of the first purchase, there have been three separate parties concerned, taking the transaction I have already given in illustration, viz., J. & G. Stewart, the original purchasers, who resold the whisky; Watters, who purchased it from them; and the appellants, who had assumed the character of the paid custodiers of the whisky for the Stewarts, and who accepted, and undertook to act upon, the delivery-order granted by the Stewarts, and in obedience to and in implement, as I think, of that order, had constructively delivered the whisky to Watters by transferring it to his name in their warehouse-books under an arrangement by which he was to be charged with the payment of warehouse-rent. This, on the grounds I have explained, completely divested the appellants, and passed the full right of property in the whisky to Watters.

On the whole matter therefore I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD SHAND.—The question in this case is, whether the appellants, the Distillers Company Limited, were entitled to retain certain parcels of whisky lying in their stores or warehouses, standing entered in their books as belonging to Messrs W. & J. Russell, who are now represented by Mr Dawson, the trustee on their sequestrated estate. They claim a right of retention, for the payment of a general balance on an account arising out of transactions between them and Messrs Russell entirely unconnected with the transactions by which the latter acquired right to the whisky in question. Mr Dawson, as trustee on the estate of Messrs Russell, and as representing their creditors, is willing to pay all warehouse charges which the Distillery Company may have for storing the goods, but he disputes their right to retain the goods for their general balance on account.

The decision of the case depends on the question whether the goods are the property of the appellants. If the goods be their property, then the appellants are entitled to plead retention as against the debt due to them by the bankrupts; if not,—if the appellants were custodiers merely at the date of Messrs Russell's

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

it is the practice "to mark with the buyer's mark, and to leave them for grazing in the enclosure of the seller, the buyer paying the rent." In England a similar rule seems to prevail. For in the case of Hurry (1 Camp. p. 462), quoted in a note by Mr Bell, goods sold and warehoused by the seller, who also kept a warehouse and charged rent against the buyer, were held to be constructively delivered. Mr Bell doubts the authority of that case, in so far as the charging of rent was of itself held to be sufficient to constitute constructive delivery; but, assuming the charging of warehouse-rent to be constructive delivery, it is a distinct decision to the effect that the circumstance that the goods warehoused had belonged to the seller, and had never been removed from his warehouse, was no bar to the application of the doctrine of constructive delivery.

So also in the case of Elmore v. Stone (1 Taunton, p. 460) where a horse-dealer who also took horses in at livery, sold a horse, and at the request of the purchaser immediately took the horse into livery at his stables, where it was taken charge of by the horsedealer's servants. In a dispute about the price, the question turned on whether there had been delivery, and it was held that the horsedealer's charge of it when at livery must be held as possession for the purchaser, although the horse had never been out of the seller's possession. In giving judgment Mansfield, C. J., said—"In the present case after the defendant had said that the horses must stand at livery, and the plaintiff had accepted that order, it made no difference whether they stood at livery at the vendor's stables, or whether they had been taken away, and put in some other stable. The plaintiff possessed them from that time, not as owner of the horses but as any other livery stables' keeper might have them to keep."

Plainly therefore there is no fixed rule of law, to the effect contended for by the appellants, as applicable to their position; and, holding the question thus raised by them to be open, I am quite unable to see any grounds in law, and there are certainly none in equity, for holding that their proceedings in acting as warehousemen, and giving, in obedience to delivery-orders served on them by the sellers of goods of which they were the paid custodiers, what in law is constructive delivery of those goods, are not to receive effect.

The appellants have been holding themselves out to the trade as warehousemen who store goods on certain conditions as to payment of warehouse-rent as other warehousemen do, and goods are stored with them on those conditions, and warehouse-rent paid. They accept orders made upon them for delivery of those goods, and by doing so they undertake and contract to deliver them, and, as I have already remarked in regard to the case of Watters (and the same observation applies to all the other cases of transfers by the first purchaser), they could not have refused delivery, for they had received payment of the price of the goods, and had no grounds for refusing to act upon the orders or for withholding delivery. Watters did not require actual but asked for constructive delivery and they gave it, in a form which in law was good constructive delivery, and so passed the full right of property to Watters, which was transferred by him to the bankrupts. By so acting the appellants gave up, as it appears to me, any right of property that remained to them in the goods. Now, all this was done by the appellants in their character of ordinary warehousemen, and they cannot, as I conceive, now be allowed to set up their alleged right of property, as a ground for refusing to hand over the goods to the trustee. I am therefore of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that their plea to that effect should be repelled.

In coming to this conclusion, I do not think that I am in any respect disregarding the decisions in the cases of Mathison (17 D. p. 274) or of Anderson No. 84: (4 Macph. p. 765) founded on by the appellants, in both of which judgments I should have concurred. In the case of Mathison there were only two parties concerned, viz., Mathison and Alison, the trustee on Dunlop & Company's estate, who had sold the whisky to Mathison. The sale had been entered in the sellers' books, but nothing more had been done. There had been no resale to any other party, and no delivery-order granted. The Court were unanimous in preferring the trustee on Dunlop & Company's estate, on the ground that there had been no constructive delivery, and held that the purchaser must just rank as an ordinary creditor of the bankrupt. And so also in the case of Anderson there were only two parties, viz., the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the seller and M'Call & Company the purchasers. An attempt was made to shew that the goods had been transferred by an order on a third party, Angus, a storekeeper, who had entered the purchasers' name in his books. On inquiry, however, it turned out that the alleged storekeeper was only a servant acting for the seller, and that the form he had gone through could not be held to amount to more than a mere entry of the sale, and of the purchasers' name by the seller in his own books, so that there was in reality no third party concerned. The claim of the purchaser was therefore rejected.

In the present case, however, the facts are altogether different. In each transaction, after the date of the first purchase, there have been three separate parties concerned, taking the transaction I have already given in illustration, viz., J. & G. Stewart, the original purchasers, who resold the whisky; Watters, who purchased it from them; and the appellants, who had assumed the character of the paid custodiers of the whisky for the Stewarts, and who accepted, and undertook to act upon, the delivery-order granted by the Stewarts, and in obedience to and in implement, as I think, of that order, had constructively delivered the whisky to Watters by transferring it to his name in their warehouse-books under an arrangement by which he was to be charged with the payment of warehouse-rent. This, on the grounds I have explained, completely divested the appellants, and passed the full right of property in the whisky to Watters.

On the whole matter therefore I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD SHAND.—The question in this case is, whether the appellants, the Distillers Company Limited, were entitled to retain certain parcels of whisky lying in their stores or warehouses, standing entered in their books as belonging to Messrs W. & J. Russell, who are now represented by Mr Dawson, the trustee on their sequestrated estate. They claim a right of retention, for the payment of a general balance on an account arising out of transactions between them and Messrs Russell entirely unconnected with the transactions by which the latter acquired right to the whisky in question. Mr Dawson, as trustee on the estate of Messrs Russell, and as representing their creditors, is willing to pay all warehouse charges which the Distillery Company may have for storing the goods, but he disputes their right to retain the goods for their general balance on account.

The decision of the case depends on the question whether the goods are the property of the appellants. If the goods be their property, then the appellants are entitled to plead retention as against the debt due to them by the bankrupts; if not,—if the appellants were custodiers merely at the date of Messrs Russell's

Feb. 9, 1889.
*Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.*

No. 84. sequestration in October 1887,—then they are only entitled to withhold the goods until they receive payment of their warehouse charges under the right of lien which they have as warehousemen or custodiers of the goods.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

The question raised is important, and I think it is a new question. Hitherto, so far as I am aware, the Court in the cases which have occurred for decision has had to deal only with rights of retention pleaded by a seller in respect of claims by him against the original buyer. The right of retention for that class of debts has been maintained against the buyer's creditors, where the seller has become bankrupt, and also against subpurchasers. In this case no such claim is made, and no such claim exists. The appellants, the original sellers of the whisky, have no right of retention in respect of claims against the original purchaser. But although the right to the goods has been acquired by a series of subpurchasers, and was ultimately acquired by Messrs Russell, the appellants, founding on an alleged right of property in the goods, claim a right of retention against Messrs Russell, the last of the subpurchasers, because of a debt due by them on general account.

The position of the different parcels of whisky is detailed in the appendix No. 2 and joint minute for the parties, boxed 22d November last. In all of the cases the appellants sold the goods several years ago, and at the time of the sale, or shortly afterwards, they received the price of each parcel sold. From that date down to 1887 a variety of transfers of the goods have taken place. In the case of one of the parcels, consisting of two quarters of whisky, there have been six transferences since the goods were originally purchased from the appellants in May 1881. In two other cases there have been four such transfers and in the remaining cases two transfers. In each of these cases the original purchaser, having paid the price and resold the goods, granted a delivery-order addressed to the appellants in the terms stated in the joint minute, and this order having been intimated to them the appellants immediately made entries of the transfer in their warehouse-ledger, taking the goods out of the name of the original purchaser, and entering them in the name of the subpurchaser. At the same time they granted an acknowledgment by letter to the subpurchaser of the receipt of the delivery-order, adding—"And we have to intimate that rent on the casks" therein specified will "be charged to you" from a date specified, being the day on which the delivery-order was intimated to them; and appended to these letters were certain conditions specifying the rate of rent to be thereafter charged against the transferee for warehousing the goods. In the case of each transfer by the subpurchaser in favour of another subpurchaser the same course was pursued—the delivery-order intimated, the transfer of the goods recorded in the appellants' books, and the goods transferred to the name of the transferee, and an acknowledgment of the delivery-order issued with an intimation that the new subpurchaser would be charged rent at the rate specified.

The appellants are possessed of large bonded warehouses at their different distilleries of Cambus, Cameron Bridge, and Carsebridge, in which whisky manufactured by them is stored. In these bonded warehouses they have been in use for a number of years, by arrangement with persons dealing with them, to allow the goods to remain on storage rent, and each quantity of whisky as purchased is not only entered in the name of the purchaser, and transferred from time to time to subpurchasers in the manner just explained, but the different casks are marked so as to be readily identified as being the goods speci-fully described in the delivery-orders and transfer entries. The information furnished by the parties does not shew in detail the extent to which the company store or warehouse the goods of others as compared with their own stock ; but there can, I think, be no doubt that whisky belonging to themselves and unsold must form a small proportion of the total quantity of goods in their bonded warehouses. Goods sold by them during a number of years have been constantly in use to be left in their custody for payment of warehouse-rents, while I should suppose that as manufacturers they will endeavour to make sales of their own goods as soon after they are manufactured as possible.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

In considering the effect of the appellants' sales, the delivery-orders and acknowledgments in the terms already mentioned, and transfer entries in their books, as bearing on their claim to be now proprietors of all the whisky in their warehouses, it appears to me to be of much importance to have in view the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1856. Prior to that statute several cases had occurred in which, although the sellers of goods had received full payment of the price and implement of the contract on the part of the buyer, their creditors on their bankruptcy were held entitled to refuse delivery to the buyer or his creditors, and thus they got the benefit first of the price of the goods, which the bankrupt had received, and next of the value of the goods themselves. Even in the case of a subpurchaser, who in his turn had paid the price of the goods to the first purchaser, and had obtained and intimated a delivery-order, the original seller, notwithstanding the receipt of the price due to him, and the fact that he held the goods merely as an accommodation to the buyer and for his behoof, was held entitled to a right of retention for a balance due to him by the first purchaser on new and different transactions. It appears to me to be impossible to dispute that these cases resulted in serious injustice. I am humbly of opinion that it was not a creditable state of the law that in such circumstances the rights of purchasers who had paid for their goods should have been defeated, and that the sellers, who had obtained payment of the price of the goods, which were left in their possession admittedly by arrangement for custody only, or their creditors, should still be entitled to refuse delivery. The decisions were rested partly on the doctrine that until delivery of goods under a contract of sale was made, the right of property or jus in re remained with the seller, and partly on the doctrine of reputed ownership, or at least on the view that merchants were entitled to assume that goods which were in their debtors' possession were their property—that to hold otherwise would enable sellers to obtain fictitious credit,—and that this was a good reason for refusing to give effect to constructive delivery. This last was the express ground of judgment of Lord Deas and Lord Benholme in the case of Mathison v. Alison. In regard to the first of these grounds the result was arrived at by the application of the principle expressed in the brocard, traditionibus non nudis pactis transferuntur rerum dominia.

It has always seemed to me that that principle was carried to an extreme length in the cases I refer to—I mean more particularly the cases of Melrose v. Hastie and Mathison v. Alison, neither of which unfortunately was reviewed in the House of Lords—that in these cases the principle received effect in circumstances which did not warrant its application. I assume it to have been clearly established in the law of Scotland—as I believe it to have been properly so established—that where there was a simple contract of sale with nothing following on it the property should remain with the seller. But where some-

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

thing material had followed beyond the nudum pactum, where the seller had been actually paid the price of the goods, had entered the goods in his books as belonging to the purchaser, and had set them aside and earmarked and retained them in his premises by arrangement with the buyer for custody only, I am humbly of opinion that that the brocard traditionibus non nudis pactis transferuntur rerum dominia had no proper application. I should perhaps rather say it had been fully satisfied, because the bare agreement, the nudum pactum, had been followed and clothed by implement on the part of the buyer, and by acts on the part of the contracting parties, which constituted constructive delivery. Happily, however, by the legislation of 1856 the gross injustice which had been done to buyers who had not only bought but paid for their goods was in a great measure removed as regards the subsequent dealings of traders; and in the case of subpurchasers who had intimated their purchases by delivery-orders or otherwise to the original seller all possible right of retention on the seller's part on the ground of any claim of indebtedness against the original buyer on other transactions was abolished. It is true that the enactments of the statute do not alter the legal principle that the seller of goods retains a right of property in them, or jus in re until delivery, actual or constructive; but the statute provided a remedy for the injustice, and, as I think, the mischief of the law, as it had been interpreted by decisions, to an extent which it appears to me materially affects the decision of the present case. After an examination of the statute with reference to the change effected in the law, Lord Blackburn observed in the case of M'Bean v. Wallace & Company, 8 R. (H. of L.) 112—"The chief practical difference arising from the jus in re remaining in the vendor and the jus ad rem going to the purchaser was that the vendor's creditors by poinding and by sequestration could take the goods. There is a nominal difference still between the law of England and the law of Scotland; but for all practical purposes the law of Scotland, where there has been a contract of sale though no delivery, is made identical with the law of England in the actual result." In the case of a subpurchaser particularly who has intimated his subpurchase, it seems to me that his Lordship's words are literally true.

The appellants in this case set up a claim of property to the goods which they sold years ago, and the right to which in some cases has, as I have observed, passed through several parties till it became vested in the bankrupts. They have admittedly no claim whatever to hold the goods against the purchaser from them. They have received the price, and even if the original purchasers were debtors to them in account, they cannot on that ground maintain any right to retain the goods against a subpurchaser who by intimation of the delivery-order has intimated his subpurchase. The only means by which the appellants could have acquired such a right was not by asserting any right of property in the goods, but by resorting to the diligence of arrestment of their debtor's goods—i.e., the goods of the original purchaser—in their own hands, a diligence which is competent to all other creditors of the purchaser, but which must be resorted to before intimation of the subsale.

It is in these circumstances that the legal effect of the intimated subpurchase, the transfer of the goods in the books of the company, and the intimation of a charge for rent is to be considered,—and that in a question with persons who, as part of their ordinary business, store goods for rent. It humbly appears to me that the result of the dealing between the appellants as the original sellers —who can no longer retain the goods on account of any obligation of the purchaser from them—and subpurchasers, is that constructive delivery of the goods has been given to the latter. The system on which the company acts, and has acted for years, in my opinion makes them (as the Lord Ordinary has held) warehousemen or storekeepers in a question with subpurchasers with whom they have dealings; and it is only right that this should be so, for much the greater part of the goods in their warehouse is held for subpurchasers and for payment of warehouse rent. There is no doubt that if the delivery-orders and relative intimations and transfer entries in the company's books had occurred in the case of goods stored in an ordinary public warehouse, that would have been conclusive in the respondents' favour. Why should the result be different in the case of the appellants, who are to a large extent warehouse or storekeepers, although they do not receive and store whisky other than their own manufacture? It is said that the legal effect is different because they were originally sellers of the goods. The provisions of the statute have destroyed the rights of retention which persons in their position formerly had, at least to the extent I have already stated; and these provisions have at the same time, as it appears to me, made it also more easy than formerly for persons buying from the original purchasers to obtain from the appellants constructive delivery of the goods so bought and warehoused with them; and for the appellants to give such delivery. The appellants were bound to give actual delivery if asked, as they could not retain the goods even if the original purchaser owed them a general balance, and there is every presumption in favour of constructive delivery and against the notion that the subpurchaser would elect so to transact as to leave the appellants owners of the goods which he merely stored with them.

I do not know whether it is maintained by the appellants that they cannot give constructive delivery of goods of which they were the original sellers, and which have continued to lie in their warehouse. If that be maintained, I think the contention is clearly unsound. Lord Mure has given several instances of constructive delivery of subjects purchased and left with the seller, even where the seller did not hold himself out, as the appellants do, as warehousekeepers for rent. Professor Bell mentions the case of the purchaser of a vase who, having paid for it, leaves it with the seller to have certain work executed on it. A person may purchase a horse, and having paid the price, may leave the animal with the seller at livery, or let it to the seller on hire. Surely it could not be successfully maintained that the purchaser of the vase must take it up and carry it outside the seller's premises and return with it, or that the purchaser must take his horse outside of the stable, when he may take it back again, in order to have effectual delivery. The constructive delivery is surely complete without any such proceeding of personal apprehension and removal of the subject from the seller's premises. The law, as I understand it, does not require this form to be gone through, for it would be little more than a mere form. Constructive delivery is complete by payment, followed by the new contract or arrangement made with the seller, which entirely changes his title to the goods from one of property to one of depositary, hirer, or otherwise. So also with a purchaser of cattle who, having paid the price, agrees to leave the cattle for grazing at a rent or charge agreed on. The constructive delivery, I cannot doubt, would be quite as effectual as actual delivery by the removal of the cattle by the purchaser outside of the seller's field and putting them back

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

again. A purchaser of books may leave them to be bound with a seller who also carries on business as a bookbinder; and such instances might be indefinitely multiplied. Whether anything can be maintained against constructive delivery being allowed by the law or not, because of the doctrine of reputed ownership, is a different matter, to which I shall refer immediately. But apart from this, I can see no reason to doubt that in the cases which I have mentioned constructive delivery would, in bona fide transactions, be quite as effectual as actual delivery by the removal of the subjects purchased from the custody of the seller.

And so also in the case of a general warehouse or store. A purchaser of goods, desirous of leaving them with the warehouseman and willing to pay rent for them, intimates his delivery-order and gets the goods transferred in the warehouse books to his name. There has been no actual delivery or personal taking possession of the goods. But the constructive delivery is complete, because the contract of deposit with the subpurchaser has been completed. This illustration shews, as the other illustrations do, that it is not correct or true to say that the purchaser must take physical possession of goods purchased. That is certainly not required, and if delivery with its legal consequences be effected in the case of a warehouseman, or in the other cases I have mentioned, it must, as it appears to me, be equally effected in the case of goods lying with a seller where the price is paid and the goods are left, entirely because of a new arrangement, that the seller shall hold them on deposit, or shall so hold them and store them in return for a certain charge or rent. I cannot assent to the view that a seller, by the law of this country, cannot effectually make such an arrangement, nor can I believe that such constructive delivery, if the facts are clear and the bona fides of the parties is evident, is not as effectual as actual delivery would be. I do not regard an arrangement to pay rent as at all essential or necessary, though the payment of rent is a clear piece of evidence as to the true nature of the agreement of the parties. If the purchaser were by his servants, in his dealings with the appellants (and I say the same of subpurchasers), to roll the puncheons of whisky out of the store in order to take actual possession and to roll them back again, but clearly on an arrangement for custody and deposit only, this would be taking actual delivery. Surely constructive delivery can be given and taken without going through this process. I cannot doubt that if on the occasion of the intimation of the delivery-orders by the original purchasers of the goods in question being intimated to the appellants—who, as I have shewn, were bound to give actual delivery if asked, because they could have no claim to retain the goods for a debt due by the purchaser—the appellants had acknowledged the order, and in their letter had undertaken expressly to hold the goods for the subpurchasers as warehousemen or custodiers for rent for their accommodation, the delivery would have been effectual. But this would only have been the giving and taking of constructive and not actual delivery.

And in effect this in my opinion was what occurred in reference to the goods now in question. The appellants had no power to hold them for a day after the original buyer demanded them, and his subpurchaser was in a position to take either actual or constructive delivery as he chose. Is there any reason for saying he preferred to take neither, but to leave his original sellers that jus in re which they now seek to plead and enforce after all that has occurred? The appellants are warehousemen—though they only agree to store goods of their own manufacture—for they have regular stores which are largely used by third parties who arrange to pay storage rents or charges ; and when goods are transferred by the original buyer, who, having paid the price and been under no obligation of any kind to the seller, is under the statute to all practical effects the owner (the seller having no possible right of retention of the goods)—when the transfer is duly recorded in the warehouse books—and an intimation given to the subpurchaser that henceforth “rent” will be charged against him for the goods—I am of opinion that the goods are then left with the appellants and accepted by them as custodiers or warehousemen for custody on rent. Under this arrangement they cannot, in my opinion, rear up or revert to their former right of ownership,—an empty right which, if it existed at all when the subsale was intimated, had then no legal effect or consequences even in a question with the original purchaser. If I be right in so thinking, of course they cannot obtain the preference they now seek to gain over the general creditors of Messrs Russell.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

The view I have now stated does not conflict with the decision in the case of Anderson v. McCall & Company, on which much of the appellants' argument was based. I should without difficulty have concurred in the decision of that case—for as soon as it was settled that the storekeeper Angus was merely a servant of Jackson & Son, the owners of the goods there in dispute, and that, therefore, in giving a delivery-order on him they were merely giving an order on themselves, the case resolved into an attempt on the part of persons giving an advance on moveable property to have an effectual pledge although the property was left entirely in the debtors' hands. Jackson & Son continued themselves to hold the sugars, on the security of which their creditors made the advances, and an undertaking to hold these sugars, which were their own property in every sense of the word, in their own possession for behoof of a particular creditor was of course ineffectual, because a pledge cannot be given by a debtor who continues in possession of it. The law is entirely different in a case of purchase and sale where the price has been paid. It seems to me accordingly, that the dicta in the case of Anderson v. McCall, founded on by the appellants, must be regarded as obiter in a question like this of purchase and sale and subsales followed by the dealings above detailed. The passage mainly founded on in the opinion of your Lordship is as follows :—“In order to operate constructive delivery by means of a delivery-order there must be three independent persons,—the vendor, the vendee, and the custodian of the goods ; and if the custodian of the goods be identical with the vendor there ceases to be a third independent person ; and therefore constructive delivery cannot in that case be effected by a delivery-order. That is the clear law of Scotland, which is well established, and has received effect in a number of cases. Applying that rule of law, I am of opinion that this verdict is for the pursuers.” If that passage be read as limited in its application to such a case as that of McCall, where it was attempted to make a security effectual over moveables retenta possessione of the owner, I entirely agree with it. But it has no relation, I think, to a case like this, where subpurchasers' rights at common law and under the statute are in question. In that case there was no subpurchase and no delivery-order by the first purchaser to a subpurchaser who had paid for the goods. In this case in each subpurchase there were three parties concerned, and for the reasons I have explained I think the appellants, who were one of these parties, and who were the custodians of the goods, were truly third parties, although they had at one time been owners and sellers of the goods. It is said there were only two persons, viz., the original

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

sellers or owners and the buyers or their mandatories or assignees. This seems to me to be begging the whole question. The original sellers had in my opinion become custodiers or warehousemen of the goods by contract. In any case they had a double character. The subpurchasers had acquired an independent position. It is only by regarding the appellants as sellers and owners only that their argument can be maintained, for they could not be custodiers of their own property. But if the appellants were custodiers only, as I think they were by contract, having lost any right of property after constructive delivery of the goods, there were plainly three persons taking part in each subseal and delivery.

In my opinion, however, as already explained, I do not think that it is in the least degree necessary to constructive delivery that three persons shall take part in the transaction.

No question arises here of reputed ownership, or of the supposed inference as to ownership, to be drawn from the mere possession of goods, which to a large extent entered into the decision of the cases of Melrose v. Hastie and Mathison v. Alison, and formed the ground of judgment of Lord Deas and Lord Benholme in the case of Mathison. The appellants are here themselves only claiming their contract rights. They are not represented by creditors who might plead that they had been induced to give credit because of continued possession of goods allowed to their debtor. But even if the question had occurred with creditors of the appellants seeking to gain the preference over the general creditors of the subpurchasers which the appellants now do, I am clearly of opinion that the plea of apparent or reputed ownership would not avail. If the appellants are the owners they must succeed in their plea of retention on that ground. If they are not, there is no room for saying that the subpurchasers have so acted as to warrant third parties to assume or believe that the appellants were the owners. In the case of M'Bain v. Wallace & Company this subject was discussed in reference to a ship in the course of being built in the shipbuilders' yard, and the plea did not receive much countenance—and the cases of Orr's Trustee, 8 Macph. 936, and Robertson, 9 R. 772, are recent authorities shewing that the title of possession is the point to which persons must look in giving credit to others. In Professor Bell's Principles, sec. 1315, he says,—“Possession alone is not a ground on which moveables shall be made to answer for the debt of the possessor, or on which creditors are entitled to rely, for the goods in their debtor's possession may be with him, not as owner, but under some contract requiring temporary possession. Hence every legitimate cause of possession makes an exception to the credit of apparent ownership. So, in Commodate, the possession of the borrower is no lawful ground of credit to him. In Hiring, neither the subject let nor materials in the hands of a workman under locatio operis can afford a fair ground of enlarged credit to the possessor. In Deposit, though the thing deposited may appear as part of the custodian's stock, it remains separate on his bankruptcy as the property of the depositor.” This seems to me to be quite applicable to the present case, and to be conclusive. I do not think that because goods for the buyer's convenience are left in a seller's warehouse after being sold and the price paid, there is ground for reputed ownership,—especially now, having regard to the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act as affecting the rights of sellers and their creditors. And in so far as the judgments of Melrose v. Hastie and Mathison v. Alison proceeded on that view, they were, I think, unwarranted. In some of the cases on this branch of the law Judges have said it was the buyers' own fault that they did not take actual delivery, and that they must take the consequence. I see no fault in the matter, nor do I see any reason for this consequence, viz., that they should lose the goods they had paid for. The exigencies of business and the convenience of merchants (and I think the convenience of trade should have great weight in such questions) often require, or at least make it highly desirable, that goods bought and paid for should remain with the original seller, not as his goods, but on the contract of deposit. If this be arranged, constructive delivery results. The transaction cannot be held invalid or ineffectual because third parties choose to infer without warrant that the possession of an original seller is necessarily continuous as the possession arising from ownership, whatever may have been the seller's contracts or dealing with his goods.

Finally, I think reputed ownership is out of the question with reference to such a business as that of the appellants, whose warehouses in the knowledge of everyone dealing with them are so much used for the storing of goods sold often years before by the appellants to third parties.

I am on the whole of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is sound, and that it should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—By the law of Scotland the property of goods sold but not delivered remains with the seller.

Nothing but delivery, actual or constructive, will pass the property.

There has been no actual delivery in this case. The whisky sold is now, and has all along been, in the possession of the Distillers Company. It lies now, and has lain all along, in the cellars or warehouse of the company.

Has there, then, been constructive delivery? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that if the company were here in a question with the original purchaser, they must have prevailed. I agree with him, for I think that the cases of Mathison v. Alison and Wyper v. Harvey rule this case. In the case of Mathison v. Alison, as in this case, the whisky sold remained in the seller's warehouse, but the price of the whisky was paid by the vendee, an invoice was sent to him, and the sale recorded in the warehouse-books of the seller. But the Court held that all this did not operate constructive delivery, that the vendor remained the undivested owner of the goods, and that what passed to the vendee was a right to demand delivery of the goods sold.

The only difference that I see between this case and that of Mathison v. Alison is that on the invoice sent to the vendee there is endorsed, as a condition of the sale, that the spirits would be held free of rent-charge for six months in the company's casks, and twelve months in customer's casks, from date of invoice, and that thereafter the spirits should be subject to a rent-charge of 1d. or 2d. a-week, as the case might be.

It is said, as I understand, that the effect of this condition was that thereafter the vendor held the goods, not in his title of undivested owner, but as a warehouseman under an implied contract to that effect.

It is, I think, quite settled that, if the owner of goods delivers them to a warehouseman, or other neutral custodian, to hold them for him, an order by the owner to the custodian to deliver them to the purchaser, intimated to the custodian, will operate as constructive delivery of the goods, and transfer the property of them to the purchaser.

Your Lordship, in the case of Pochin v. Robinow, 7 Macph. 622, thus states the law in this respect,—“Constructive delivery may take place, and generally does

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

No. 84.
 Feb. 9, 1889.
 Distillers Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Russell's
 Trustee.

sellers or owners and the buyers or their mandatories or assignees. This seems to me to be begging the whole question. The original sellers had in my opinion become custodiers or warehousemen of the goods by contract. In any case they had a double character. The subpurchasers had acquired an independent position. It is only by regarding the appellants as sellers and owners only that their argument can be maintained, for they could not be custodiers of their own property. But if the appellants were custodiers only, as I think they were by contract, having lost any right of property after constructive delivery of the goods, there were plainly three persons taking part in each subseal and delivery.

In my opinion, however, as already explained, I do not think that it is in the least degree necessary to constructive delivery that three persons shall take part in the transaction.

No question arises here of reputed ownership, or of the supposed inference as to ownership, to be drawn from the mere possession of goods, which to a large extent entered into the decision of the cases of Melrose v. Hastie and Mathison v. Alison, and formed the ground of judgment of Lord Deas and Lord Benholme in the case of Mathison. The appellants are here themselves only claiming their contract rights. They are not represented by creditors who might plead that they had been induced to give credit because of continued possession of goods allowed to their debtor. But even if the question had occurred with creditors of the appellants seeking to gain the preference over the general creditors of the subpurchasers which the appellants now do, I am clearly of opinion that the plea of apparent or reputed ownership would not avail. If the appellants are the owners they must succeed in their plea of retention on that ground. If they are not, there is no room for saying that the subpurchasers have so acted as to warrant third parties to assume or believe that the appellants were the owners. In the case of M'Bain v. Wallace & Company this subject was discussed in reference to a ship in the course of being built in the shipbuilders' yard, and the plea did not receive much countenance—and the cases of Orr's Trustee, 8 Macph. 936, and Robertson, 9 R. 772, are recent authorities shewing that the title of possession is the point to which persons must look in giving credit to others. In Professor Bell's Principles, sec. 1315, he says,—“Possession alone is not a ground on which moveables shall be made to answer for the debt of the possessor, or on which creditors are entitled to rely, for the goods in their debtor's possession may be with him, not as owner, but under some contract requiring temporary possession. Hence every legitimate cause of possession makes an exception to the credit of apparent ownership. So, in Commodate, the possession of the borrower is no lawful ground of credit to him. In Hiring, neither the subject let nor materials in the hands of a workman under locatio operis can afford a fair ground of enlarged credit to the possessor. In Deposit, though the thing deposited may appear as part of the custodier's stock, it remains separate on his bankruptcy as the property of the depositor.” This seems to me to be quite applicable to the present case, and to be conclusive. I do not think that because goods for the buyer's convenience are left in a seller's warehouse after being sold and the price paid, there is ground for reputed ownership,—especially now, having regard to the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act as affecting the rights of sellers and their creditors. And in so far as the judgments of Melrose v. Hastie and Mathison v. Alison proceeded on that view, they were, I think, unwarranted. In some of the cases on this branch of the law Judges have said it was the buyers' own fault that they did not take actual delivery, and vendor and the subvendee, as coming in place of the original vendee. There is No. 84.

no third party concerned, independent or otherwise.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Distillers Company have all along been in possession of the goods in question on their title of undivested owners, and that they are entitled to retain them against the general balance due to them by the bankrupts.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

Of course the number of times any particular parcel of whisky may have been transferred can make no difference in the result.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and therefore I need hardly say that I also agree with Lord Shand in thinking that the doctrine of reputed ownership has no bearing whatever on this question. The only point which we have to consider is, whether the goods have or have not been delivered to the bankrupts who are now represented by the trustee on their sequestrated estate.

If it could have been considered an open question whether the property of the goods had passed to the first purchaser, it might have been a question of some difficulty, and at all events it would have required serious consideration.
But all your Lordships are of opinion, along with the Lord Ordinary, that that question is absolutely concluded by authority, and accordingly we are all agreed, as I understand, that the goods were not delivered to the first purchaser, and that they remained with the sellers as undivested owners. Now, that being so, it follows as a necessary consequence that the position of the first purchaser was that of creditor in a personal obligation binding upon the seller to deliver the goods, and that was the only right which the first purchaser could give to any subpurchaser from him. He could not deliver the goods to his own purchaser, because they had not been delivered to him, and were not in his possession.
All he could do was to put the subpurchaser in his place, and enable him to go to the seller and ask for delivery. And accordingly I do not understand that those of your Lordships who agree with the Lord Ordinary are prepared to hold that delivery was given by the first purchaser to the subpurchaser. I rather think that the view which your Lordships have adopted is, that the original vendor must be held to have made delivery to the subpurchaser upon intimation being given to him of the first purchaser's assignation. But then the original vendor did nothing more upon that assignation being intimated to him than he was bound to do whether he intended to deliver to the subpurchaser or not, because, as both Lord Mure and Lord Shand have pointed out, he had no alternative after the intimation to him that the goods which he held for the first purchaser had been assigned by that purchaser to a subpurchaser, except to acknowledge that he had received that intimation, and to make the corresponding entries in his books, which placed the subpurchaser in the position of the original buyer. Now, if that was what he was bound to do whether he delivered or not, I have great difficulty in seeing how constructive delivery could thereby be effected. But there is a further difficulty, because the reason why it is held that the property had not passed to the first purchaser is that no written obligation or book entry will make delivery, so long as the goods remain in the uncontrolled possession of the vendor; and if the vendor's writing does not constitute delivery to the first purchaser, it would seem to follow that it cannot operate as delivery to a second or third.

I cannot help thinking that some perplexity has been introduced into the argu-

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustee.

ment by the confusion of questions of law with questions of fact. Whether delivery is or is not necessary to pass the property, is a question of law. But when it has been held that delivery is necessary in law,—and we are all agreed that it is necessary,—then the question whether it has taken place or not is a mere question of fact. Constructive delivery, as that term is used in our law, is delivery in fact, just as much as actual delivery, because delivery with us must always mean change of possession. When goods sold are in the natural possession of the seller, the only way of delivering them is to hand them over to the buyer, or to somebody who shall hold for him. When they are not in the seller's hands, but in the hands of a third person subject to the seller's order, then delivery of an order upon the custodier, and intimation of that order to him, is just as much delivery in fact as if goods which had not previously passed out of the hands of the seller had been handed over by him to the buyer in performance of the contract of sale, because the intimation of the delivery-order determines the possession of the seller and gives to the buyer the same kind of possession as the seller had before. And, therefore, as your Lordship pointed out in the case of Pochin, 7 Macph. 622, it is essential to the completion of constructive delivery that the goods should be in the hands of an independent third person, and not of the owner.

I think there is an unfortunate confusion in the argument, arising from the use of the term "delivery" as if it meant transfer of title and not change of possession. It is so used in several of the cases in which it has been held that delivery may be dispensed with, from necessity; and it appears to be with this signification that it is used in the English case to which we have been referred. But, as the law is now settled, by decisions binding upon us, I understand constructive delivery to import, like actual delivery, that the goods which have been bought and sold are taken out of the possession of the seller and put into the possession of the buyer. And there can be no question that where goods are in the hands of an independent custodier there is a very effectual change of possession by the intimation of a delivery-order, because the seller's control and power of disposal is transferred to the buyer. The civil possession which he had held, through the custodier, is transferred in performance of the contract. But where the goods are in the custody of the seller himself, there can be no change of possession so long as they remain in his custody, unless it be assumed, contrary to the fundamental principle of our law, that the property has passed by the contract of sale without delivery. If that were the law, it might be accurate enough to say that the buyer was in the civil possession of goods which remained in the custody of the seller, and the term delivery might, without impropriety, be referred to the transference of the title, and not merely to the transference of the goods themselves. But if delivery of the subject of the contract of sale is necessary to transfer the property, and the only question is, whether it has taken place in fact, it cannot, with any accurate use of language, be said that delivery has been effected by written documents, which merely repeat or acknowledge the personal obligations of the contract of sale.

It is, however, quite possible that the sellers of goods in the position in which this Distillers Company stands may place themselves by contract, or by a course of conduct, in such a position towards a buyer that they would be precluded from maintaining the right of retention which would otherwise arise from their right of property as undivested owners of goods sold but not delivered. If a seller had undertaken to deliver in terms that would prevent him from pleading a right of retention against a subpurchaser, he must deliver according to his undertaking. And therefore the question comes to be whether there is anything in the letter of acknowledgment to suggest such an obligation as that. For the reasons to which I have already referred I think there is nothing, because the sellers have done nothing which they were not bound to do, whether they were to give delivery or not. They admit that they hold for the subpurchaser, but they hold for him in the place of the original purchaser; and the effect of their acknowledgment that they hold for him must depend upon the extent of their antecedent right.

No. 84.

Feb. 9, 1889.
Distillers Co.,
Limited, v.
Russell's
Trustees.

They hold for the subpurchaser as the assignee under an intimated assignation. But the assignee is in the same position as his cedent as regards the vendor. The vendor still remains undivested owner under obligation to deliver when called on to do so unless he is entitled to retain for the performance of the obligations of the assignee.

If that is the position at common law I do not think that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, makes any difference. The effect of that Act has been repeatedly considered, and its effect in a question of this kind was fully discussed in the case of Wyper v. Harveys. According to that judgment the statute makes the following changes upon the common law. Where goods have been sold, but not delivered, it excludes the diligence of the seller's creditors, and the title of a trustee in a sequestration of his estates, in competition with the purchaser, or anyone in his right, enforcing delivery in terms of the contract of sale. In the case of a subpurchase the effect is that when a subpurchaser has intimated his subpurchase to the seller, the seller is precluded from pleading against him a right of retention against the first purchaser for a general balance, and he is no longer entitled upon that ground to refuse delivery to the subpurchaser. But these are the only restrictions introduced by that Act upon the rules of the common law, and therefore although the statute prevents the seller from pleading in a question with a subpurchaser the right of retention which he had against the first purchaser, it does not prevent him from pleading retention for a general balance due by the subpurchaser himself. I am very sensible of the weight which is due to the considerations of mercantile convenience to which Lord Shand has adverted. But that is a question for the Legislature, not for us. If the Legislature, when it amended the common law with reference to the rights of seller and purchaser, restricted these in one respect and not in another, we must give effect to the common law, so far as it remains unaltered. I am therefore of opinion that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act does not affect this case. The only question is whether there has been delivery in point of fact, and since there has been no delivery, I think the appellants are entitled to retain the goods for the general balance due to them by the sequestrated estate.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and the deliverance of the trustee appealed from, and remit to the trustee to rank the appellants for the sum of £742, 13s. 10d., and to allow them to retain the whisky in dispute as their own property: Find the appellants entitled to expenses," &c.

FLAHER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 85. MRS MARY GOUK OR SCOTT AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Law.
 HENRY MONCREIFF HORSBRUGH (William Begg Scott's Trustee),
 Defendant (Respondent).—C. K. Mackenzie.

Feb. 20, 1889.
 Scott v.
 Scott's Trust-
 tees.

Salæ retenta possessione—Reputed ownership—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 1.—Certain creditors of an insolvent agreed to accept a composition of 8s. per pound in full of their claims. A, the insolvent's mother-in-law, one of the creditors, took his furniture, as valued by an appraiser, in part payment of her composition. The furniture remained in his possession on a verbal agreement that his wife and he should have the use of it. Two years afterwards his estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act. In a question between A's representatives and the trustee in the sequestration held that under section 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the former were entitled to delivery of the furniture, as having been sold to A but not delivered.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen,
 Kincardine,
 and Banff.
 I.

IN 1885 William Begg Scott, finding himself in difficulties, offered to settle with his creditors on the footing of paying 8s. in the pound on his ordinary debts. Most of the creditors accepted this offer, and among others, Mrs Gouk, Scott's mother-in-law, who claimed a preference for £25 as the rent of his house, which belonged to her, and an ordinary ranking for a loan by her to him of £100. Scott admitted both claims, which thus, on the footing of taking 8s. in the pound on the debt of £100, amounted together to £65. Scott's furniture had been valued at £50, 7s. 6d. by an appraiser, and Mrs Gouk agreed to take the furniture at that valuation in partial discharge of her claim for £65, and to take Scott's cheque for the balance of £14, 12s. 6d.

IN 1887 Scott's estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, and H. M. Horsbrugh, C.A., Edinburgh, was appointed trustee.

The furniture above mentioned had remained in Scott's possession from the date of the arrangement with Mrs Gouk until his sequestration, and the trustee proposed to sell it as part of the sequestrated estates.

Mrs Scott and her husband, and another daughter of Mrs Gouk, thereupon brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Stonehaven against the trustee, to have the sale interdicted on the ground that the furniture belonged to the female pursuers under the settlement of their mother (who had died in 1885).

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The female pursuers being the true owners of the furniture and other effects as condescended on, are entitled to obtain interdict against the defender selling the same.

The defender averred "that the pretended purchase on the part of Mrs Gouk was a simulate transaction between her and her son-in-law, with the view of giving the pursuer Mrs Scott and her husband a preferable claim to the furniture in question, to the prejudice of his creditors, who had refused to acquiesce in the private arrangement referred to. The said furniture was never sold or taken out of the bankrupt's possession, and he was never divested thereof until the defender was appointed trustee for behoof of his creditors, to whom it now belongs as part of the sequestrated estate."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pretended sale having been entered into by the bankrupt when in insolvent circumstances with his mother-in-law, who was a conjunct and confident person with him, without a just price being paid, and with a view to defraud his just and lawful prior creditors, is null and void, and of no avail at common law. (3) Mrs Gouk being a conjunct and confident person with the bankrupt, the presumption is that the alleged purchase was entered into without a true, just, or necessary cause, and without a just price being paid, and with a view to defraud his just and lawful prior creditors; it is therefore null and void, and of no effect. (4) The furniture in question not having been sold, and having remained in the undisturbed possession and occupation of the bankrupt, and immixed with his effects at the date of sequestration, the female pursuers have no right or title to the same, and their claim ought to be repelled. No. 85.

Feb. 20, 1889.
Scott v.
Scott's Trustees.

A proof was allowed. The Court having come to the conclusion on the evidence that the transaction in 1885 between Scott and Mrs Gouk was a real transaction, and the debt of £100 a real debt, it is unnecessary to go into the details of the proof.

On 16th August 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove that the household furniture and effects in question belong to them, or that they have any title to retain possession of them: Therefore recalls the interim interdict granted on the 25th day of November 1887; assolvies the defender from the conclusions of the action."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—On the evidence there had been a bona fide sale. It was not hujus loci to inquire whether a sufficient voucher of the bankrupt's debt to Mrs Gouk was in existence at the time of the settlement of 1885. The claim had been recognised by the bankrupt. The possession of the bankrupt was continued, but on a contract of commodate. That was a "legitimate cause of possession."<sup>1</sup> The views of Lord Ivory and Lord Moncreiff, who dissented in Anderson v. Buchanan,<sup>2</sup> had been adopted in recent cases, and that case was no longer authoritative.<sup>3</sup> Mrs Gouk acquired a jus in re on the completion of the contract of sale, because the contract of commodate was entered into at the same time. To require that the goods should be carried out into the street and then replaced in the same premises was absurd. But if Mrs Gouk had not acquired a jus in re, the goods were goods sold but not delivered in the sense of the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.* Sim v. Grant<sup>4</sup> was not in point. All that that case decided was that where the seller retained possession and a power of sale, the seller's creditors could attach the goods. That was a case which the Act did not touch. In M'Bain's<sup>5</sup> case Lord Blackburn did not put the case of a person being the creditor of another in an obligation for delivery of goods; he did not distinguish between jus in re and jus ad rem; he merely gave a particular illustration of the general principle of reputed

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Prin. sec. 1315; Bell's Com. (5th ed.) i. 250-1 (7th ed. i. 272).

<sup>2</sup> Anderson v. Buchanan, Dec. 22, 1848, 11 D. 270.

<sup>3</sup> Marston v. Kerr's Trustees, May 13, 1879, 6 R. 898; Heritable Securities Investment Association v. Wingate, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1094; Cropper v. Donaldson, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1108; Duncanson v. Jefferies' Trustee, March 4, 1881, 8 R. 563; Robertson v. M'Intyre, March 17, 1882, 9 R. 772.

* The Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), provides, sec. 1,—“From and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same; and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall from and after the date of such sale be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser.”

<sup>4</sup> Sim v. Grant, June 3, 1862, 24 D. 1033.

<sup>5</sup> M'Bain v. Wallace, July 27, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

No. 85. MRS MARY GOUK OR SCOTT AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Law.
 HENRY MONCREIFF HORSBRUGH (William Begg Scott's Trustee),
 Defendant (Respondent).—C. K. Mackenzie.

Feb. 20, 1889.
 Scott v.
 Scott's Trustee.

Sale retenta possessione—Reputed ownership—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 1.—Certain creditors of an insolvent agreed to accept a composition of 8s. per pound in full of their claims. A, the insolvent's mother-in-law, one of the creditors, took his furniture, as valued by an appraiser, in part payment of her composition. The furniture remained in his possession on a verbal agreement that his wife and he should have the use of it. Two years afterwards his estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act. In a question between A's representatives and the trustee in the sequestration held that under section 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the former were entitled to delivery of the furniture, as having been sold to A but not delivered.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen,
 Kincardine,
 and Banff.
 1.

In 1885 William Begg Scott, finding himself in difficulties, offered to settle with his creditors on the footing of paying 8s. in the pound on his ordinary debts. Most of the creditors accepted this offer, and among others, Mrs Gouk, Scott's mother-in-law, who claimed a preference for £25 as the rent of his house, which belonged to her, and an ordinary ranking for a loan by her to him of £100. Scott admitted both claims which thus, on the footing of taking 8s. in the pound on the debt of £100, amounted together to £65. Scott's furniture had been valued at £50, 7s. 6d. by an appraiser, and Mrs Gouk agreed to take the furniture at that valuation in partial discharge of her claim for £65, and to take Scott's cheque for the balance of £14, 12s. 6d.

In 1887 Scott's estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, and H. M. Horsbrugh, C.A., Edinburgh, was appointed trustee.

The furniture above mentioned had remained in Scott's possession from the date of the arrangement with Mrs Gouk until his sequestration, and the trustee proposed to sell it as part of the sequestrated estates.

Mrs Scott and her husband, and another daughter of Mrs Gouk, thereupon brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Stonehaven against the trustee, to have the sale interdicted on the ground that the furniture belonged to the female pursuers under the settlement of their mother (who had died in 1885).

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The female pursuers being the true owners of the furniture and other effects as condescended on, are entitled to obtain interdict against the defender selling the same.

The defender averred "that the pretended purchase on the part of Mrs Gouk was a simulate transaction between her and her son-in-law, with the view of giving the pursuer Mrs Scott and her husband a preferable claim to the furniture in question, to the prejudice of his creditors, who had refused to acquiesce in the private arrangement referred to. The said furniture was never sold or taken out of the bankrupt's possession, and he was never divested thereof until the defender was appointed trustee for behoof of his creditors, to whom it now belongs as part of the sequestrated estate."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pretended sale having been entered into by the bankrupt when in insolvent circumstances with his mother-in-law, who was a conjunct and confident person with him, without a just price being paid, and with a view to defraud his just and lawful prior creditors, is null and void, and of no avail at common law. (3) Mrs Gouk being a conjunct and confident person with the bankrupt, the presumption is that the alleged purchase was entered into without a true, just, or necessary cause, and without a just price being paid, and with a view to defraud his just and lawful prior creditors; it is therefore null and void, and of no effect. (4) The furniture in question not having been sold, and having remained in the undisturbed possession and occupation of the bankrupt, and immixed with his effects at the date of sequestration, the female pursuers have no right or title to the same, and their claim ought to be repelled. No. 85.

Feb. 20, 1889.
Scott v.
Scott's Trustees.

A proof was allowed. The Court having come to the conclusion on the evidence that the transaction in 1885 between Scott and Mrs Gouk was a real transaction, and the debt of £100 a real debt, it is unnecessary to go into the details of the proof.

On 16th August 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove that the household furniture and effects in question belong to them, or that they have any title to retain possession of them: Therefore recalls the interim interdict granted on the 25th day of November 1887; assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—On the evidence there had been a bona fide sale. It was not hujus loci to inquire whether a sufficient voucher of the bankrupt's debt to Mrs Gouk was in existence at the time of the settlement of 1885. The claim had been recognised by the bankrupt. The possession of the bankrupt was continued, but on a contract of commodate. That was a "legitimate cause of possession."<sup>1</sup> The views of Lord Ivory and Lord Moncreiff, who dissented in Anderson v. Buchanan,<sup>2</sup> had been adopted in recent cases, and that case was no longer authoritative.<sup>3</sup> Mrs Gouk acquired a jus in re on the completion of the contract of sale, because the contract of commodate was entered into at the same time. To require that the goods should be carried out into the street and then replaced in the same premises was absurd. But if Mrs Gouk had not acquired a jus in re, the goods were goods sold but not delivered in the sense of the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.* Sim v. Grant<sup>4</sup> was not in point. All that that case decided was that where the seller retained possession and a power of sale, the seller's creditors could attach the goods. That was a case which the Act did not touch. In M'Bain's<sup>5</sup> case Lord Blackburn did not put the case of a person being the creditor of another in an obligation for delivery of goods; he did not distinguish between jus in re and jus ad rem; he merely gave a particular illustration of the general principle of reputed

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Prin. sec. 1315; Bell's Com. (5th ed.) i. 250-1 (7th ed. i. 272).

<sup>2</sup> Anderson v. Buchanan, Dec. 22, 1848, 11 D. 270.

<sup>3</sup> Marston v. Kerr's Trustees, May 13, 1879, 6 R. 898; Heritable Securities Investment Association v. Wingate, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1094; Cropper v. Donaldson, July 8, 1880, 7 R. 1108; Duncanson v. Jefferies' Trustees, March 4, 1881, 8 R. 563; Robertson v. M'Intyre, March 17, 1882, 9 R. 772.

* The Mercantile Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), provides, sec. 1,—“From and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same; and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall from and after the date of such sale be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser.”

<sup>4</sup> Sim v. Grant, June 3, 1862, 24 D. 1033.

<sup>5</sup> M'Bain v. Wallace, July 27, 1881, 8 R. (H. L.) 106.

No. 85.

Feb. 20, 1889.
 Scott v.
 Scott's Trustee.

ownership. The result would be the same as if there had been no sale, and the owner of the goods had put them into the hands of another.

Argued for the defender;—The onus was on the appellants to overcome the presumption of property arising from the bankrupt's possession. The Act of 1621 distinctly laid that onus on them. There was no clear evidence of a sale. The circumstances as to the bankrupt's indebtedness to his mother-in-law were suspicious. But if there had been a sale, it was a sale retenta possessione, and the buyer could never have a jus in re, and therefore could never part with the goods on a contract of commodate. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act did not apply. The case fell under the principle of Sim v. Grant. The circumstances of the possession were inconsistent with the existence even of a jus ad rem. That principle had been recognised by Lord Blackburn in M'Bain's case.

LORD YOUNG.—(After considering the evidence)—In 1885 Mrs Gouk honestly purchased the furniture for £50, 7s. 6d., being the value put upon it by a professional appraiser. She proceeded just as if her claim had been paid in money, and she had then gone and bought the furniture with it. She no doubt does not take delivery of it, that not being her purpose, which was that it should remain with her daughter and son-in-law, and be used by them, and she carried out that intention by allowing it to remain in the possession of the seller. I give no opinion as to the legal effect of a party getting the furniture in his own house in which he is residing purchased for him by a friend, it may be, and retaining possession of it as it stood. It may be a question whether such a transaction is or is not a nudum pactum. We have some decisions upon that, curious enough, because in our law a pactum may remain nudum upon which a price has been paid, although in Roman law a nudum pactum meant a mere stipulation and nothing more, ceasing to be nudum whenever arles had been given, because something having followed upon it, it had become clothed. Our decisions run on the other line of rails, or did, and it may be a long time yet before a different view of the law prevails. I give no opinion, then, upon the purchase of furniture in a man's own house for his own benefit, because there is no ceremonial of delivery. But here we have a specimen of a very different class of cases—a specimen of the very class provided for by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The Act says,—“From and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same.” Here an honest buyer, who had paid the price but had allowed the goods to remain in the custody of the seller, wishes to have delivery, and the trustee of the seller wishes to prevent delivery. I think what the trustee wishes cannot be done. All Mrs Gouk did was open and above board, and no false credit was given to the bankrupt because of his possession of the furniture. I therefore think that she or her representatives are entitled to demand delivery now.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, LORD LEE, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Find in fact that the furniture in question was purchased by the late Mrs Gouk from William Begg Scott at a price ascertained by a competent person, No. 85. and that the price was duly paid by her: Find in law that the pursuers, as in her right, are entitled to delivery of the furniture: Feb. 20, 1889.

Recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed Scott v. against: Grant interdict as craved: Find the pursuers entitled to the Scott's Trust-expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court." tee.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

HENRY MONCREIFF HORSBRUGH (William Begg Scott's Trustee), First No. 86.
Party.—C. K. Mackenzie.

MRS MARY GOUK OR SCOTT AND SPOUSE, Third Parties.—Law.

Husband and Wife—Jus mariti—Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 3.—Held that the jus mariti and right of administration of a husband are not excluded from the income of heritable estate, the fee of which has vested in his wife prior to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. Feb. 20, 1889.
Scott's Trust-
tee v. Scotts.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th August 1874, David 2ND DIVISION.
Gouk, merchant, Montrose, left his whole estates, heritable and moveable, Sheriff of to his wife in liferent and to his two daughters jointly in fee, with entry Aberdeen, to his said disponees, in liferent and fee respectively, immediately after and Banff.
his death. 1.

The truster died on 10th September 1875 survived by his wife and daughters.

Mary Gouk, one of the daughters, was married to William Begg Scott on 23d May 1876.

Mrs Gouk, the widow, died on 17th December 1885.

On 19th May 1887 William Begg Scott's estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, and H. M. Horsbrugh, C.A., was appointed trustee.

The trustee having claimed one-half of the rents of Mr Gouk's heritable estate which had accrued since the sequestration, and were to accrue during the continuance of Mr and Mrs Scott's joint lives, as falling to Mr Scott jure mariti,* this special case was presented, in which (besides other questions between other parties not necessary to be referred to here) this question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"3. Is the first party entitled to payment of one-half of the rents of the heritable estate of the late David Gouk accrued and to accrue since the date of the sequestration of the estates of the said William Begg Scott, and during the continuance of the joint lives of the said William Begg Scott and Mary Gouk or Scott?"

The trustee, the first party to the case, maintained the affirmative of this question. Mrs Scott and her husband, for her and for his own interest, the third parties, maintained the negative.

Argued for the first party;—The right which had vested in Mrs Scott prior to the passing of the Act was a right to the corpus of the heritable

* The Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), which introduces a general exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration in the case of all marriages entered into after its date, by sec. 3 enacts,—“In the case of marriages which have taken place before the passing of this Act . . . the provisions of this Act shall not apply, except that the jus mariti and right of administration shall be excluded to the extent respectively prescribed by the preceding sections from all estate, moveable or heritable, and income thereof, to which the wife may acquire right after the passing of the Act.”

No. 86.

Feb. 20, 1889.
Scott's Trustees v. Scotts.

estate subject to her mother's liferent, and that gave her husband the right to draw the rents, if they were payable, and as soon as they became payable. The question would have been the same had there been no liferent. The husband could at common law have assigned the rents though not yet accrued, and they might have been adjudged for his debts. They were a life estate vested in him from the time of the marriage.

Argued for the third parties;—It was not disputed that the first party was entitled to the capital of the personal estate bequeathed by Mr Gouk to his daughter, because she took a vested interest at his death, but the same line of reasoning disentitled him from taking the rents of the heritable estate which accrued after the date of the sequestration. He could only take whatever right was in the bankrupt; and at common law the bankrupt was only entitled to such of the rents of his wife's heritable estate as had previously vested in her.<sup>1</sup> It was only when the term of payment had come that rents became moveable estate, and it was only as moveable estate that it passed to the husband at common law. Rents payable in futuro therefore were in the sense of the statute moveable estate, to which the wife acquired right after the date of the passing of the Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here is as to the interpretation of section 3, subsection 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, and the question arises in this way. The late Mrs Gouk had the liferent interest in certain heritable property left by her husband, who died in 1875. Her daughter Mrs Scott had the fee. Mrs Gouk enjoyed the liferent until her death in 1885, but in 1881 the Married Women's Property Act was passed, and the question is, how far that Act has affected the rights of Mrs Scott, who had right to the fee of the estate before the passing of the Act, but received no rents until the death of her mother in 1885. The words of the Act are—"In the case of marriages which have taken place before the passing of this Act . . . the provisions of this Act shall not apply, except that the jus mariti and right of administration shall be excluded to the extent respectively prescribed by the preceding sections from all estate, moveable or heritable, and income thereof, to which the wife may acquire right after the passing of the Act." The only difficulty arising here is as to the meaning of the words "and income thereof," and as to how far these words apply to the present case. If there had been no intervening liferent, there is no doubt that from 1875 to 1881 the daughter would have been in receipt of the rents derived from the heritable estate, and her husband, under the law then in existence, would have been entitled to receive those rents, which would have been liable to all the contingencies to which his own estate was liable. The question is, whether the passing of the Act deprived him of that right, and whether after 1881 the wife obtained that income free from his jus mariti and right of administration. Suppose Mrs Gouk had died just before the last term when the rents fell due before the passing of the Act, the husband's rights would not have been excluded as regards the rents falling due at that term. Would his rights be excluded at the next term by the Act having passed between the two terms? I am of opinion that they would not.

I think the exclusion of a husband's jus mariti and right of administration does not apply to any estate the fee of which is acquired before the passing of the Act, or to the income thereof. I think that the position of estates acquired before the passing of the Act, and the husband's right to the income of these estates, are not altered by the Act, and that we must answer the question submitted to us accordingly.

<sup>1</sup> Fraser on Husband and Wife, i. 694-5.

No. 86.

Feb. 20, 1889.
Scott's Trustees v. Scotts.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. By the law of Scotland before the Act of 1881 a husband had right to the administration of his wife's heritable estate, and to the income thereof. He had these two rights over her heritable estate, while her moveable estate passed to him absolutely. Now, the wife of the husband in this case who is bankrupt became entitled to the fee of heritable estate in 1875, which, however, yielded no income to her, as it was burdened with a liferent to her mother. But the fee was hers, and her husband was entitled to administer the estate in her interest as fiar, and as soon as it began to yield income to her he became entitled to draw that income or possess the estate himself. He could enter into possession if there were no leases, and if there were he could draw the rents. That is to say, he could do so irrespective of the Act. Now, the idea that the Act stops all that does not commend itself to me. The husband might have possessed the estate or enjoyed the income thereof for thirty years, yet the contention is that on the passing of the Act his right ceased. I am unable so to hold. The idea of the statute to my mind is this—"You, who have married a wife with heritable estate, shall not be affected by this Act. Your right is a right to administer the estate and to draw the income, and that which has existed heretofore is not to be affected by the Act. After the passing of the Act you must regard any heritable estate coming to your wife as a windfall upon which you had no right to calculate, and which you must take under the law then existing." I cannot read these words in the Act "and income thereof" as meaning each year's rent as a separate subject. I think that the estate and the income thereof are joined together as one subject.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD LEE.—I had some difficulty about this question, but on the whole I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships. The exclusion of the jus mariti applies to all moveable estate acquired by a wife after the passing of the Act, but the question is, are the rents of heritable estate excluded as moveable estate falling to a wife after the passing of this Act? No doubt the clause admits of being read as applying to the income of heritable estate which comes to a wife after the passing of the Act, and not to the income of heritable estate which fell to her before the passing of the Act, and on the whole I agree with your Lordships that it should so be read.

THE COURT answered the third question in the affirmative.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS ANN MERCER OR GAVIN AND SPOUSE, Pursuers.—J. G. Smith—M'Lennan.

No. 87.

ARROL & COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders.—*J. C. Thomson—
J. A. Reid.*

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

Reparation—Road—Unfenced path near public road—Contributory negligence.—The contractors for a new line of railway erected a hut for the housing of their workmen in a field which they had purchased. The previously exist-

No. 87.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

ing direct access to the site of the hut and an adjoining cottage from a neighbouring town having been permanently interrupted by a new railway cutting made by the contractors, the only remaining access was by a footpath round three sides of the field. In place of this circuitous road, the workmen, message boys, and others, had within the knowledge of the contractors formed a beaten track leading off this road by the edge of the cutting direct to the hut. Where the track left the public path a paling forming part of a fence erected to guard the cutting had been turned round by the workman in charge so as to admit of easier access to the cut. A member of the public who had been on business at the hut and was returning from it on a dark night fell over the cutting and was severely injured. In an action of damages against the contractors, on the ground that there was a duty upon them to have had the cutting fenced and protected, the jury found for the pursuer. On a motion for a new trial the Court (Int. Lord Wellwood) refused to disturb the verdict, holding upon the evidence that there was a duty on the defenders to see that the path was not dangerous, and that a plea of contributory negligence had not been substantiated.

1st Division.
Ld. Wellwood.
B.

THE FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY COMPANY were in course of constructing a line of railway from Inverkeithing to North Queensferry. At Inverkeithing part of the line passed eastwards through a cutting thirty feet deep and a tunnel under a public footpath (sometimes called the Shore Brae Road), which crossed the line at right angles. This public footpath leading from Hope Street, a street parallel to the railway, on the north to the shore on the south, formed the eastern boundary of a field occupied by the railway contractors on the south side of the cutting. About 130 feet west from the public footpath on the southern edge of the cutting stood Brae Cottage, which formerly had direct access to Hope Street by a path in front parallel to the above-mentioned public footpath, but this access was cut off by the railway. Behind Brae Cottage a wooden house called Brae Hut was erected for the accommodation of their employees by the railway contractors. Brae Cottage, with the ground on which it and Brae Hut stood, and also the ground between them and the public footpath, had been acquired by the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the purposes of the railway, and had been placed by the railway company at the disposal of Messrs Arrol & Company, their principal contractors, for the purposes of their contract. Messrs Arrol had erected Brae Hut, which was given by them or by their subcontractor, John Williams, as a residence to William Buxton, a foreman ganger in their service, and Buxton paid rent for it to Messrs Arrol. After October 1887 Buxton resided at Brae Hut with his wife and family, and had several other railway workers as lodgers with him there.

In consequence of the direct access from Brae Cottage to Inverkeithing on the north being cut off, the only available access was by a footpath leading south for 110 feet, and then turning eastwards 130 feet, when it joined the public footpath at a point 180 feet south of the tunnel. There was a gate upon the private footpath about 60 feet west from the point where it joined the public footpath, which was sometimes kept locked. It was thus necessary to go round three sides of the plot of ground on which the houses stood in order to cross the railway at the tunnel, a distance in all of about 140 yards. From the time however of Buxton's occupation of the hut a short cut had come into use diverging westwards immediately to the south of the place where the public footpath crossed the tunnel, and running along the south side of the railway cutting and close to its edge, until it reached the hut through a slap in a wall which it crossed.

On 23d February 1888 Mrs Gavin, a sick nurse, was summoned from Inverkeithing to attend Buxton's wife at the hut, and went there on that occasion and thereafter twice daily until 3d March, by the short cut leading from the public path above described.

On the evening of the 3d March, which was dark and stormy, she left the hut about eight o'clock on her return to Inverkeithing, but after proceeding a short way, and when close to the public path, she lost the track and fell over the cutting on to the railway below, and was severely injured. No. 87.
Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

She thereafter brought an action of damages for the injuries thereby sustained against Messrs Arrol and the individual partners of the firm, and also against Williams, the subcontractor.

She averred;—(Cond. 8) "The said accident to the female pursuer occurred through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible. It was caused by the unprotected and dangerous state of the branch footpath above described. The said footpath, notwithstanding its close proximity to the railway cutting, was entirely unfenced, and was left at night without any light to indicate its course. It was the duty of the defenders, Arrol & Company, the principal contractors, in erecting said Brae Hut, and assigning it as a residence for the said William Buxton, to secure that the access thereto was safe and convenient and sufficiently fenced and protected, and to prevent the use of an unsafe access. They entirely failed to provide a safe and convenient access to said hut. . . . The defenders . . . in full knowledge that the branch path above described constituted the ordinary and only available access to Brae Hut, and that it was unfenced and unprotected, and in a condition dangerous to the lives of the lieges having legitimate occasion to visit Brae Hut, permitted it to be formed and maintained in use as the access thereto without any attempt to render it free from danger. Since the accident to the pursuer, the entrance to said branch path from the public footpath has been closed up, and a new access formed to Brae Hut in a different direction."

The defenders denied these averments, and explained that as the pursuer had chosen of her own accord to go across private waste ground, and not by the proper and safe access round the field, she was not entitled to damages.

The issue as against each of the two defenders was,—Whether the pursuer "fell into an unfenced and unlighted railway cutting at or near the town of Inverkeithing," and sustained injuries, through the fault of the defenders? The defenders were not separately represented, and made common cause at the trial.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £100.*

---

* From the evidence led in the case it appeared that where the public footpath crossed the railway tunnel there was a paling fencing it on the west, and that that paling had been turned in along the short cut to the hut for about eight feet, so as to admit of easier access to it. The short cut was described as being "a beaten-down path upon rough ground," and was about five feet wide. The pursuer deponed that on every occasion on which she had gone to the house she had taken the short cut, and there was evidence that it was used by all who went there, e.g., by the doctor, the washerwoman, tradespeople, and others. It was admitted by Buxton, who was a witness for the defenders, that coals for the use of those occupying the hut were brought in wheelbarrows along the path in question, and that it was for that purpose that he had shifted the paling; that he had been found fault with for so doing by Mr Gray, Messrs Arrol's manager, but that it was not put back. Shortly before the accident a crane had been erected close to the entrance to the path, and after that it was impossible to pass between the crane and the cutting. There was evidence that the pursuer had been warned to avoid the crane, and that she had taken the wrong side of it, having attempted to pass between it and the cutting.

Mr Gray, Messrs Arrol's manager, a witness for the defenders, deponed,—“I

No. 87.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

The defenders moved for and obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

Argued for the pursuer in shewing cause;—The fault proved here arose from what might be called a structural defect, as the path where the accident occurred was made, or at least permitted to be made, by the defenders, in order to supply the deficiency caused by the interruption and removal of the old road owing to the making of the cutting. The case was a fortiori of that of M'Feat.<sup>1</sup> It was not necessary for the pursuer to establish that the path was the only road to the workmen's hut. If it had come to be recognised as a usual road, which upon the evidence was amply proved, that was enough. There was no ground for saying that the pursuer was a trespasser when she made use of the path, nor was she in the sense in which the term had been used by the English Courts, a "licensee." She had been invited by Buxton to use the path in question, or at least she had used it and he did not object, and she was therefore entitled to require that it should be in a reasonably safe condition.<sup>2</sup> Neither was there contributory negligence on her part. It could not be said that she had walked into a known and obvious danger. She knew that the path was being constantly used, and was quite entitled to rely on its being safe for that purpose.

Argued for the defenders;—The question was whether there was an obligation on the defenders to fence the side of the cutting along which the path ran? It was settled that if a person came upon private ground and used it as a trespasser, he was not entitled to recover damages in the event of injury. If he had permission to make use of private ground et know the Shore Brae Road, which crosses the mouth of the tunnel. There is a dyke supporting the field, which almost dies away just as it comes up to near the scene of this accident. A wooden fence begins there, which I caused to be erected. When the cutting got up to that point, we erected the fence to protect the footpath, and to keep the public from getting on to the ground. The mouth of the tunnel is just below the Shore Brae Road. It is supposed to be as close to the edge of the footpath as it can be made, and we fenced it close to the edge of the footpath. We brought the fence down to the end of the dyke. That would be in the end of 1887 or beginning of 1888, when the cutting got up to a point where it would be dangerous to leave it open. Even after the fence was erected it was possible for people to get over the low part of the dyke and into the field if they chose. Buxton removed a piece of the fence opposite where the accident took place to get in coals for his own use. I quarrelled him for it, and told him that if anything went wrong I would hold him responsible, and I wanted it put back, but it was not put back. That was months before the accident, at least weeks. Even before the fence was removed sightseers used to cross and come upon the ground. In fact, it was a trouble at times to find them there, and I have ordered them off more than once when I have had occasion to be about, as it was dangerous for people to be there when we were firing shots. By that time it had become practically waste ground. I never saw a formed footpath there. None was ever constructed by us, or by anybody that I know. I believe the people at the cottage frequently took this short cut. . . ."

It appeared that on the night of the accident the pursuer had asked a Mrs Kyle, who was in the hut, "to shew her on the road a bit," and that Mrs Kyle had gone about half way along the path, and then turned, and that after she left the pursuer she heard her cry, and then found she had fallen into the cutting.

<sup>1</sup> M'Feat v. Rankin's Trustees, June 17, 1879, 6 R. 1043; cf. also Brady v. Parker, June 7, 1887, 14 R. 783.

<sup>2</sup> Holmes v. North-Eastern Railway Company, May 1869, L. R., 4 Exch. 254.

gratia and as a "licensee," the proprietor of the ground was bound to take care that there was no trap or concealed danger on the ground which might lead to his injury. But that was not the present case. Again the proprietor of private ground in the neighbourhood of a public road who let the ground to others, and gave them leave to make roads was bound to take care that any quarry abutting on the roads was properly protected and fenced.<sup>1</sup> That had been held in the case of M'Feat,<sup>2</sup> but that was a decision which might require to be reconsidered by the Court. Besides it was not in point here, for there the road on which the accident took place was the only means of communication available, and an unfenced quarry was allowed to remain in its immediate neighbourhood. Further, the liability which the Court seemed to have recognised in that case was a liability ex dominio and not ex delicto. In some of the cases there appeared to be a recognition of a doctrine to the effect that if there was an invitation to use private ground, there was a further duty to have it protected. The present case could not be brought within that category, for any invitation that there was to the pursuer to use the ground proceeded from Buxton, and could not bind the defenders. Further, if the pursuer chose to take a short cut on a dark night, where there was a regular road, even although it might be longer, the defenders could not be made liable, for that amounted to contributory negligence on her part.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The scene of the accident, which forms the subject of this action, was a line of railway which the Forth Bridge Railway Company are constructing between Inverkeithing and North Queensferry and the two parties who are called as defenders are Messrs Arrol & Company, the principal contractors, and Mr John Williams, the subcontractor under them, for the new line. Two issues were taken, one applicable to each of the defenders, but we were given to understand that the two made common cause, and accordingly the question which we have now to determine is whether the jury were justified in returning a verdict against the defenders.

The question is a somewhat delicate one. The place where the accident occurred was alongside an unfenced railway cutting, and there is no doubt that the place where the pursuer was walking, when she met with the accident, was used as a footpath. It was not a footpath which had been constructed for the purpose of being used, but it was one which those engaged in the making of the railway cutting, and others who had reason to go to the hut to which I shall presently refer, had made by actual use along the edge of a field through which the cutting was being formed. What we have to decide is whether the defenders were under a duty to fence that pathway so brought into use by the persons to whom I have referred. Accordingly this is hardly a motion to set aside a verdict on the ground of its being contrary to evidence. The point rather is whether the evidence discloses an obligation on the part of the defenders to fence the path on which the pursuer met with her accident.

The history of the matter is that there is a house upon the south side of the railway cutting called Brae Cottage. Before the cutting was made, there were

No. 87.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

<sup>1</sup> Hounsall v. Smyth, Feb. 1, 1860, 29 L. J., C. P. 203; Bolch v. Smith, Jan. 30, 1862, 31 L. J. Exch. 201; Ross v. Keith, Nov. 9, 1888, 16 R. 86; Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Jan. 24, 1888, 15 R. 323; Addison on Torts, 567.

<sup>2</sup> 6 R. 1043.

No. 87.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

two accesses to this house, one from the north, connecting it with Inverkeithing and running in a straight line from Brae Cottage to Hope Street, and another from the south. The access from the north has been destroyed by the operations of the railway company, and the opening up of the cutting. The interposition of the cutting prevented the road from the north from being any longer available. In that state of matters Messrs Arrol, the contractors, or their representative, built a wooden hut immediately to the south of Brae Cottage for the purpose of accommodating their workmen. The nominal tenant of that hut was a man named Buxton. He took in as lodgers the navvies who were under his charge. But these were not the only persons who required access to the hut. Those who brought the food supplies, and those who had occasion to visit the inmates of the hut, and their wives and children, had to be provided with an access. There was undoubtedly the access from the south, but it was by a roundabout route, and it was only natural that a short cut should be invented and set up, and it was upon that short cut that the pursuer met with the injury complained of. A straight line of public footpath led from the town of Inverkeithing to the seashore, and somewhat to the east of the hut to which I have referred it crossed over a tunnel of the new railway. There was a communication from this public footpath to the hut by the footpath which I have already described as having been formed by the use made of it by the workmen and their friends. The defenders say that they did not make this footway, and that there was no duty on them to make it; that there was an existing access to the hut, which was perfectly well established and well known, and that no one had a right to go to the hut except by that access. But, upon the other hand, there is no doubt that they saw that this path was coming into use, and that everyone went by it in preference to the roundabout way from the south. There is an indication of this in the evidence of Gray, the defenders' foreman, for he noticed that the paling which protected the public footpath over the tunnel on its west side had been interfered with, and turned round so as to enable the inhabitants of the hut to approach it more easily, and also, it appears, to admit of their coals being wheeled in; and so soon as he had observed this he remonstrated with Buxton, but, unfortunately, he did not sufficiently insist upon his remonstrance. He was conscious that the fence ought to have been put right, and that this had not been done. I think that these circumstances are sufficient to infer a duty on the part of the defenders to make the path safe not merely for the workmen, who may be supposed to have been able to take care of themselves, but also for other purposes. It was impossible for the workmen to occupy the hut without other people coming there also, and the needs of those other people had also to be attended to. This unfortunate pursuer, for instance, was frequently at the hut for the very legitimate purpose of attending the wife of the ganger. Accordingly, I am of opinion that there was an obligation upon the defenders to fence this pathway so as to prevent the risk of accident.

But there is a further consideration, which does not seem to have been urged at the trial, viz., whether there was not contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer. There is a plea to that effect, but the statement in support of it is not very strong. It is stated in the 6th answer to the condescendence that "the pursuer went alone, and, instead of going by the proper access, chose to walk across the foressaid private waste ground," i.e., the footpath in question. Again, in the 7th answer,—“Explained that on said occasion she again chose of her own accord to go across said private waste ground, and not to go by the proper and safe access." It does not appear to me that these statements afford a relevant ground for the plea of contributory negligence. If this path was used by the employees of the defenders and by all who had occasion to visit the hut, and if that fact was seen by and known to the defenders and they took no steps to prevent it, it is not for them to say that the pursuer "chose of her own accord to go across private waste ground." Can it be said that she walked into an obvious and known danger? She had fair ground for thinking that she was doing what others did. She received particular directions to keep upon the one side of a crane which was being erected close to the path, and if she had done so she would probably have escaped. She took the wrong side of the crane, very unfortunately both for herself and for the defenders, but that fact is not, in my opinion, sufficient to justify a plea of contributory negligence.

No. 87.
Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

LORD MURK.—I agree with your Lordship that there was a duty on the defenders to have a fairly safe path to the hut which they had built for the use of their workmen, the old footpath having been put an end to.

Upon the question of contributory negligence I have more difficulty. My doubt is not due to the consideration that the allegation upon record does not amount to an allegation of contributory negligence. But the pursuer's own statement is, that she was accompanied half-way up the road by another woman whom she asked to go along with her, as she seems to have been afraid to go by herself. I should myself have hesitated to say that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, but the question was one eminently for a jury, and as they have taken a different view, I do not think the verdict should be disturbed upon that ground.

LORD ADAM.—Before the formation of the new railway there was only one house in the neighbourhood of this cutting, viz., Brae Cottage. There were two accesses to it—one from the north leading from Hope Street straight down to it, and another which led by a circuitous route, turning first south, and then north again, before it reached the cottage. In August 1887 the contractors took possession of the field in which the cottage was situated, and built a hut in it for the accommodation of their workmen. Buxton became tenant of it, and took in lodgers. "Sometimes," he says, "there is a considerable community of us." There would therefore be a good deal of traffic to the hut in consequence. The railway cutting was commenced in September. About the end of October the road from the north which formed the direct access to the hut was interrupted, and a new access came to be formed by the constant passage of the workmen, message boys, and others across the field from the other road to the hut. This was a short cut to prevent the necessity of going round three sides of the field. As the railway cutting which shut off the access from the north progressed, a fence was erected along the Seabrae Road, running from north to south, fencing it off from the cutting, and which was originally prolonged across the entrance to the new path, but about the end of December or beginning of January the end of this fence, to the extent of seven or eight feet, was removed and turned round along the cutting so as to leave the access to the new path again open. The use of the new path had gone on until at the time when the accident in question occurred, a distinct, definite, and well-worn track had been formed, and was being used to the knowledge of the defenders by many persons having legitimate business at Buxton's house.

No. 87. The question is whether or not, that being the origin or genesis of the footpath, there was an obligation upon the contractors to look after and be responsible for the safety of those using the road. They knew of its existence—they were daily on the ground—they permitted it to go on—and the footpath passed close by the unfenced cutting, which was some thirty feet deep. There was, I think, an implied invitation to passengers to use it; and in these circumstances I think there was a duty upon the defenders either to stop the use of the road, or to see that it was properly protected against the chance of accident. Accordingly I concur.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Gavin v.
Arrol & Co.

I also agree in thinking that there was no contributory negligence such as would disentitle the pursuer to recover damages. The question is a jury one, and I do not think there is any ground for disturbing their verdict.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree in the result to which your Lordships have come, but not exactly on the same grounds.

I confess that I should not myself have taken the view which the jury did, although I say so with diffidence after hearing the opinions which have now been expressed by your Lordships. I thought at the trial, and I think still, that the pursuer has not succeeded in establishing that there was an obligation upon the defenders to fence the pathway in question. The proper and legitimate access to the hut was undoubtedly the circuitous road which led round to it by the shore; and the footpath which formed the short cut was not, as alleged on record, originally formed or sanctioned as an access by the defenders. Now, although it appears to me that if the footpath had been used for a considerable time, there might have been a duty on the part of the defenders to protect it, I think that the use which has been proved here was not sufficient to impose such an obligation upon them.

On the other hand, there are, I think, certain elements in the case sufficient to support the verdict. In the first place, there is evidence to shew that the footpath was used to some extent as an access to Brae Hut. In the second place, there is little, if any, evidence of the use of the circuitous route to the hut as an access to and from Hope Street, although, as I have said, it was the legitimate route. In the third place, there is evidence that after a fence had been put across the entrance to the footpath, it was removed by Buxton in the knowledge of the defenders, and not replaced. I think the jury were of opinion that there was thus a kind of recognition of the footpath by the defenders, and an invitation by them to people like the pursuer to use it. Accordingly I think that the verdict which was brought in cannot be held to be contrary to evidence.

In regard to the question of contributory negligence, I think there was not sufficient evidence to disentitle the pursuer on that ground to recover damages.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

P. H. CAMERON, S.S.C.—REID & GUILD, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN THOMSON AND OTHERS (David Jugurtha Thomson's Trustees), First Parties.—G. W. Burnet.

No. 88.

MRS JESSIE CALLENDER OR THOMSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—
Jameson.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Thomson's
Trustees v.
Thomson.

Trust—Investment.—Held that authority given by a testator to his trustees to continue investments made by him did not authorise them, on the reconstruction of an undertaking by the winding-up of an old company and the formation of a new one, to take up shares in the new company in lieu of shares belonging to the testator in the old one.

DAVID JUGURTHA THOMSON, merchant in Edinburgh, died on 16th March 2d Division. 1871, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 3d December 1868. M.

By this deed Mr Thomson disposed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including shares in trading and other companies, to the trustees therein named, with the powers and for the purposes therein expressed, and, inter alia, authorised them "to continue or not, as they may think advisable, such investments of my means and estate as I may have made during my lifetime of whatever kind or denomination, and that without incurring any responsibility for so doing, but (though without prejudice to the general discretionary powers hereby conferred) I recommend my trustees not to change any of the said investments unless circumstances may, in their opinion, render it expedient for them to do so." The trustees were further empowered to lend the trust funds upon heritable security, or upon security of debentures of incorporated companies, or on the security of the Government funds, or of shares in chartered or incorporated companies in Great Britain, and they were empowered to invest the trust-estate, or any part thereof, in the Government funds, in the purchase of heritable property, feu-duties, ground-annuals, or other heritages, or of the guaranteed or preference or debenture stock of railway or other incorporated companies in which the liability of each shareholder was limited, or to retain the same in bank in Great Britain. General power was also conferred upon them to alter and renew the securities from time to time, as they might consider expedient.

The estate left by the truster included certain £100 shares of the North British Rubber Company, Limited, a company registered under the Limited Liability Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 47), on 30th March 1857. The trustees continued to hold these shares. The investment proved a very remunerative one, the dividends on the ordinary selling price of the stock averaging about eight per cent.

On 28th March 1888, at a general meeting of the company, a scheme for the reconstruction of the company was submitted. The reconstruction scheme involved the winding-up of the old company and the incorporation of a new company under the existing Companies Acts.

The general object of the reconstruction sufficiently appears from the following extract from a circular issued by the directors of the old company to their shareholders:—

"The directors finding a necessity for more capital, and giving the matter very careful consideration, finally came to the conclusion, with a view to conserve as much as possible the interests of all the shareholders, that the capital presently needed could be most favourably acquired by the issue of preference shares. But, on consulting the articles and the statutes, and the decisions interpreting them, it was found that they had no power to issue preference stock.

"The first Limited Liability Act was passed on 14th July 1856, and one of the first companies to take advantage of it, while it may be said to have been in an experimental stage, was the North British Rubber Com-

No. 88.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Thomson's
Trustees v.
Thomson.

pany. Their memorandum and articles, which were dated 26th September 1856, and were registered on 30th March 1857, referred to and adopted table B of the Act 1856, making some slight changes where the circumstances of the company required it. Table B was the stereotyped form of articles which the framers of the Act 1856 thought sufficient for the regulation of companies in those days. Both in regard to the regulations for the conduct of the business which the Legislature then thought sufficient, and in regard to the objects for which the company was established, the existing memorandum and articles of this company may be regarded as meagre; and although, up to the present time, their business affairs have been conducted under these articles practically without a single hitch, the fact of their being meagre, and that the company may require at any moment further powers than what these articles give, has, along with other considerations, led the directors to propose to the company that there shall be a re-registration of the company under the same name, and with objects and powers of a much wider scope than either the first statute or the original articles contemplated."

The proposal was approved of by the shareholders of the old company at an extraordinary general meeting thereof on 30th June 1888, and resolutions to wind up the old company and otherwise to carry out the scheme were duly passed and confirmed.

On 9th August 1888 the new company was registered under a new memorandum and relative articles of association, and on 3d September 1888 the liquidator of the old company intimated to the trustees that, under the powers of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, which were specially conferred on him, he had accepted on their behalf certain shares in the new company in lieu of the shares held by them in the old company.

A question having arisen as to the power of the trustees to take up these shares this special case was presented, the trustees being the first parties, and Mrs Thomson and others—beneficiaries representing all the different interests under the trust—being the second parties.

The case, after setting forth the foregoing facts, stated that the first parties believed that the shares in the new company formed as safe and good an investment for the trust funds as the shares of the old company, but they maintained that they were not entitled, looking to the terms of the testator's settlement, to invest the trust funds therein. The second parties maintained that the shares of the new company offered to the trustees being of a greater nominal value, as well as of at least an equal actual value, as the shares in the old company originally held by the testator and thereafter by his trustees, formed an investment for the trust funds authorised by him by his trust-disposition and settlement; and further, that looking to the powers generally and specially conferred upon the trustees by the trust-disposition and settlement, and the testator's recommendation therein expressed not to change any of his investments unless circumstances rendered it expedient, the trustees were not in the circumstances entitled to realise the shares offered to them in the new company, but were bound or, at all events, entitled to accept and hold them as a proper investment of the trust funds. Both parties were agreed that by the reconstitution of the company there had been no material change of the assets or liabilities of the company as it existed prior to reconstitution, and that the registration under the later Companies Acts would probably prove of advantage to the shareholders.

The questions submitted were,—“(1) Are the parties of the first part bound to sell the shares in the new company now offered to them in exchange for those formerly held by them in the old company? Or (2)

Are they entitled in the circumstances stated to retain the same as a proper investment of the trust funds ? " No. 88.

Feb. 22, 1889.
Thomson's
Trustees v.
Thomson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—However desirable it may be that these trustees should become members of this company, there is no authority in the trust-deed enabling them to do so. The testator having perfect confidence in the investments which he himself has made recommends his trustees not to change any of them unless they see fit, but that is a totally different thing from authorising them to become members of a new company, with new capital, and under new conditions. The company in which the shares were held is in liquidation. It has been put an end to. Probably the new company will consist largely of the same members as the old one, and no doubt it may be highly successful. In this age of competition large extensions are sometimes of immense advantage to companies, but that does not make this company the less a new one, of which the trustees have no power to become members.

LORD YOUNG and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES DICKSON AND OTHERS (Peter Dickson's Trustees), Petitioners.— No. 89.
Balfour—A. Mitchell.

Feb. 23, 1889.
Dickson's
Trustees.

Trust—Investment—Consigned money—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19), secs. 67, 68, 79.—Lands held by testamentary trustees under a declaration that they should have no power to sell them during the lifetime of testator's children were taken by a railway company under compulsory powers and the price consigned in bank, "subject to the control and disposition of the Court of Session, to the intent that the same shall be applied, under the authority of the said Court, to some one or more of the purposes specified in the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, relative to parties under disability." The Court on the petition of the trustees, while the truster's children were alive, authorised the bank to pay over the consigned money to the trustees to be invested by them in accordance with their powers under their trust-deed, without requiring them to apply it to some one or more of the purposes specified in the Act.

PETER DICKSON, Isa Villa, Bridge of Allan, died on 31st January 1875, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, under which he, inter alia, expressly declared that his trustees should not have the power during the lifetime of his children to sell any part of his heritable estate. 2ND DIVISION.
Junior Lord
Ordinary.
M.

On 10th August 1888 the North British Railway, under compulsory powers, took a portion of the heritable property belonging to the trust, situated in the Gallowgate of Glasgow, the price thereof being fixed by valuation at £2700.

The trustees being unable, in consequence of the declaration above quoted, to give an effectual conveyance to the subjects sold (two of the truster's children being alive), the North British Railway Company consigned the price in the British Linen Company Bank, the consignment bearing that the sum had been consigned "subject to the control and disposition of the Court of Session, to the intent that the same shall be applied, under the authority of the said Court, to some one or more of

No. 89. the purposes specified in the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, relative to parties under disability."

Feb. 23, 1889.
Dickson's
Trustees.

The trustees being desirous of uplifting the consigned money and investing it in Glasgow Corporation Stock, presented a petition, bearing to be in terms of the 67th and 79th sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, in which they prayed the Court "to grant warrant to authorise and ordain the said British Linen Company to make payment to the petitioners of the said sum of £2700, with all interest accrued thereon, and to authorise and empower the petitioners to invest the said principal sum in the purchase of stock of the Corporation of Glasgow, or otherwise as your Lordships may direct; and further, to find the said North British Railway Company liable in the expenses of this application and of carrying through the investment of the said money."

On 8th February 1889 the Junior Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the petition to be amended at the bar to the effect of bringing it under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and of section 3 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1884, and by inserting in the prayer of the petition, after the word 'Glasgow,' the words 'either as a permanent, or as an interim investment'; and the petition having been so amended, on the motion of the petitioner, in respect of the importance of the question raised, reports the matter to the Second Division of the Court."*

* "NOTE.—In this petition, as originally presented, the petitioners, who are testamentary trustees of the late Peter Dickson, crave the authority of the Court to invest in the purchase of stock of the Corporation of Glasgow, a sum of about £2700 which has been received by them as the price of part of the heritable estate belonging to the trust, which was taken compulsorily by the North British Railway Company. The said sum was consigned in the British Linen Company's Bank on 10th November 1888, 'subject to the control and disposition of the Court of Session, to the intent that the same shall be applied, under the authority of the said Court, to some one or more of the purposes specified in the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, relating to parties under disability.'

"The said purposes as contained in the 67th section of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19 (the only section besides the 79th founded on by the petitioners), are as follows:—'Such monies shall be applied, under the authority of the Court of Session, to some one or more of the following purposes (that is to say),—In the purchase or redemption of the land-tax, or the discharge of any debt or incumbrance affecting the land in respect of which such money shall have been paid, or affecting other lands settled therewith on the same heirs, or for the same trusts or purposes, or affecting succeeding heirs of entail in any such lands, whether imposed and constituted by the entailor, or in virtue of powers given by the entail, or in virtue of powers conferred by any Act of Parliament: In the purchase of other lands to be conveyed, limited, and settled upon the same heirs and the like trusts and purposes, and in the same manner as the lands in respect of which such money shall have been paid stood settled; or if such monies shall be paid in respect of any buildings taken under the authority of this or the special Act, or injured by the proximity of the works, or in removing or replacing such buildings, or substituting others in their stead, in such manner as the said Court shall direct; or in payment to any party becoming absolutely entitled to such money.'

"On its being pointed out to the petitioners by the man of business to whom the petition was remitted, that the section above quoted does not authorise the investment of consigned money in the purchase of stocks issued by municipal corporations, they explained that they relied upon the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, as extending the purposes to which such trust monies might be applied. In particular they referred to section 3 of that Act (47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63), which provides that 'Trustees under any trust may, unless specially

THE COURT delivered no opinions, and pronounced the following No. 89.
interlocutor:—"On the report by the Honourable Lord Wellwood, remit to his Lordship with instructions to grant warrant Feb. 23, 1889.
to authorise and ordain the British Linen Company Bank to make Dickson's Trustees.
payment to the petitioners of the sum of £2700 mentioned in the petition, with all interest accrued thereon, the said sum to be invested by the petitioners in accordance with their powers under the trust-deed: And further, to find the North British Railway Company liable in the expenses of this application, and of carrying through the investment of the said money."

F. J. MARTIN, W.S., Agent.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Bart., Petitioner.—Asher—Dundas. No. 90.
JOHN STEWART KENNEDY, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.
Feb. 26, 1888.
Stewart v. Kennedy.

Appeal to House of Lords—Leave to appeal—Interlocutory judgment—Possibility of second appeal.—Circumstances in which the Court refused a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutor which did not exhaust the whole conclusions of the action.

(VIDE Kennedy v. Stewart, ante, p. 421.)

Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, Bart., presented this application for prohibited by the constitution or terms of the trust, invest the trust funds (a) in the purchase of, inter alia (subsection 6), stocks or annuities issued by any municipal corporation in Great Britain, which annuities, or the interest or dividend upon which stock are secured upon rates or taxes levied by such municipal corporation under the authority of any Act of Parliament.'

1ST DIVISION.
C.

"The petitioners have now amended their petition to the effect of founding upon the Trusts Act of 1884, and also—alternatively to the 67th section—upon section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, which provides for the interim investment of consigned money, in the following terms:—(sec. 68) 'Until the money can be so applied'—that is in terms of sec. 67,—'it shall be retained in bank at interest, or shall be laid out and invested in the public funds or in heritable securities.'

"It will be seen from the provisions of sections 67 and 68 of the Lands Clauses Act above quoted, that neither of these sections authorises the investment now desired by the petitioners, and the question now raised is whether the Trusts Act of 1884 can be read into the 67th and 68th sections of the Lands Clauses Act to the effect of extending the purposes to which consigned money may be applied under both or either of these sections. It appears to me that the Trusts Act of 1884 does not affect section 67 of the Lands Clauses Act because the specific object of that section is to secure the application of the purchase price of land sold compulsorily to the disburdening, purchase, or improvement of lands and heritages, for the benefit of the heirs in heritage, who would have been entitled to the lands taken.

"As regards section 68, however, it may be argued with some force that the object of that clause was simply to secure the safe interim investment of consigned money in one of the ways then recognised as legal for trust funds:—That the interim investments therein specified were, at the date of the Act, practically the only trust investments sanctioned, and that as the selection of trust investments has been extended by the Act of 1884, it is reasonable that the provisions of the latter Act should be held to apply to the interim investment of consigned money under the Lands Clauses Act.

"As the question is one of general importance, and as I think it is probable that such applications will become numerous if this application is granted, I report the matter for the consideration and decision of the Court."

No. 90.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of 21st December 1888, and of the First Division of 8th February 1889, in the action against him at the instance of John Stewart Kennedy, reported ante, p. 421, the conclusions of which had not been exhausted by these interlocutors.

He urged that an appeal should be allowed at this stage, before the other matters were disposed of. The first question was what was the meaning of the document on which Mr Kennedy founded. And in the event of the House of Lords taking the same view of the document as the Court of Session did, Sir Archibald proposed to bring a reduction on the ground of circumvention, error, and fraud.

The respondent contended that the case should be allowed to go on to final judgment before it was appealed. If an appeal were allowed at the present stage, the case would be hung up for a year. Besides, in the event of the House of Lords affirming the judgment of the Court of Session, there might be further appeals to that House, e.g., on the question of the heir's compensation. A multiplication of appeals was very undesirable.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case in which this application has been presented is an action for enforcement of a contract of sale contained in missive letters, the subject being the estate of Murtly, and the pursuer concluding for specific implement, and alternatively for damages. The defender resisted the action upon two grounds, the first being founded upon a construction of the personal contract of sale, and the second being that it was not a case in which specific implement was the appropriate remedy. We repelled both pleas, and appointed the pursuer to lodge in process the draft of a disposition by the defender of the estate of Murtly and others in favour of the pursuer, in fulfilment of the contract of sale constituted by the missives of sale. The draft disposition so appointed to be prepared has been lodged, and accordingly the case is now in such a position that the disposition may be adjusted. But there is a great deal to follow upon that, because when the deed has been executed, it will be necessary to apply to the Court to have the sale confirmed under the Entail Amendment Act of 1882. There may then arise questions of very great importance, particularly as regards the manner in which the compensation to the next heir will fall to be adjusted, and its amount. There is therefore a good deal to be done before specific implement can be given.

In a question of this kind the Court is bound to consider the interests of both parties, and in the exercise of its discretion to say where the balance lies. It has been suggested that the whole merits of the case are substantially exhausted. But I can hardly assent to that. No doubt the case has been finally decided up to this point, that the defender is bound by the missives to give specific implement of the contract therein contained. But there may be an appeal hereafter to the House of Lords in regard to other questions, and accordingly we must take into consideration the disadvantage to both parties if there should be more than one appeal. Mr Asher says that there is no ground for an appeal at a later stage. I cannot agree with him. There may be a very fair ground for appeal in the future, and besides the pursuer is quite entitled to suggest in a case like this that an appeal may be taken with the object of delay. There is therefore no protection or assurance against the prospect of there being more than one appeal. That is a very serious consideration.

The alternative of granting or refusing leave to appeal generally depends on a variety of considerations affecting the case in point. And it has been a common thing to present an application for leave to appeal against a judgment sustaining a plea of relevancy, the object being to avoid the expense which would attend an inquiry by proof or by jury trial, if it should be held by the House of Lords that there was no relevant case. We have not seen many of these cases lately, but I can recall two of them in which petitions for leave to appeal to the House of Lords were refused, and in both there was ultimately a verdict for the defender. That seems to be a very good practical justification of the refusal of the application. I do not say that they are precisely applicable, but I cannot help thinking that the likelihood of there being more than one appeal is a sufficient reason for refusing this petition.

No. 90.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

LORD ADAM.—There is a good deal of contentious matter still to be disposed of in this case. Your Lordship has said that there may quite well be a bona fide appeal at a future stage, and a case in point in which that course was taken was that of General Macdonald in the Dunalastair disentail, which was appealed to the House of Lords on the very question of the amount of compensation to be paid to the next heir. I do not think it is at all desirable that there should be a possibility of two appeals, and I think the respondent has a legitimate interest that the case shall be disposed of here before an appeal is taken. I accordingly concur with your Lordship.

LORD LEE concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT refused leave to appeal.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

THE DALMELLINGTON IRON COMPANY AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents). No. 91.

—Asher—C. S. Dickson.

THE GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders
(Reclaimers).—Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So. Western
Railway Co.

Payment—Condictio indebiti—Error—Knowledge.—Where a person makes a payment in the knowledge that the sum paid is not due, he is presumed to have waived all objection, and to have admitted the debt. In order, however, to bar his right to repetition of the payment it must be established that the knowledge that the sum was not due either was, or should have been, present to his mind at the time of payment.

An iron company and a railway company entered into an agreement by which the railway company, inter alia, undertook "not to carry traffic for any other party at lower proportionate rates than those charged to the iron company, and to place the latter on the same footing as that enjoyed by the most favoured traders on the line." The iron company regularly paid for fifteen years the rates charged by the railway company on their traffic. In an action by the iron company against the railway company, founded on this clause, for repetition of certain sums which they averred they had been overcharged, in respect that lower rates had been charged to two other traders, the railway company pleaded that the pursuers were barred from repetition in respect that they had paid the alleged overcharges in the knowledge (possessed by their manager, who was one of their partners, and their secretary) that the two traders were being charged lower rates. Held, after a proof, that the pursuers were entitled to repetition in respect (1) that though their manager and their secretary had had some information of the rates charged to the other traders this information was not in fact present to their minds at the time of payment, and was not of such a character that it ought to have

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

been present; and (2) that the defenders must be held to have known that they were violating their own agreement.

Carrier—Railway—Agreement—Construction.—A railway company entered into an agreement with an iron company to carry upon their railway system the whole mineral and other traffic which the iron company might send, of the description and at rates and charges specified in the third article of the agreement. In that article the traffic was divided into two classes, of which class A included "pig-iron, coke, hewing stone, bricks, and tiles," and class B included "rubble stone, iron ore, coal," &c. The railway company further undertook not to carry traffic for any other trader at lower proportionate rates than those charged to the iron company, and to place the latter on the same footing as that enjoyed by the most favoured traders on the line.

Held, on a construction of this agreement, (1) that it imposed an obligation on the railway company not to carry traffic, inwards or outwards, for any other traders at lower proportionate rates per ton per mile than those charged to the iron company, irrespective of the terminus from or to which the traffic was carried; (2) that in the case of lower rates being charged to other traders, e.g. for pig-iron, the iron company was entitled to a reduction only on pig-iron, and not on the other specific kinds of traffic comprised in the general class to which pig-iron belonged.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

On 30th March 1868 the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company as first parties, and the Dalmellington Iron Company and the individual partners thereof as second parties, entered into an agreement whereby the second parties bound themselves that the whole mineral and other traffic of the description specified in the third article thereof, which they might have occasion to send along the first parties' railways to or from their works or mineral fields, should be sent and be conveyed by the railway company over their railway system, and that the second parties should pay in respect of the conveyance of such traffic the rates and charges therein specified. The third article of the agreement provided—"The mineral and other traffic referred to in article second shall be held to embrace all traffic falling under the descriptions following, excepting therefrom all traffic to or from the port and harbour of Troon:—Class A,—pig-iron, coke, hewing stone, bricks, and tiles. Class B,—rubble stone, calcined or raw ironstone, iron ore, coal sent to or by the second party . . . shale, lime, limestone, sand, and fire-clay."

The fourth article set forth the rate per ton per mile to be charged under the agreement, all the articles classed in class A being charged at one rate, all the articles in class B being charged at another rate.

The agreement came into operation on 1st January 1868, and was to continue for ten years, but by a supplementary agreement, dated 15th February 1873, which was to come into force from and after the 31st August 1872, the time during which the original agreement was to continue in force was extended to October 1890. The fifth article of this supplementary agreement provided,—“The first party undertake not to carry traffic for any other party at lower proportionate rates than those charged to the second party, and to place the latter on the same footing as that enjoyed by the most favoured traders on the line; Troon traffic . . . alone excepted from this condition.”

On 16th June 1887 James Murray and others, the surviving partners of the original Dalmellington Iron Company, and the Dalmellington Iron Company, Limited, which had taken the place of the original company, raised this action against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, on the ground generally that the defenders had carried, in violation of the above agreement, traffic for other persons and firms at rates lower than those charged to the pursuers, and concluding for repetition of the amount alleged to have been so paid by them in excess.

The pursuers, after setting forth the agreement, and the rates stipulated therein, averred—(Cond. 7) “These rates were duly paid by the pursuers in the erroneous belief that they were the same proportionate rates as were demanded from other parties and traders on the system for traffic as enumerated and defined under tables A and B, and relying on the defenders fairly and honestly fulfilling their part of the said agreement, and without the pursuers knowing the fact that there were more favoured traders in the matter of mineral traffic rates.”

No. 91:
Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So. Western
Railway Co.

In conds. 8 and 9 the pursuers averred that in 1884 they discovered for the first time that the defenders had entered into an agreement, dated 3d and 13th April 1866, with the Earl of Eglinton, under which coal traffic was conveyed by them to Ardrossan from Hurlford, a distance of twenty miles, for 1s. 7d. per ton, while the rate according to the pursuers' agreement was 1s. 11d., and also that under it the defenders carried pig-iron from the Portland Iron Works, Hurlford, to Ardrossan for 1s. 8d., while the rate according to the pursuers' agreement would have been 2s. 1d.

In conds. 11 and 12 the pursuers further averred that they had ascertained in June 1886 that the defenders had been in use for many years past to grant special reductions to the Lanemark Coal Company, under an agreement entered into with the latter in 1874, in terms of which they had for the period from 25th August 1874 to 17th August 1885 carried coals from Lanemark Collieries, a distance of thirty-one miles, to and from Troon, at the rate of 1s. 9d. per ton, and to Ayr, a distance of twenty-four miles, at the rate of 1s. 7d. per ton, while the rates, according to the pursuers' agreement with them, should have been for these distances—2s. 6d. to Troon, and 2s. 2d. to Ayr.

The conclusions of the summons were for payment of the four following sums in name of overcharges—(1) £2767, 14s. 4d. as the difference between the amount the pursuers had paid under schedule B of their agreement from 31st August 1872 to 31st December 1874 and what they should have paid had they been charged during that period at the Eglinton rate from Hurlford to Ardrossan; (2) £16,356, 6s. 9d. as the difference between what they had paid under the same schedule from 31st December 1874 to 25th February 1885,* and what they should have paid during that period if charged at the Lanemark Coal Company's rate on their coal carried from Lanemark to Ayr; (3) £2784, 2s. 2d. as the difference between what they had paid under the same schedule from 25th February 1885 to 31st October 1886 and what they should have paid during that period if they had been charged at the Lanemark rate; (4) £14,837, 15s. 9d. as the difference between payments made between 31st August 1872 and 31st December 1886 under schedule A for pig-iron and what they should have paid had they been charged at the Eglinton rate for coal and pig-iron between Hurlford and Ardrossan.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 7) “The rates demanded from and paid by other traders were well known to the pursuers and the deceased John Hunter, who was, during the period up to his death on 18th January 1886, the manager or managing partner of the pursuers' company.”

As regarded the sum first concluded for, the defenders further averred;—“Explained that the pursuers are claiming a reduced rate on articles which are not embraced within the table of rates charged under the agreement with Lord Eglinton, which agreement provided for a reduction on the rates for coal traffic only. Explained that the said sum of £2767, 14s. 4d. bears to be made up on the footing of the pursuers being

* The new company was incorporated under the Companies Act on 25th February 1885.

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

entitled to a deduction from their rates to all places whatever proportionate to the amount by which the rate of 1s. 7d. charged for traffic from Hurlford to Ardrossan, being twenty miles, falls short of the scheduled rate under pursuers' agreement for that distance. Of said sum of £2767, 14s. 4d. only £6, 1s. 9d. bears to be in respect of traffic carried from the pursuers' works. Further, only £37, 5s. 1d. bears to be in respect of traffic between the pursuers' works and Ardrossan, the balance—£2728, 9s. 3d.—bearing to be in respect of traffic between their works and other places to which the rates charged against them are as low as those charged against any other traders. Only £711, 10s. 2d. of said sum of £2767, 14s. 4d. bears to be in respect of coal traffic."

The answers in regard to the other sums concluded for were, mutatis mutandis, substantially to the same effect.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) Under the several agreements mentioned the pursuers were entitled to have their whole traffic specified in said Classes A and B carried during the period in question at the lowest rates either to Lord Eglinton or the Lanemark Coal Company for any of the goods or materials mentioned in the said classes respectively. (2) The pursuers having been overcharged by the defenders, are entitled to repetition of the sums so overcharged.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant. (2) Mora and acquiescence. (3) The payments in question having been made by the pursuers voluntarily in full knowledge of the whole facts now alleged, so far as material, they are not entitled to demand repetition of the said sums. (4) The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (5) On a sound construction of the agreements, the defenders are not indebted to the pursuers, and are entitled to be assolized. (6) In any event, the pursuers are only entitled to a reduced rate on articles carried under Lord Eglinton's agreement, or for the Lanemark Coal Company at a lower rate than that charged against the pursuers. (7) In any event, the pursuers are only entitled to a reduction on their rates for coal traffic to Ayr, and pig-iron and other traffic to Ardrossan; et separatim, they are not entitled to have their rates to any places reduced below those charges to the same place against those traders on a comparison with whose rates to other places the pursuers' claim for reduction is based.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was mainly directed to the question whether the pursuers had paid the overcharges complained of in the knowledge that other traders were being charged at less rates.

In regard to the overcharges based on the Eglinton agreement, as both the Lord Ordinary and the Court held that neither the pursuers nor Mr Hunter were aware of the terms of that agreement, it is unnecessary to go into the details of the evidence on that point.

The evidence regarding the pursuers' knowledge of the Lanemark rates depended entirely on the knowledge (if any) possessed by Mr Hunter, the pursuers' manager, and Mr Gavin, their clerk. Mr Hunter became manager in 1846, his duties being, according to Mr J. H. Houldsworth, one of the pursuers, "to take the practical management of the iron-works in all its details. He was not then authorised in any way to enter into agreements of a large or important character for the company. If there was any question of entering into a lease or traffic agreement he was instructed to go to the partners of the company."* In 1859 he became a partner of the Lanemark Company, but he took little, if any, charge of its affairs in consequence of the pursuers requiring him to give his whole time to the management of their company. In 1868, when the original agreement between the pursuers and the defenders was entered into, he was still only manager of the pursuers' company, but in 1872 he became one of its partners, and continued so to be until his death in 1884. He, along with Mr Barr, the pursuers' law-agent, acted as their representative in negotiating the supplementary agreement of 1872.* Mr Gavin came to know of the Lanemark agreement in 1882 in consequence of his having asked the defenders to quote special rates for the conveyance of certain coal which the pursuers had bought from the Lanemark Company. It further appeared that the pursuers had repeatedly asked the defenders to reduce their rates owing to the exigencies of trade.

---

* Mr Gavin gave this evidence regarding Mr Hunter's position:—"The checking clerk went over the [railway traffic] accounts and checked them, and if there was nothing unusual he initialed them and passed them to Mr Hunter,

On 14th March 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first, second, third, and fifth pleas in law for the defenders: Finds that under the agreement of 1868, and supplementary agreement of 1872, between the parties, the pursuers were and are entitled to have the traffic sent by them to the defenders conveyed along the defenders' railway system at the same rates per ton per mile as are charged by the defenders to other traders for the same kind of traffic, and are now entitled to repetition of any rates or charges paid by them to the defenders in excess of rates charged by the defenders for the same kind of traffic to other traders: Quoad ultra continues the cause."† the manager, for signature. . . . If there was any difficulty about any of the rates the clerk would apply to me. Mr Hunter did not go into the details of the accounts; he just signed them when they were presented to him initialed by the clerk. . . . Mr Hunter did not interfere much about the work of the office. His duty was to exercise a supervision over the whole works. He was practically manager at the works. Cross.—He could see the rates charged if he chose to look at the accounts."

* On 30th May 1876 Mr Hunter sent this letter to Mr Barr:—"My dear Sir,—Has the agreement between the G. & S.-W. Ry. Coy. and the Dalmellington Iron Co., to which you refer in your letter to me of the 6th December 1872, ever been executed? If it has not, no time should be lost in getting it completed," &c.

† "OPINION.—. . . The parties have argued before me three questions involved in the defences, and on these questions I have been asked to give judgment in the meantime, because if decided in favour of the defenders, the pursuers' claim would be excluded in whole or in part, while if decided in favour of the pursuers, they would be entitled to decree for such sum as an accounting would shew to be due to them. These three questions are—(1) Did the pursuers pay the charges now complained of as overcharges, in the knowledge that others were being charged less than they were for their traffic? (2) Does that knowledge, if it existed, or such as it was, bar the pursuers from insisting in their present claim? and (3) On a construction of the agreements before referred to, what parts of the pursuers' claim, if any, can be maintained, and what parts are excluded?

"1. On the first question proof has been submitted by both parties, partly parole, and partly documentary, the result of which will now be considered. It is not proved that any of the partners of the pursuers' company (as then constituted) knew of the lower rates which were being charged to other traders, except perhaps Mr Hunter. Indeed, on this part of the case it is not maintained by the defenders—it certainly is not established—that there was knowledge on the part of anyone connected with the pursuers regarding the lower rates conceded to other traders, except on the part of Mr Hunter, and Mr Barr, the law-agent of the Dalmellington Company. The defenders, however, maintain that any knowledge which Mr Hunter had must be regarded as knowledge

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The first point was the construction of the equality clause of the agreement. The rate there menon the part of the pursuers, because of Mr Hunter's position in the pursuers' firm. This makes it necessary to consider what that position was. Mr Hunter was from 1846 the manager of the pursuers' company, his duties being 'to take the practical management of the iron-works in all its details. He was not then authorised in any way to enter into agreements of a large or important character for the company. If there was any question of entering into a lease or traffic agreement, he was instructed to go to the partners of the company.' Mr Hunter, in 1874, became a partner of the pursuers' company to a small extent—'a thirty-first share'—but he continued still to take the practical management of the works. That being Mr Hunter's position the next question is the state of Mr Hunter's knowledge, and that so far as the case has been presented to me concerns the rates at which the defenders were carrying traffic under (1) Lord Eglinton's agreement ; and (2) under agreement or arrangement with the Lanemark Company. I shall take these in their order." (His Lordship then proceeded to review the evidence bearing on Mr Hunter's knowledge of the Eglinton agreement, coming to the conclusion that he had no such knowledge.)

"I come now to consider the proof bearing upon the question, whether the pursuers knew of rates being charged to the Lanemark Company which were less than those charged to the pursuers. The pursuers, I think, did not know of these rates, unless it be held that knowledge on the part of Mr Hunter, or Mr Gavin (the pursuers' clerk), is knowledge by the pursuers. In 1859 Mr Hunter (then manager, as I have already said, for the pursuers) became a partner of the Lanemark Company, in which he held a very substantial interest until his death. He was therefore quite aware in 1868 and 1872 of the rates paid by the Lanemark Company to the defenders for the traffic carried by them for that company.

"When the agreement of 1868 was entered into, Mr Hunter was not a party to it ; he was then the pursuers' manager at the works—nothing more. He had no authority to make traffic agreements or enter into any important contract as representing the pursuers. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the knowledge which Mr Hunter had in 1868 and which came to him as a partner of the Lanemark Company, cannot be imputed to the pursuers, because Mr Hunter was at that time also the pursuers' servant. Matters, however, stood in a different position in 1874. Mr Hunter was then a partner of the pursuers' company, and was apparently put forward by the pursuers as their representative in negotiating on their behalf along with Mr Barr, their law-agent, the agreement of 1872. This appears from the correspondence and from the memorandum of the meeting held on 6th February 1872 with the chairman and directors of the defenders' company, in which Mr Hunter is described (by Mr Barr) as appearing 'for the Dalmellington.' No other partner of the pursuers' company appears at that time to have taken part in the negotiations. Accordingly, I am of opinion that in 1872, when the supplementary agreement was negotiated and concluded, the pursuers, through their partner Mr Hunter, must be regarded as being in the knowledge that the charges made by the defenders for the Lanemark Company's traffic were less than those charged for similar traffic to the pursuers. I need say nothing about Mr Gavin's knowledge. What he learned on the subject now under consideration was only learned in 1882, and went no further than to Mr Hunter ; and if Mr Hunter's knowledge of the Lanemark rates was the pursuers' knowledge in 1872, what Mr Gavin learned in 1882 neither made that knowledge more nor less.

"2. This leads me to the second question submitted at present for decision, viz., What is the effect of the pursuers' knowledge ; does it bar the present claim ? At the most, the pursuers' knowledge of the Lanemark rates could only bar the present claim in so far as it consists of charges made by the defenders in excess of the Lanemark rates. But in my opinion it has not even this effect. Whatever knowledge the pursuers had about the Lanemark Company, or any other trader's rates, the defenders had at least as much knowledge. In this tioned was a special rate. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the pursuers obtained all the benefit which the clause was intended to give

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So. Western
Railway Co.

state of matters the parties entered into an agreement, which is free from all ambiguity. They agreed that from and after 31st August 1872 the defenders should not carry traffic for any other party at lower proportionate rates than those charged to the pursuers, i.e., the rates charged to the pursuers under the original agreement, and the defenders undertook to place the pursuers on the same footing as that enjoyed by the most favoured traders on the line—Troon traffic 'alone excepted from this condition.' Nothing could be more explicit. Nobody using the defenders' line was to have any advantage over the pursuers in the matter of rates: the pursuers were to be put on an equal footing with the most favoured traders. Assuming now that both parties to this agreement knew that the Lanemark Company, or any other trader, was, at the date of the agreement, in a better or more favoured position as regards rates than the pursuers, what was the purpose and effect of that agreement? Simply to abolish the inequality by putting the pursuers on a footing with the most favoured. I do not know whether the parties had any particular rates or agreement in view at the time this agreement was made, but if they had, then it was their knowledge of the existing inequality which probably led to the agreement being expressed as it was: if they had not, then it was to prevent any inequality for the future that they stipulated. Whatever knowledge either or both of the parties had before the agreement was concluded cannot affect or overrule the agreement actually made. Nor can the defenders be heard to say that the Lanemark Company's rates, or the Lord Eglinton agreement rates, were in view of the parties, and were intended to be treated as exceptions. Troon traffic alone was excepted from the agreement.

"3. One or two questions have been raised on the construction of the fifth article of the agreement of 1872.

"(a) The defenders say that 'traffic' means only outward traffic. I see no ground for this limitation. I think traffic means all traffic—outward or inward.

"(b) The defenders farther say that if the pursuers are not charged more than other traders for the same kind of traffic to the same port or terminus they are then placed on the footing of the most favoured trader, and can ask nothing more. I do not adopt this view. Suppose that one trader sends goods to Ardrossan alone, that being his market, and that the pursuers never send anything to Ardrossan, having there no market, is the Ardrossan trader to have his goods sent to Ardrossan at 1s. 6d. per mile for twenty miles, and the pursuers to be charged 2s. per mile for twenty miles in another direction? That would neither be placing the pursuers on the footing of the most favoured trader, nor observing the other branch of the defenders' obligation, 'not to carry traffic for any other party at lower proportionate rates than those charged to' the pursuers, for lower proportionate rates means lower rates per ton per mile irrespective of the direction in which the traffic is carried.

"(c) The pursuers maintain that if the defenders have carried for another trader any traffic at lower rates than those charged to the pursuers, they are entitled to have carried at the lower rate, not only the same kind of traffic, but the whole articles comprised in the class to which the particular traffic belongs. Thus, by the pursuers' agreement with the defenders, the defenders are bound to carry under class A 'pig-iron, coke, hewing stone, bricks, and tiles,' at 1½d. per ton per mile for any distance over six and not beyond sixteen miles. Suppose that the defenders have carried for another trader bricks for fifteen miles at 1d. per ton per mile, in that case the pursuers maintain that they are entitled to have pig-iron carried for the same distance at the same rate, not because the defenders have carried pig-iron on these terms for anyone, but because the defenders having carried bricks at that rate, and bricks being one of the articles in class A of the pursuers' agreement the whole of class A must be put on the same footing and carried at the same rate. In short, the pursuers maintain that class A is a unum quid, and that if they are entitled on any ground to have one of the articles enumerated in that class carried at lower than agreement rates,

No. 91.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So. Western
Railway Co.

them if they were charged the same rate per ton per mile as that which was charged to the most favoured traders on the same kind of traffic. If this reasoning was correct it led to the construction that they were only entitled to reduction where they could shew that the defenders had been giving preference for traffic to the same or analogous destinations, and in the same direction. The pursuers sent only to Ardrossan, and had no concern with alleged preferences given to the other traders who sent their traffic to Carlisle and Glasgow. There could be no question of reduction in the case of traffic involving no competition. The next question was whether the alleged overcharges were paid by the pursuers in the knowledge that other traders were being charged less for their traffic. First, with reference to the Lanemark agreement. It was quite clear that Mr Hunter, the manager of the pursuers' company, knew of it throughout the whole time. In 1859 he became a partner in the Lanemark Company, in which he held a substantial interest till his death in 1886. He was therefore quite aware in 1868 and 1872 of the rates paid by the Lanemark Company. In 1872 he became a partner in the pursuers' firm, and was put forward as the alter ego of the company in the negotiations along with Mr Barr, the pursuers' law-agent. The correspondence and memorandum of meeting with the defenders of 6th February 1872 shewed this. Hunter was described as appearing "for Dalmellington." He was clearly the acting and responsible manager. He signed the railway accounts, and was thus cognisant of all the rates paid. Throughout his correspondence with the railway company he dealt with them as having power to adjust and get new rates. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that knowledge on his part was proved in 1872. It was also beyond question that Mr Gavin knew also in 1882. It must be taken then as clearly proved that both Hunter and Gavin knew of the Lanemark rate. That being so, the pursuers had, in respect of this knowledge, intentionally abandoned their advantage under the equality clause of the 1872 agreement. Second, with reference to Lord Eglinton's agreement, the evidence, though not so absolutely clear, was equally convincing. In this state of the facts, what was the law applicable? It was settled, according to the law of Scotland and the law of England, on a review of the cases cited by the pursuers, that: (1) if a payment were made in full knowledge of the facts, the Court would not give the remedy of repetition to the person who had made such payment; (2) that while the mere existence of the means of knowledge would not absolutely disentitle the person who has made payment from recovering, yet if it appeared that he had so acted as to waive all inquiry his right of repetition would be barred; (3) the Court would also consider the element whether it was unconscionable for the person paid to retain the money, and unconscionable for the person who had paid to demand it back again. The recent case of Evershed<sup>1</sup> was a fortiori of the present. The proof then having disclosed a case of waiver by the pursuers of their right to recover the alleged overcharges, as well as of payment by them in the full knowledge that they were paying more than was paid by Lord Eglinton

the whole class must be carried at the rate thus reduced. I do not so read the agreement. The classification of different kinds of traffic saved repetition, but does not seem to me to have had any other intention or purpose. It was easier to say that pig-iron, coke, bricks, &c. shall be carried at 1½d. per ton than to say pig-iron 1½d. per ton, coke 1½d. per ton, and so on. In my opinion the pursuers get all the benefit which the clause was intended to give, or does give, if they are charged the same rates per ton per mile as is charged on the same kind of traffic to the most favoured trader."

<sup>1</sup> Evershed v. London and North-Western Railway Company, Feb. 1877. L. R., 2 Q. B. Div. 254, and July 5, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1029.

and the Lanemark Coal Company, their right to recover could not be maintained. No. 91.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The Lord Ordinary's construction of the agreement was sound, subject to the modification that the pursuers were entitled to have class A dealt with as a whole, so that where ironstone was carried at a lower rate for others the pursuers were entitled to have a correspondingly low coal rate, because they were in the same class. (2) On the question of knowledge, with reference to the Lanemark rate, it was important to observe that until 1878 the pursuers dealt solely in iron, while the Lanemark rate was a coal rate. It was also important that they had no knowledge which the defenders did not possess, and the latter had a duty to see that their accounts were properly charged under the equality clause. Hunter, though a partner of the Lanemark company, paid no detailed attention to its affairs, as his whole time was required for the pursuers' business. He had no authority to enter into agreements. It was evident too that he was constantly pressing to get reduced rates for the pursuers' traffic, not as matter of right, but owing to the exigencies of trade. It was inconceivable that if the pursuers had known of the Lanemark agreement they should not have insisted on a reduction when the equality clause was inserted into the 1872 agreement. It was true that Gavin had a certain amount of information in 1882 about it; but he obtained this information in order to satisfy himself about a special transaction which was never carried out. When the transaction came to nothing the information would very naturally go out of his mind. The proof as to Hunter's knowledge of Lord Eglinton's agreement also failed. In this state of facts how stood the law? The old doctrine of condictio indebiti was that an unavoidable error in fact or in law was sufficient to found an action to recover payment made in such error.<sup>1</sup> There was no distinction recognised between the two classes of error.<sup>2</sup> It was quite true that Lord Brougham had as regards error in law laid it down in two cases,<sup>3</sup> that by the law of Scotland payment made under such an error could not be recovered. There was, however, good reason to doubt whether the rule so laid down could be accepted as sound.<sup>4</sup> The Court had expressed hesitation in accepting these cases as absolutely settling the law, although it was admitted that in very few cases would ignorantia juris found a condictio. In Dickson v. Halbert,<sup>5</sup> where these general doubts were expressed, the Court held that error in point of law afforded a ground for reducing a discharge granted sine causa in ignorance of the granter's legal rights. In England Lord Brougham's dictum had been rejected.<sup>6</sup> At the present time the law seemed to be practically settled that condictio indebiti will always lie where the party paying has not paid knowingly and voluntarily intending to waive all objection.<sup>7</sup> Further, the pursuers were not barred from their right to recover by lapse of time

<sup>1</sup> 3 Ersk. 354; Stair, 179; Bell's Prins. 534.

<sup>2</sup> Carrick v. Carse, Aug. 5, 1778, M. 2931.

<sup>3</sup> Wilson v. Sinclair, Dec. 7, 1830, 4 W. & S. 398-409, and 3 Scot. Jur. 123; Dixons v. Monkland Coal Company, Sept. 17, 1831, 5 W. & S. 445-452.

<sup>4</sup> Kerr on Fraud, 474.

<sup>5</sup> Dickson v. Halbert, Feb. 17, 1854, 16 D. 586, 26 Scot. Jur. 266.

<sup>6</sup> Kelly v. Solare, 1841, 9 Mees. & Wel. 54; Townsend v. Crosby, 1860, 8 C. B. (N. S.) 477; Dixon v. Brown, April 13, 1886, L. R., 32 Ch. Div. 597.

<sup>7</sup> Baird's Trustees v. Baird & Co., July 10, 1877, 4 R. 1005; Durrant v. Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales, Nov. 16, 1880, L. R., 6 Q. B. D. 234; Balfour v. Smith & Logan, Feb. 9, 1877, 4 R. 454, per Lord Shand, 462; Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., v. Godlow, 1875, L. R., 11 L., 517, Lord Chelmsford, 527.

No. 91. since they made the payment.<sup>1</sup> The case of Evershed<sup>2</sup> did not apply, because there was there the amplest and fullest knowledge on the part of the agent who had charge of the traffic. On the whole matter, then, the proof disclosed facts sufficient in law to found a condictio, and the overcharges fell to be repaid to the pursuers.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This is an action for the recovery of overcharges. It is founded on an agreement entered into between the pursuers and defenders in 1868, and a supplementary agreement dated in December 1872 and February 1873. The latter agreement by the 5th article thereof provides as follows:—“The first party undertake not to carry traffic for any other party at lower proportionate rates than those charged to the second party, and to place the latter on the same footing as that enjoyed by the most favoured traders on the line, Troon traffic, unless arranged for as above, alone excepted from this condition.” On the construction and effect of that agreement I adopt the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. I have nothing to add to the views which his Lordship has expressed in his note.

The rates with which the pursuers compare the rates charged to them are—1st, Hurlford to Ardrossan for ironstone; and 2d, Lanemark to Ayr for coal. These were charged to the Eglinton Iron Company and the Lanemark Company respectively, and were lower than the rates charged to the pursuers.

The defenders aver that the pursuers knew the rates which were charged to these companies, and that they paid the rates charged to them in the full knowledge of the overcharge. They plead that the pursuers are thereby barred from recovering the overcharge.

The persons to whom this knowledge of the overcharge is attributed are Mr Hunter and Mr Gavin. Mr Hunter was during the period libelled the manager of the pursuers' company, and became in 1872 a small shareholder. Mr Gavin was at one time a clerk, and afterwards the secretary of the pursuers. It is not alleged that any of the other partners or officials were aware of the overcharge.

In considering this question it is to be observed that the parties are not in the same position. The defenders knew, or must be held to have known, that they were overcharging the pursuers. They knew the agreement, and of course they knew the rates which they were charging to other traders, and consequently knew, or must be held to have known, that they were violating the agreement. They say that they put upon it a construction other than that which has been adopted by the Court, and that the rate which was allowed to the Lanemark Company was a special rate, which under the agreement they were not bound to allow to the pursuers. But I must hold that they were wrong. Nor do I see any plausible ground on which they can maintain the construction which they put on the agreement. To my mind there was no justification for their charging higher rates to the pursuers for ironstone than they charged to the Eglinton Iron Company. Nor can I see how any special rate could be excepted from the operation of the agreement. For the agreement is expressed in very absolute terms, and applies to all traffic carried for any trader, with the single exception of rate, it was nothing more than a charge for carrying coals from Lanemark to Ayr.

<sup>1</sup> Earl of Beauchamp v. Winie, 1873, L. R., 6 E. and Ir. App. 223; Cooper v. Phibbs, 1867, L. R., 6 E. and Ir. App. 149; Durrant v. Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales, supra.

<sup>2</sup> Evershed v. London and North-Western Railway Company, Feb. 1877, L. R., 2 Q. B. Div. 254, and July 5, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1029.

Troon traffic, and though the pursuers choose to call the Lanemark rate a special No. 91.

Again, there is nothing in the case to suggest that the pursuers intended to submit to what they knew to be an overcharge. It is inconceivable that they should. Further, their correspondence, which was conducted almost exclusively by Mr Hunter, shews that there was a continuous effort on their part to get the rates reduced. But they made no claim for a reduction under the equality clause. It does not seem to have occurred to their mind that the circumstances admitted of an appeal to it. Their application was based on the necessities of their trade, and writing on 29th August 1883 Mr Hunter goes so far as to say that "unless we get some reduction on the carriage of our pig-iron and minerals to and from these works they must be stopped." Such a course of action and such expressions seem entirely inconsistent with the notion that the pursuers knew of the overcharge and voluntarily submitted to it.

The defenders, however, undertake to prove that Mr Hunter knew of the rates allowed to the Eglinton Iron Company and Lanemark Company, and it is necessary that I should shortly notice the evidence in regard to each of them, though I am relieved from the necessity of going into this matter at any length from the detailed examination which the Lord Ordinary has made of it.

The rate allowed to the Eglinton Iron Company, called the Hurlford rate, was fixed by an agreement between that company and the defenders in 1865. One important consideration is, that that rate was fixed some years before the agreement between the pursuers and defenders. If the pursuers or Mr Hunter, who took a leading part in negotiating the agreement, had known of the Hurlford rate in 1868, it may be doubtful if they would have accepted the rates fixed by the agreement in that year. But when in 1872 they got the benefit of an equality clause, they would either have insisted on a reduction of the existing rates, or made a claim under that clause. It cannot be imputed to them that they desired to pay more than they could help. If they knew of the Hurlford rate at the time when they settled the equality clause, they must have known that they had an immediate right to a reduction.

It is the case of the defenders that Mr Hunter came to know of the Hurlford rate when the agreement of 1868 was settled. They say that the Eglinton Iron Company's agreement, or the terms of it, was communicated to Mr Hunter. There is evidence to the effect that at later discussions the arrangements of the defenders with Lord Eglinton and the Eglinton Iron Company were fully explained to Mr Hunter and Mr Barr, who represented the pursuers. But I am unable to hold that there is any sufficient proof of Mr Hunter's knowledge, because it seems to me to be certain that if the knowledge which is imputed to him had really existed he could not have acted as he did, but would at once have insisted on the right of his company to a reduction, which it is conceded on both sides he never did. On this question of fact I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I need not go into more detail.

With regard to the Lanemark rate, I think that it is proved that it was at one time known to Mr Hunter. Mr Hunter was a partner of the Lanemark Company, though he took very little, if any, charge of its affairs, in consequence of the pursuers insisting that he should give his whole time to the management of their company. It further appears that the Lanemark rate became known to Mr Gavin, the pursuers' secretary, though in connection with a particular transaction which was not carried out. And when I am on the subject of Mr Hunter's

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

No. 91. knowledge, I may notice that it is not clear that he ever knew whether the agreement of 1872 was signed or not if we are to judge by the terms of the letter to Barr dated 30th May 1876.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

One matter more requires to be stated, viz., that until 1878 the pursuers dealt almost entirely in iron. Till that date the amount of coal carried for them was inconsiderable, and the coal rate was not of much importance to them.

It is in these circumstances that the defenders contend that the pursuers are barred from recovering the overcharges for which they sue. As I think that the pursuers did not know of the Hurlford rate, the case of the defenders so far fails. But as Mr Hunter and Mr Gavin had some knowledge of the Lanemark rate, I have to consider how that knowledge may affect the pursuers.

There is high authority for the proposition that a payment made in the knowledge that it is not due cannot be recovered. It seems to depend on the principle that such a payment imports a waiver of all objections, and an admission that the debt is justly due. When there is a question whether money is due, and when it is paid in the knowledge of the facts on which that question depends, it may be reasonably inferred that all objections are waived, and that the debt is admitted. To hold that a payment so made cannot be recovered is nothing more than to hold that the voluntary waiver and admission cannot be afterwards called into question, or, in other words, that a person who has paid a debt which he has admitted to be due will not be allowed to go back on his admission. I can see no other principle on which the rule of law can depend.

I do not think that we can apply this rule of law unless we are satisfied that the presumption on which it is founded is, or, at least, may be, in accordance with the fact, nor, in my judgment, can this condition exist unless it be the case that at the time when the payment was made the knowledge of the overcharge was present to the mind of the person who made the payment. If it was not he could not intend to waive any right or make any admission. It may be sufficient if the knowledge should have been present to his mind, on the ground that he cannot be allowed to say that he did not know what he ought to have known. But unless it was present, or should have been present, it would, I think, be unjust to apply the rule, and particularly in this case, when I think it to be certain that neither the pursuers nor any of their officials ever intended to waive any right or submit to any overcharge.

Assuming that the pursuers are to be identified with Mr Hunter and Mr Gavin it is, in my opinion, plain that when the rates charged by the defenders were paid they never thought that there was any overcharge. Such a thing never entered into their minds.

As I have already said, Mr Hunter was constantly urging the defenders to concede a reduction of rates. He may have known of the Lanemark rate, in the sense that it had at some time or other been brought under his notice, but it seems to have escaped his recollection. That he should have knowingly submitted to the overcharge which the defenders made is out of the question, unless he was defrauding the pursuers for the benefit of the Lanemark Company, a charge which has not been made against him. Nor is it remarkable that the Lanemark rate might have dropped from his memory, because his whole attention was given to the pursuers' affairs, and because at the time when the rate was fixed, and for a long time afterwards, coal traffic was of little importance to the pursuers. The position of Mr Gavin need hardly be considered. His knowledge was confined to a particular transaction, which was not carried out, and, besides, it does not appear that the payment of the rates fell within his department. No. 91.

Nor can it, I think, be said that the pursuers—including Mr Hunter—ought to have been aware of the overcharge when the rates were paid. Assuming such knowledge as may be fairly imputed to Mr Hunter, I think that his oversight was excusable, and that the defenders cannot retain the moneys which they have received in excess of what was justly due to them on the plea that the pursuers were in default. The defenders were the real defaulters. There was no excuse for them making the overcharge, and, in my opinion, they must repay the amount of it.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Dalmellington
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

LORD YOUNG, LORD LEE, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

YEATS'S TRUSTEES (Bellfield Colliery Company), Pursuers (Respondents). No. 92.
—Asher—Low.

THE GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders
(Appellants).—Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Yeats's
Trustees v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

Railway—Rates—Undue preference—“Same portion of the line of railway”—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 83.—The 83d section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, gives certain powers to a railway company to alter or vary such tolls as it is by its special Act entitled to charge, “provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate . . . in respect of all passengers and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances. . . .”

A railway company charged a certain rate per mile, every incomplete mile being reckoned a mile. The sidings of two collieries joined the main line of the railway within the twelfth mile from Troon, but one was 415 yards nearer Troon than the other. Held that in determining, in the sense of the above section, the portion of the railway used by the collieries respectively, the incomplete mile was to be considered as a whole mile in each case.

The Bellfield Colliery siding joined the down line of the railway to Troon. The Wellington Colliery siding joined the up line of the railway at a point 415 yards nearer Troon than the Bellfield siding. Wellington Colliery traffic for Troon was carried back by the railway company to cross-over points in the immediate vicinity of the Bellfield siding. Wellington traffic was, however, invariably, and Bellfield traffic usually, carried to a siding beyond Hurlford Station, in the immediate vicinity, and there marshalled for despatch to Troon. Both collieries were within the same mile from Troon. The railway company charged a certain rate per mile, and every part of a mile was accounted a whole mile.

In an action at the instance of the Bellfield Colliery proprietors against the railway company on the ground of undue preference in the rates charged for the Wellington traffic, the defenders contended that their contract was to carry the traffic of each colliery to Troon from the respective points where it reached their railway, and that, inasmuch as the pursuers' siding joined the railway 415 yards further from Troon than the Wellington siding, their traffic was not carried “over the same portion of the line of railway.” Held that the traffic of the two collieries was carried “over the same portion” of the railway.

Opinion that the traffic of both collieries must be viewed as carried to Troon from Hurlford Station, and therefore that it passed “over the same portion” of railway.

No. 92.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Yeats's
Trustees v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.

I.

BELLFIELD COLLIERY AND WELLINGTON PIT, PORTLAND COLLIERY, were situated on different sides of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway in the immediate vicinity of Hurlford Station. Bellfield Colliery possessed a siding which connected with the railway company's down line to Troon exactly at Hurlford Station. Wellington Colliery on the other side of the line was connected with the up line from Troon by a siding which was 415 yards distant from Hurlford Station, and so much nearer Troon than the siding of the Bellfield Colliery. As, however, Wellington Colliery joined the up line, traffic from that colliery for Troon had to be carried back to cross-over points a few yards on the other side of Hurlford Station, where it was marshalled. Traffic from Bellfield Colliery was sometimes carried on to Troon from the colliery siding on the down line, but it was usually carried back past Hurlford Station and made up for Troon at the same siding where the Wellington traffic was marshalled. Both collieries were within the same mile—that is to say, more than eleven miles and less than twelve miles—from Troon.

In September 1886 the trustees of the deceased Robert Yeats, who carried on the Bellfield Colliery, raised the present action in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock against the railway company for the sum of £190, 0s. 3d. (which was subsequently restricted to £178), as the amount of alleged overcharge by the defenders for the carriage of coals in violation of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 83.*

The pursuers averred;—"The coals and dross from the pursuers' pit and from the said Wellington pit are of the same description, and are conveyed and propelled by like carriages and engines, and pass only over the same portion of the defenders' line of railway—to wit, from Hurlford Station to Troon Harbour—under the same circumstances. The pursuers are therefore entitled to be charged equally with the said Wellington pit, and after the same rate per ton per mile.

"The defenders, however, have been charging the pursuers, between the 25th day of August 1884 and the 17th day of August 1885, the rate of 1s. 3d. per ton for the conveyance of coal and dross from Hurlford Station to Troon Harbour, which is 4½d. per ton more than the rate they charged the Wellington Colliery."†

---

* The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 83, enacts—"And whereas it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly either in the hands of the company or of particular parties, it shall be lawful therefore for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in the special Act contained, from time to time, to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway as they shall think fit: Provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all passengers, and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made either directly or indirectly in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway."

† The pursuers, on record and before the Sheriff-substitute, also founded on an agreement entered into in 1875, which was the foundation of the action of, and is quoted in Mackinnon v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1309, aff. June 26, 1886, 13 R. (H. L.) 89; but as they acquiesced in the

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) The defenders having charged the pursuers a higher rate than they had agreed to charge another coalmaster for the carriage of goods of the same description, conveyed and propelled by like carriages and engines, and passing only over the same portion of defenders' line of railway under the same circumstances, have violated the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 83, and are bound to repay to the pursuers the amount of the overcharge.

No. 92.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Yeats's
Trustees v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

The defenders pleaded ;—(5<sup>a</sup>) No violation of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 83, having been committed by the defenders, the action, so far as founded thereon, is untenable.

A proof was allowed. The evidence disclosed the custom and practice in marshalling of traffic from the respective pits as explained above. It also appeared that according to the rates at which the defenders charged the pursuers fractions of tons were to be considered as whole tons, and fractions of miles as whole miles.

On 29th June 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Hall) pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Finds that the pursuers' author Robert Yeats was not as an individual a party to the agreement, No. 5 of process, and that the pursuers have no title to sue under that agreement: Finds that Wellington Pit, Portland Colliery, presently carried on by William Mackinnon, C.A., as trustee for behoof of the creditors of Allan Gilmour, a party to the said agreement, and the pursuers' Bellfield Colliery, both adjoin the main line of the defenders' railway in the immediate vicinity of Hurlford Station: Finds that the junction of Bellfield Colliery siding with the said main line is at Hurlford Station: Finds that the junction of Wellington pit siding with the said main line is 415 yards further on the way to Troon, but on the up line from which, in order to be conveyed to Troon, its traffic must be transferred to the down line: Finds that the nearest point at which this can be done is the through crossing at Hurlford Station: Finds that Wellington pit and Bellfield Colliery have hitherto been treated by the defenders as equidistant from Troon, the distance in each case being charged for as twelve miles, and the rate for the carriage of coal and dross being 1s. 3d. per ton: Finds that in its transmission to Troon the traffic from both collieries has its terminus a quo at Hurlford Station, and passes over only the same portion of the defenders' line of railway: Finds that in virtue of the above-mentioned agreement, and in respect of the rates charged by the defenders to traders who are not parties to the said agreement, it has been decided * that the defenders came under an obligation to carry coal and dross from Wellington pit to Troon during the period from 25th August 1884 to 17th August 1885, at a reduction of 4½d. on the said rate of 1s. 3d. per ton: Finds that between the said dates the pursuers paid to the defenders the said rate of 1s. 3d. per ton for the carriage of 9538 tons 2 cwt. of coal and dross from Bellfield Colliery to Troon, conform to the receipts or discharged accounts, Nos. 25 to 67 of process: Finds in law (1) that the case falls under section 83 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33); (2) that in conformity therewith the pursuers are entitled to the same reduction as that to which the proprietors of Wellington pit have been found entitled on the rate paid by them to the defenders for the carriage of their coal and dross from Bellfield Colliery to Troon during the said period: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds them liable in expenses.” &c.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—Their Sheriff-substitute's judgment holding that they had no title to sue on that agreement, it is unnecessary to set it forth.

* That is to say in the case of Mackinnon, supra, note.

No. 92.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Yeats's
Trustees v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

contract with the Wellington Coal Company must be kept in view in considering whether the 83d section of the statute applied. They had contracted to take the coal from the Wellington siding to Troon. The siding was 415 yards nearer Troon than the Bellfield siding, and so the Bellfield coal was not carried "over the same portion of the line of railway." The fact that the traffic had to be drawn back to the cross-over points did not affect the question. It was merely a convenience for the defenders. Delivery was not taken at Hurlford Station, but at the Wellington siding. The Sheriff-substitute proceeded on the view that the difference in length between the two pieces of line was too small to make a substantial difference of circumstances. But it had been decided that a large difference of distance was unnecessary if the traffic was sent to the same place.<sup>1</sup> Besides transit "over the same portion" was absolutely necessary.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the pursuers;—The defenders admitted that they had to draw the traffic back from Wellington siding to Hurlford before sending it to Troon, and so implied that the Wellington traffic started from the same terminus as the Bellfield traffic. It was not reasonable construction to argue that a few yards made all the difference as to traffic being "over the same portion" of the line. Probably no two traders could reach the railway company's line at equidistant points from the place of destination. The short distance between Wellington siding and Hurlford was not charged for. In Murray's case the goods of both traders passed over the same portion of the line, but one trader was at a distance of four miles along the line from the other. The Denaby case shewed even greater disparities. For rating purposes the mile was the unit. All traders within the same mile were for rating taken in at the same point. They were therefore within the same portion of the railway, and for the purposes of the 83d section of the statute their goods were carried over the "same portion." The construction proposed by the defenders would make the statute inoperative.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In this action the pursuers founded on an agreement with the defenders. The Sheriff held that they were not entitled to sue upon it. The pursuers acquiesced in that judgment, for the argument which was addressed to us was based entirely on the 83d section of the Railway Clauses Act.

The pursuers and the Portland Colliery send coal by the defenders' railway to Troon. The pursuers complain that the defenders have charged lower rates to the Portland Colliery than they have charged to them. The defenders admit the difference of rates, but they maintain that the traffic of the pursuers and the traffic of the Portland Colliery are not carried "over the same portion of the line of railway," and therefore that they have not violated the provisions of the Act.

The coals of the pursuers are raised at the Bellfield pit, which is connected by a siding with the down line, along which the traffic to Troon is carried. The coals of the Portland Colliery are raised at the Wellington pit, which is on the other side of the railway. The point at which they are brought by a siding to the railway is about 400 yards nearer Troon than the Bellfield siding, but inasmuch as the former siding joins the up line, they must, in order to get to the down line, be drawn back to a cross-over which is a few yards further from Troon than the Bellfield siding. In point of fact the coals from the Wellington pit were invariably, and the coals from the Bellfield pit were usually, taken to a place on the further side of the Hurlford Station, where the trains were marshalled, and after this was done they were despatched from the Hurlford Station to Troon.

<sup>1</sup> Finnie v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., March 10, 1853, 15 D. 523, per Lord Fullerton, p. 531.

<sup>2</sup> Murray v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., March 29, 1883, 11 R. 205; Denaby Main Colliery Co. v. Manchester and Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 1885, L. R., 2 App. Cas. 97; Evershed v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., Feb. 1877, 2 Q. B. Div. 254, and 3 Q. B. Div. 135, aff. July 1878, 3 App. Cas. 1029.

No. 92.

Feb. 26, 1889.
 Yeats's
 Trustees v.
 Glasgow and
 So. Western
 Railway Co.

The Bellfield pit and the Wellington pit are both situated within the same mile from Troon—that is to say, they are both more than eleven miles and less than twelve miles from that place.

The defenders contend that the question arising under the 83d section must be determined by reference to the point at which the traffic actually reached their line. They maintain that their contract was to carry it from that point to Troon, and that inasmuch as the pursuers' coals reached the railway at a point some 400 yards further from Troon than the point at which the coals from the Wellington pit reached the railway, they were not carried "over the same portion of the line of railway." They admit that as matters now stand, and as they stood during the period to which the action relates, the Wellington coal could not get on the down line without being drawn back to the cross-over which I have mentioned. They further admit that in fact both sets of traffic were usually marshalled on the further side of the Hurlford Station, and despatched from that station. But they say that all this was for their own convenience only, and that in a question with the pursuers and the Portland Colliery the coals of each company are to be held as having been carried to Troon from the point at which they respectively reached the railway.

If this argument be sound there is great difficulty in seeing how any coal company could benefit by the provision of the Act. It is hardly conceivable that any two pits should be so situated as that the coals raised therefrom should reach the railway at points precisely equidistant from the place of destination.
 The argument implies that in order to be within the statute the traffic must be carried over exactly the same portion of the railway, and the defenders did not hesitate to contend that if the traffic were despatched from different parts of the same station to the same destination the statute would not apply. I cannot adopt an argument which would deprive the statute of all its power, and which is supported neither by reason nor authority.

The pursuers urged that the traffic in question was to be regarded as having been carried between Hurlford Station and Troon, and therefore that it was carried over the same portion of the railway. It is true that it was not received at Hurlford Station. As I have said, the Wellington pit coal was invariably despatched from that station, and though in some cases the Bellfield coal was carried on to Troon from the siding at which it reached the railway, it was usual so to marshal it that it was despatched from Hurlford Station. Consequently if the Wellington coal be considered as despatched from Hurlford it passed over the same distance as the pursuers' coal, or in some cases over a longer distance.
 This is a reasonable view, for it cannot be doubted that the two classes of coal were, in the fair sense of the phrase, traffic between Hurlford and Troon.

There is, however, another argument which was advanced by the pursuers, which in my opinion furnishes a safer ground of judgment. The coal from each pit reached the railway within the same mile from Troon, and apart from any

No. 92.

Feb. 26, 1889.
Yeats's
Trustees v.
Glasgow and
So.-Western
Railway Co.

favour shewn to the one over the other the charge for carriage would be the same. For the defenders charge a certain rate per mile, and every additional part of a mile counts as a mile. The 83d section of the Railway Clauses Act is intended to provide for equality of charge. It enacts that all tolls shall be charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate for all goods of the same description passing over the same portion of the line. As every part of a mile may be charged for as a mile, I think that I may hold that every mile and every part of it is, within the meaning of the section, one and the same portion of the railway whether the traffic passes over a larger or a smaller part of it. In short, each mile is to be considered as a unit in determining the portion of the railway over which the traffic passes just as it is considered as a unit in fixing the charges which the railway company are entitled to make. Such a construction, which I think does no violence to the language of the statute, is consistent with its purpose, and preserves its efficiency. I prefer it to that maintained by the defenders, which in my opinion would make the statute a dead letter in regard to traffic of the kind with which we are here concerned. In this view both classes of coal were carried over the same portion of the railway, and therefore the complaint of the pursuers is well founded.

LORD YOUNG, LORD LEE, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings of the Sheriff-substitute contained in his interlocutor of 29th June 1887, which are held as herein repeated: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the said interlocutor, except in so far as the sum concluded for in the petition and decerned for is erroneously stated to be £190, 0s. 3d. instead of £178, 16s. 9d., and to that extent and effect alter the said interlocutor: Of new repel the defences, and ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the said sum of £178, 16s. 9d., with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent per annum, from the 1st day of September 1885 till paid: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the inferior Courts and in this Court."

GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 93.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Macdonald v.
Campbell.

LORD MACDONALD, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—G. R. Gillespie.

SAMUEL CAMPBELL, Defender (Appellant).—R. V. Campbell—Ure.

Lease—Use of subjects—Restriction against sale of spirits—Consent of landlord—Acquiescence.—A building lease granted in 1876 for ninety-nine years contained a provision that the tenant "shall not sell or retail spirits upon the premises without the express consent of the proprietor or his factor for the time being," the proprietor or his factor "being the sole judge of all such matters." In 1876 the landlord consented to an application by the tenant for a grocer's licence which was granted for that year, and renewed without objection for seven years afterwards. The alterations made by the tenant to adapt his premises for the sale of spirits were very slight. In 1884 the landlord objected to the renewal of the licence, and subsequently he brought an interdict against the continued sale of spirits by the tenant. In answer, the defender pleaded (1) that the pursuer had once for all discharged the prohibition in the lease; and (2) that he was barred by acquiescence for seven years from insisting in the action.

Held, after a proof, (1) that the landlord had neither expressly nor by acquiescence discharged the conditions in the lease, and (2) that he was entitled to recall his consent if the defender's actings justified his doing so, and that the defender's conduct of his business had been shewn to be such as to entitle the pursuer to interdict. No. 93.

By building lease dated 2d October 1875 and 2d March 1876, Lord Macdonald let to Samuel Campbell for ninety-nine years a certain piece of ground at Broadford, Skye, amounting to 2436 square yards, under the following among other conditions:—"And it is hereby expressly provided and declared that it shall not be lawful to nor in the power of the said Samuel Campbell or his foresaids to have or keep any matter or thing upon the said piece of ground which may prove injurious to the amenity of the locality, or may be deemed a nuisance, or create annoyance or disturbance to the neighbouring tenants or proprietors, and particularly that they shall not sell or retail spirits upon the premises without the express consent of the proprietor or his factor for the time being, the said Lord Macdonald, or the heirs of entail in possession of the said lands and estate, or the factor for the time, being the sole judge of all such matters."

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Macdonald v. Campbell.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Inverness-shire.
M.

On 25th October 1876 Mr Macdonald of Tormore, who was factor for Lord Macdonald from 1872 to 1879, wrote the following letter to the Justices, who attended at the Licensing Court held at Portree:—"Dear Sir,—As it is likely you will be one of the acting J.P.'s the day the Court is held at Portree for considering the applications for licences, I will be obliged if you will support the application of Mr Samuel Campbell, merchant, Broadford, for a grocer's licence to sell malt liquors, the same being approved of by the proprietor.—Yours truly, D. MACDONALD." On 31st October following Campbell obtained a grocer's licence from the Justices, which was renewed at the Licensing Court each year thereafter without objection until 1884. In April of that year a licence was refused, and on 21st May following Messrs John Clerk Brodie & Sons, W.S., Lord Macdonald's agents, wrote to Mr Campbell intimating the withdrawal of any permission which he had given to sell spirits.* Campbell renewed his application at the two next half-yearly Licensing Courts, but it was refused on both occasions.

Campbell having continued the sale of spirits under a "wholesale licence," obtained direct from the Excise without a certificate from the Justice of Peace Court, Lord Macdonald, in September 1885, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Inverness-shire to have him interdicted from selling or retailing spirits on his premises.

He averred that the refusal by the Justices to renew the licence in 1884 was due to complaints which had been made against its continuance, and that in April 1885 he had further communicated to the Justice of Peace Clerk at Portree his objection to the granting of the licence on the ground that it was unnecessary, and would be injurious to the public interest in the district.

---

* That letter was:—" . . . We understand that, by permission of Lord Macdonald's former factor, you have for some time been selling and retailing spirits within the premises erected by you on the ground held from his Lordship under the above-mentioned lease. Lord Macdonald has recently had the matter under consideration, and he is of opinion, on public grounds, that a continuance of the permission granted to you to sell and retail spirits is unnecessary for the requirements of the district, besides being hurtful to the inhabitants, most of whom are his Lordship's tenants. We are therefore instructed to intimate to you that any permission granted to you under your lease to sell and retail spirits is now withdrawn, and we have to request that you will write us acknowledging receipt of this letter, and undertaking to discontinue the traffic in spirits within the premises erected on the ground leased to you by Lord Macdonald within a month from this date.—Your obedt. servts. JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS."

No. 93.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Macdonald v.
Campbell.

The defender, in answer, inter alia, averred that in consequence of his getting the pursuer's consent to his getting a licence, he had expended a large sum in new buildings and otherwise.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) It being provided by the defender's lease that he shall not sell or retail spirits upon the premises let without the express consent of the pursuer, and the defender not having such consent, the defender is not entitled to sell or retail spirits on the said premises.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer is barred by mora and acquiescence from insisting in the present action. (4) The prohibition founded on by the pursuer being in the circumstances vexatious, and contrary to public policy, is not enforceable. (5) The prohibition founded on having been discharged by the pursuer's factor, and rei interventus having followed on the said discharge, the pursuer is not now entitled to revive and enforce the prohibition, and the interim interdict already granted ought to be recalled, and the action dismissed, with expenses.

After proof,* the Sheriff-substitute (Blair), on 10th April 1888, pronounced this interlocutor (after certain findings in fact):—"Finds in point of law that the pursuer, by assent and acquiescence in the defender's use of the premises in question for the sale of exciseable liquors from the 31st October 1876 to 15th April 1884, must be held to have discharged the prohibition founded on, and to have lost the right to enforce it: Therefore to that extent and effect sustains the third and fifth pleas in law for the defender, . . . and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the petition, and decerns."

On appeal the Sheriff (Ivory), on 19th May 1888, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and found:—" (3) That the defender has failed to prove that the pursuer has discharged the said prohibition, or that he has, by acquiescence or otherwise, lost his right to enforce it; (4) that at the date when the present process of interdict was raised, and for some time previously, the defender was selling spirits upon the said premises, which were erected on the said piece of ground, not only without the consent of the proprietor or his factor, but in opposition to their frequent remonstrances: Finds in law that the defender is not entitled to sell or retail spirits on the said premises without the express consent of the pursuer or his factor, and that the pursuer is entitled to interdict as craved: Therefore repels the defences, grants interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition, and decerns."

---

* It appeared from the proof that Campbell, the defender, carried on a large business in Broadford as a grocer and meal merchant and general dealer, and that he had extended his premises since 1876, but that any expenditure he had incurred had not been on account of his whisky business, except to the extent of about £30 or £40 for a new shed or lean-to in which he stored the whisky: that there was a hotel in the immediate neighbourhood of the shop, also belonging to the pursuer, the tenant of which had appeared and objected at the Licensing Court in 1884 that the defender did not require a licence, and that there were complaints against it in the neighbourhood. The fiscal had also complained on that occasion of irregularities about the premises, and the Rev. Donald Mackinnon, D.D., of Strath, and Lauchlan Nicholson, shopkeeper to the defender, deposed to seeing people drinking upon the premises. Petitions had also been presented both in 1884 and 1886 by residents in the parish of Strath against the licence being granted, the first signed by 341 and the second by 664 persons.

On the other hand a petition, signed by 901 persons, had been presented in favour of the licence, and it was also pointed out for the defence that the Clerk to the Justices, Mr Alexander Macdonald, had also been Lord Macdonald's factor from 1878 to 1887.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.<sup>1</sup>

No. 93.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question before us relates, firstly, to the construction of a clause in the lease between the pursuer and defender, and secondly, to the construction and effect of the consent given by the landlord to dispense with the conditions in that clause.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Macdonald v. Campbell.

As regards the clause in the lease, the prohibition is so far distinctly enough expressed that the tenant "shall not sell or retail spirits upon the premises without the express consent of the proprietor or his factor for the time being, the said Lord Macdonald, or the heirs of entail in possession of the said lands and estate, or the factor for the time, being the sole judge of all such matters." There is no doubt that without a consent such as is here specified it would not be lawful for the tenant to sell spirits on the premises under any form of licence. But at the same time it was not unlawful under the lease, nor against its spirit and purpose, that whisky and other malt liquors should be sold if the requisite consent were given. In this case there was a verbal consent given by Lord Macdonald's factor, but there is not much doubt about the precise amount and character of the consent. The factor says that in the exercise of the powers vested in him he did consent that the tenant should have a grocer's licence, and in fulfilment of that undertaking he wrote what may be called a circular letter to the Justices, asking them to support the tenant's application. The licence was granted in 1876, and was renewed for six or seven years without any objection being taken by the landlord, and without the consent which he had given being withdrawn. Accordingly there was on the landlord's part an implied consent—and a very distinctly implied consent—that the tenant should sell spirits as a licensed grocer. But the landlord has now changed his mind, and the question is whether he may now put a stop to their sale, or whether the consent which he gave is irrevocable to this extent, that so long as the defender remains tenant he shall be entitled to have a grocer's licence from year to year.

There is no doubt that cases might arise out of such clauses as that with which we are here dealing which would give a considerable amount of permanency to such an arrangement as is implied in the giving of the landlord's consent. If the landlord were to give such consent on the footing that the tenant should start a public-house, and the tenant were to erect such a house and to invest capital in it, such circumstances would give a more permanent character to the arrangement, and would imply a different kind of consent from what was implied in the present case. Here very little alteration upon the premises was required in order to enable the tenant to engraft upon the premises sufficient additional accommodation for the carrying on of the new business. He erected a cellar in which he might store sugar and whisky—and this was all that was necessary, and all the change on the building that was brought about in consequence of the licence.

The question is how far is the landlord's consent revocable, and upon what <sup>1</sup> Cases cited.—Earl of Zetland v. Hislop, March 18, 1881, 8 R. 675, revd. June 12, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 40, Lord Watson, p. 52; Skene v. Maberley, March 2, 1822, 1 S. 369; Young, Ross, & Co. v. Ramsay, March 11, 1824, 2 S. 793, affd. 1 W. & S. 560; Cairncross & Others v. Meek, May 28, 1858, 20 D. 995, 30 Scot. Jur. 611, affd. Aug. 9, 1860, 3 Macq. 827; Cowan, &c., v. Lord Kinnaid, Dec. 15, 1865, 4 Macph. 236; Ewing v. Campbell, Nov. 23, 1877, 5 R. 230.

No. 93.

Feb. 27, 1889.
 Lord Macdonald v.
 Campbell.

conditions may it be revoked. I need hardly say that during the year for which the tenant obtained the licence with the landlord's consent, it would have been out of the question for the landlord to withdraw it. But does the consent bind the landlord to more than this, that for the year for which it was granted it shall run its ordinary course? I entertain a very strong impression that the landlord would not be entitled capriciously, or through enmity or ill-will or malice, to put an end to the consent for the purpose of injuring his tenant. That would be such an exercise of the landlord's power as the Court would not readily sustain. But in the present case, looking to the terms of the clause in the lease, I think there was an intention to reserve to the landlord a power to recall the consent if and when a change of circumstances should justify such a recall. The landlord or his factor was to be "the sole judge," which means that he was to be the sole judge not only whether the consent should be granted, but also whether it should be continued or recalled. Reading the clause in that sense, and the consent which was given in a corresponding sense, the landlord would, I think, be justified in withdrawing his consent if circumstances should occur to make an alteration upon the conditions of the case.

It is somewhat remarkable that no such change of circumstances is set forth upon record. But upon fuller consideration I have rather come to think that the question is whether, in point of fact, the landlord intimated to the tenant that circumstances had occurred which justified the withdrawal of the consent. I think communications were made to the defender sufficient to make him aware that such circumstances had occurred, and that there was in point of fact such a state of matters as entitled the landlord to put an end to the sale of spirits on the premises. The evidence of Dr Mackinnon and of Nicholson, the defender's shopman, leaves very little doubt that, with or without the knowledge of the defender, the leave to sell drink on the premises had been abused. I do not believe that the defender encouraged this. I think he was acting in good faith throughout, but that with all his endeavours he has not succeeded in making a proper use of his licence. That being so, the question is whether it was not the landlord's duty towards the neighbourhood to put an end to the consent which he had given to the licence. I think it was the landlord's duty in the circumstances which have occurred, and that there was nothing to prevent his withdrawing that consent upon reasonable cause shewn. I am therefore for affirming the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD ADAM.—I think the decision of this case turns upon the construction of the clause which has been founded upon in the lease. It appears to me that the object and intention of that clause was that Lord Macdonald should retain the control of the sale of spirits by his tenant. I agree with the Dean of Faculty in the construction which he has put upon this clause, that the selling of spirits is a continuous act, and that the landlord's consent fell to be obtained from time to time if the sale was to be continued.

The consent which the landlord gave in 1876 was not an express consent to sell or retail spirits. It was rather a consent to an application by the tenant to the Justices for a grocer's licence, and was therefore confined to a sale in that way and manner. The consent was therefore given with reference to what I think was the proper construction of the clause in the lease, and the tenant ought to have known that that consent might be recalled at any time, consistent with the consent given. For I think neither party understood nor intended that the condition in the lease should be to any extent discharged by the consent which was given. No. 93.

The next question is one which has been suggested by your Lordship, viz., whether the consent once given can be capriciously recalled. It is not necessary to offer an opinion upon that point in this case, but for my part I think the landlord is under the lease the sole judge of the matter. If the tenant were to allege that the landlord had recalled his consent in mala fide, it might be different, but otherwise I do not think the landlord is bound to assign any reason for withdrawing it. I think he had reasons in this case, looking to the evidence, and it does not matter whether what took place was done with the knowledge of the tenant or not. The fact that there was something done which Lord Macdonald had reason to disapprove of is enough to justify him in withdrawing his consent.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Macdonald v. Campbell.

I further think there is no question in the case of acquiescence by the landlord in anything done contrary to the obligation in the lease. What was done was done by consent of the landlord under the lease. I concur in thinking that if there were things done by the tenant which were inconsistent with the view that consent was given under the lease, that would have raised a different question, such as was dealt with in Lord Zetland's case, viz., whether something was done by the tenant and acquiesced in by the landlord against the terms of the lease. All the change which was made by the tenant upon his premises did not come to much, and was referable to the consent given under the lease, and not to any implied acquiescence in anything adverse to the lease.

LORD LEE.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship. I think that according to the true meaning of the clause in the lease, consent once given to a particular tenant could not be withdrawn arbitrarily and without cause. But the evidence shews no consent excepting to the extent of allowing the tenant to apply for and obtain a grocer's licence, and no acquiescence excepting in the sale of spirits under such a licence. Such consent could not be withdrawn during the year. But when the licence was refused by the Justices on 15th April 1884, I think that this created a change of circumstances which entitled the landlord to reconsider the matter, and that enough has been proved to support his withdrawal of consent.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT repeated the findings in the Sheriff's interlocutor, refused the appeal, and adhered to the interlocutor appealed against.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—WYLIE & ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON AND ANOTHER (Lord Glasgow's Trustees), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.
JOHN CLARK, Defender (Respondent).—Balfour—Ure.

No. 94.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees v. Clark.

JOHN CLARK, Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—Ure.
GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON AND ANOTHER (Lord Glasgow's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Sale—Assignment of rents—Legal and conventional terms—Seller and Purchaser.—The seller of certain heritage, consisting of two farms, assigned to the purchaser the rents "due and payable from and after the term of entry," which was Martinmas 1886. In a question as to the right to the farm rents payable

No. 94. at Whitsunday 1887 for the crop and year 1886, held (reversing judgment of Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the proportion applicable to the possession prior to Martinmas 1886 belonged to the seller, and that applicable to the possession subsequent thereto to the purchaser.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees
v. Clark.

Sale—Assignment of rents—Shooting rents.—Where certain heritable subjects were sold during the subsistence of a shooting lease, held (reversing judgment of Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the shooting tenant's rent fell to be apportioned between the seller and purchaser according as the right of shooting was exercised before or after the purchaser's term of entry to the subjects.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
C.

ON 24th August 1886 Messrs George A. Jamieson and Frederick Pitman, Lord Glasgow's trustees, exposed for sale by public roup the lands of Thirdpart and others belonging to his Lordship, in terms of articles and conditions of roup, which provided, inter alia:—"Tertio, The entry of the purchaser to the said lands and others shall be at the term of Martinmas 1886, and the purchaser shall have right to the rents to become due for the possession from and after that term, the expositors having right to the rents due for the possession prior to that term, notwithstanding the dates at which the same may be conventionally payable."

The subjects, which consisted of two farms which were let under leases at rents of £290 and £160 per annum respectively, were bought by Mr John Clark for £12,500. The term of entry was Martinmas 1886, and the clause of assignment of rents in the disposition to Mr Clark was as follows:—"And we, as trustees foresaid, with consent foresaid, assign the rents, feu-duties, and casualties of superiority due and payable from and after the said term of entry."

The rents were payable at Whitsunday and Martinmas. At Whitsunday 1887 the rents for the half year ending at Martinmas 1886, viz., for the one farm, £122, 10s., and for the other, £72, 10s., less abatements allowed by Lord Glasgow, were paid by the tenants to Mr Clark.

Lord Glasgow's trustees now sued Mr Clark for the £195, with interest from Whitsunday 1887, averring that the defender had no right to the rents, which were for the possession of the farms prior to his term of entry.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The rents of the said farms due and paid at Whitsunday 1887 being for possession of the said farms prior to the date of the defender's entry, he has no right thereto.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The rents in question having become due and payable subsequent to the term of the defender's entry, he was entitled to uplift the same. (2) In respect that by the terms of the conveyance in his favour the said rents belonged to the defender, he is entitled to absolvitor with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 4th July 1888, assoilzied the defender.*

---

* "OPINION.—The defender bought the lands of Thirdpart from the pursuers, and he is now infeft therein. By the disposition in favour of the defender the term of entry was declared to be Martinmas 1886, and the clause assigning the rents was expressed thus:—"And we, as trustees foresaid, . . . assign the rents, feu-duties, and casualties of superiority due and payable from and after the said term of entry."

"The rents uplifted by the defender, which the pursuers seek by this action to recover from him, were due and payable after Martinmas 1886, and therefore, prima facie, were assigned to the defender by the conveyance in his favour. But the pursuers maintain that the said rents nevertheless belong to them, because, by the articles of roup under which the defender purchased, it was stipulated that the purchaser should have right to the rents to become due for the possession from and after the term of entry; and the rents in question,

No. 94.

In a second action between the same parties Mr Clark claimed payment from the trustees of a sum of £100, being the rent of the shootings of the above subjects, which were let from 1st August 1886 to 31st March 1887. The rent had been paid to the defenders on 21st February 1887. Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees
v. Clark.

The defenders stated in answer ;—"The said rent falls to be apportioned between the pursuer and the defenders, the latter being entitled to the proportion effeiring to the period from 1st August to 11th November 1886, and the former being entitled to the remainder of the said rent. The defenders have all along intimated their willingness to settle with the pursuer on these terms, but he has refused to do so, and claims the whole rent." They pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer is only entitled to the portion of the said rents due for the possession of the said lands from and after the term of Martinmas 1886. (2) In terms of the contract between the parties and the provisions of the Apportionment Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 35), the said rents fall to be apportioned between the pursuer and the defenders, and the latter are entitled to the proportion thereof effeiring to the period from 1st August to 11th November 1886.

It was stated that the shooting was a mixed one, partly moorland and partly low country.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 4th July 1888, decerned against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

Lord Glasgow's trustees reclaimed in both actions.

Argued for Lord Glasgow's trustees ;—In the first case.—The case turned upon the construction of the words "due and payable from and after the said term of entry," contained in the disposition. The rents here in question were no doubt conventionally payable after the term of entry, but they were due for a possession which was prior thereto. They therefore belonged to the seller. This interpretation was fortified by the terms of the articles of roup, and if the form provided in the Statute of 1868 (Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 8, had been used, it would have had the same meaning. The use of that form was optional, and the fact that it had not been used was not an argument in favour of the view although due and payable after Martinmas 1886, were for the possession prior to that date.

"If the rights of parties were to be held as fixed by the articles of roup, I should find for the pursuers. But I am of opinion that the rights of parties are to be determined by the terms of the disposition granted by the pursuers to the defender, that being the ultimate expression of their contract, which cannot be modified or altered by previous writings, negotiations, or conditions of sale.

"Further, by the Statute 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101, section 8, it is provided that an assignation of rents, in the form there given, shall, 'unless specially qualified, be held to import an assignation to the rents to become due for the possession following the term of entry.' The pursuers, therefore, by using the statutory form, 'we assign the rents,' would have limited the defender's right to that which was expressed in the articles of roup. Instead of doing so, however, the pursuers 'specially qualified' the assignation of rents by adding 'due and payable from and after the said term of entry.' I must suppose that this qualification was intended to have some meaning and effect, otherwise it would not have been expressed ; and the only meaning I can give to the qualification is its natural and ordinary meaning as contended for by the defender."

* "OPINION.—The rents in question, which were for shootings over a portion of the lands of Thirdpart, were due and payable at 31st March 1887. I think they belonged to the pursuer, being assigned to him by the conveyance granted in his favour by the defenders. I refer to the opinion expressed by me to-day in deciding the case Lord Glasgow's Trustees v. Clark.

"The Apportionment Act referred to by the defenders has no bearing upon this case, which is one of contract."

No. 94.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees
v. Clark.

that a construction different from what the words of the form bore was to be put upon the language of the deed. There was a series of authorities in support of the view contended for.<sup>1</sup>

In the second case.—There was no legal term at which shooting rents were payable, particularly in a case like this of a mixed shooting. The right to the rent depended upon the occupation solely, and not upon the enjoyment of the fruits, as in an agricultural lease. The Apportionment Act of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 35) applied to a case of this kind.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for Mr Clark ;—In the first case.—There must have been some good reason for the use of the terms in the disposition, and the Lord Ordinary had taken the correct view. Otherwise the statutory words, "we assign the rents" would have been employed. The contrast between the terms of the disposition and of the articles of roup supported this contention.

In the second case.—The shooting rent was not due till 31st March 1887, and so clearly fell to Mr Clark under the terms of the disposition.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am sorry that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in this case. The law, or I should rather say the law and practice of Scotland, regulating the rights of seller and purchaser in the rents of the subjects sold is quite uniform, and supposing there is no assignation of the rents and no special provision upon the subject of what portion of the rents is to belong to the seller and what to the purchaser, the purchaser becomes entitled to the rents of the estate for the possession that follows his term of entry, and the rents for the possession prior to that term belong to the seller.

No doubt these rules may be varied by paction, and it is contended that they are altered here by the terms of the assignation of rents contained in the disposition. But it appears to me that the construction of that clause depends upon the use of terms which have a precise and definite meaning assigned to them by a series of authorities. There is no need to go back to the provisions of the articles of roup, which are to the effect that "the entry of the purchaser to the said lands and others shall be at the term of Martinmas 1886, and the purchaser shall have right to the rents to become due for the possession from and after that term," i.e., the term of entry. That provision simply gives expression to what is the common law upon the subject. It is said that the clause of assignation of rents in the disposition is not only different in words, but that it entirely abrogates the common law rights of the parties, and gives them a special meaning in this case. The words are, "We . . . assign the rents, feu-duties, and casualties of superiority due and payable from and after the said term of entry." I conceive that these words are identical in meaning with the words in the articles of roup, and accordingly I do not need to say whether it is competent to refer to the articles or not. The words "rents due" mean rents becoming due according to the legal terms.

The case of Penman & Campbell (6 S. 940) is so applicable to the facts of the present case that I think it is impossible to distinguish it. It was followed by a series of cases to the effect that rents become due according to the legal terms although they may be only payable according to the conventional terms. I think the result here plainly is that the rents for the possession prior to the term of entry belong to the seller, and those for the possession subsequent thereto to the purchaser.

<sup>1</sup> Penman & Campbell v. Ker, June 10, 1828, 6 S. 940 ; Stevenson v. Maccreiff, Feb. 12, 1845, 7 D. 418, 17 Scot. Jur. 205 ; Sinclair v. Sinclair, Dec. 1847, 10 D. 190, 20 Scot. Jur. 49 ; Shand's Trustees v. Mackie, Feb. 15, 1850, D. 739 ; Lady Murray's Trustees v. Jardine, May 31, 1865, 3 Macph. 845, Scot. Jur. 433.

<sup>2</sup> Maxwell's Trustees v. Scott, Nov. 5, 1873, 1 R. 122.

No. 94.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees
v. Clark.

It is said that an intention to alter the ordinary rule and to introduce a novelty is to be gathered from the fact that the short form of assignation of rents clause given in the Act of 1868 has not been adopted in the disposition. I do not quite follow that argument. Conveyancers are not bound to follow the language of the statute. They are only bound to use words to express their meaning, and it cannot matter that they have thrown aside the statutory forms.

As regards the other case, it depends upon a different principle. The shooting rent was payable under the agreement for a possession which lasted from the 1st August 1886 to 31st March 1887. The right conferred by the agreement upon the so-called lessees is a right to enter upon and use the subjects named for the purpose of sport. There is no annual profit from the subjects derived from that use in any proper sense of the term, as is the case in an agricultural lease. The return from shootings cannot be regarded in the light of a crop, nor can it on the other hand be assimilated to the profits of a mining lease. It is simply the exercise of a personal franchise for a definite period. It is a possession which is to be measured by time only. That being so, it appears to me that when the rents are assigned what is meant is that the purchaser shall have right to the rent in so far as it is derived from the possession subsequent to the term of entry, and the seller in so far as effairs to the period antecedent to the term of entry. In this case the game lessees had possession from 1st August 1886 to 31st March 1887. Up to Martinmas 1886 the shooting rent is due to the seller of the estate, after that date the shooting tenants held of the purchaser, and the rent for that period falls to be paid to him. That is the solution of the whole question, and on these grounds I differ from the Lord Ordinary. I think the rent falls to be divided accordingly to the period of possession which has been enjoyed under the seller and purchaser respectively.

LORD ADAM.—In regard to the first of these two cases, the only thing which we have to consider is the assignation of rents clause. I do not propose to look at the terms of the articles of roup, or of the Act of 1868. I think we ought not to look at the articles of roup, for the plain reason that if their terms were different from the terms of the clause in the disposition, it must be presumed that the clause in the disposition was meant to be different, and if they were the same, there is no need to look at them. I agree with your Lordship that the words, "the rents due and payable from and after the said term of entry," have in the law of Scotland a fixed and definite meaning. They are the rents due for the possession, and they are payable for the possession had according as it is before or after the term of entry of the purchaser. The rents claimed here are rents due for the possession prior to the purchaser's entry.

In the second case, I also concur with your Lordship. A shooting lease is not to be likened to the lease of an agricultural subject. In the case of shootings, the crop so to speak is reaped from day to day, and in the case of such a subject the rents fall to be apportioned according to the time of the possession.

LORD LEE concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

In the first action the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's inter-

No. 94.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Lord Glasgow's Trustees
v. Clark.

locutor, repelled the defences, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

In the second action the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £57, 12s. 3d. with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from 21st February 1887 till payment: Quoad ultra assolvie the defenders, and decern."

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 95.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

Mrs RACHEL ISABELLA LOCKHART OR MENZIES OR BEGG, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Gloag—G. W. Burnet.

CHARLES BEGG, Defender (Respondent).—Balfour—Jameson.

Husband and Wife—Divorce for adultery—Reduction—Perjury—Subornation of perjury—Relevancy.—A wife against whom decree of divorce on the ground of adultery had been pronounced raised an action of reduction of the decree on the ground that the material evidence against her was perjured, and that it had been obtained by subornation of perjury on the part of a detective employed by her husband for that purpose. The Court allowed a proof before answer of the allegations of subornation of perjury, and thereafter, the pursuer having failed to establish these, held that the averments of perjury were irrelevant, and dismissed the action.

Observations (per Lord Young) on subornation of perjury as a ground for reducing a decree of divorce.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
I.

(SEE Begg v. Begg, Feb. 25, 1887, 14 R. 497.)

In 1886, Charles Begg, bachelor of medicine, residing at Hankow in China, brought an action of divorce for adultery against his wife Mrs Rachel Isabella Lockhart or Menzies or Begg.

On 10th November 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced decree of divorce, and on a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court, their Lordships, on 25th February 1887, affirmed his interlocutor.

On 15th December 1887, the defender raised an action for reduction of the decree on the following grounds, stated in article 15 of her condescendence;—"The pursuer did not commit adultery, and is not guilty of any of the charges made against her in the said action; she was not at that time able to contradict the said witnesses, or to prove that their evidence was false. She has since learned, and now avers and offers to prove, that the evidence of the said witnesses [mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's note] in all essential particulars, and so far as material to the said charge, and forming a ground of judgment against the pursuer, is entirely false, and was emitted by the said witnesses, wilfully and corruptly, in the knowledge that it was false, on the suggestion or at the instigation of a private detective named Alexander Macdonald, who was employed by the defender to concoct and procure evidence against the pursuer."

The substance of the averments on which she relied appear infra in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), who on 30th June 1888 found the pursuer's averments irrelevant, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The object of the present action is to reduce a decree in fact pronounced in the Court of Session, on the ground that the witnesses were perjured, and were suborned.

"To aver that the witnesses in a cause were perjured is not sufficient in an action of reduction. In almost every case that is tried there is conflicting evidence. Much of it is undoubtedly false, and it is for the Judge or the jury to

The pursuer reclaimed.

The cause was continued to allow her to amend her averments of subornation of perjury with the view of making them more specific.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

find out on which side the truth lies. Therefore, an allegation that the successful party obtained a verdict or decree in consequence of perjured evidence is irrelevant as a ground of reduction. But the pursuer goes further than an allegation of perjury, and states that the evidence given against her was suborned by a person acting on the defender's behalf, and she maintains that her averments on this head ought to be allowed to be proved. There can be no doubt that subornation of perjury is a ground of reduction, even of a decree in foro of the Court of Session. In the case of Lockyer v. Ferryman (28th June 1876, 3 Ret. 896) the Lord Justice-Clerk stated the law as follows:—‘I entertain no doubt that an allegation, relevantly made, that a decree was obtained by the successful party having induced or bribed the witnesses to depone falsely, is, like any other fraud, sufficient to rescind or subvert a decree so obtained. If a man obtains a decree by bribing the Judge, or by personating the creditor in a debt, the judgment so obtained must yield to a proof of the facts.’ And in the case of Forster v. Grigor or Forster (21st January 1871, 9 Macph. 448) Lord Cowan expressed himself as follows:—‘There is an essential distinction between an allegation of subornation of perjury and one merely of perjury. If subornation of perjury by the party successful in the action were here alleged, the conduct of the party would be fraudulent; and inasmuch as a party cannot benefit by his own fault or fraud, that would form a relevant ground of reduction of a decree alleged to have been obtained by such means.’ In both of these cases the allegations upon which the decrees were sought to be set aside were found to be irrelevant or insufficient; and the question now comes to be, whether there is to be found in the present record any relevant statement, such as is necessary to support a charge of the commission of a crime.—(1 Hume, 381.)

“The pursuer's allegations consist of an attack upon the credibility of five witnesses who were examined against her. In the first place, she avers that Christina Ramsay Fairbairn gave false evidence when she said that she had seen the pursuer kiss the man with whom she is said to have committed adultery, and that she had seen other familiarities between the parties; and it is averred that such evidence ‘formed a material part of the evidence adduced by her’ (Christina Fairbairn) ‘in said action.’ The advising by the Judges in the Inner-House has not been reported, and the Lord Ordinary has no means of knowing what view they took of this girl's evidence; but, in so far as regards his own opinion, it was so little material that he discarded it altogether, not because he did not think the girl a credible witness, but because it was a point in the case which was capable of corroboration, and was not corroborated, and also because the witness and the pursuer parted upon unfriendly terms. The pursuer next attacks the witness, Elizabeth Fairbairn, and avers that she spoke falsely when she said that she had been a witness of familiarities between the pursuer and the man. The truth or falsehood of her evidence was a matter for the Court to judge of; and the pursuer, knowing this, makes the averment that the two girls gave this false evidence ‘on the suggestion or at the instigation of a private detective named Alexander Macdonald, who was employed by the defender to concoct and procure evidence against the pursuer’; and it is said that he enforced these suggestions by ‘various threats against them, alleging that he would “jail” them if they did not say that the particulars he mentioned were true, and urged them, at all events, to say that they heard those particulars stated.’ Now, the precise meaning of this threat is not very obvious, and, if the threat was issued, it seems to have been very senseless. How persons could have been induced to swear falsely by a threat to ‘jail’ them (meaning, it is supposed, to put them in prison) if they did not swear falsely, is really very difficult to comprehend, when an appeal to their parents, the neighbours, and the police was quite open. There is here a want, as there was in the case of Lockyer v. Ferryman and in the case of Forster v. Grigor or Forster, of any specification of the suggestions which the private

No. 95. The pursuer lodged amendments, of which it is only necessary to say that she stated the particulars in which she alleged the evidence to be false and perjured, and averred that in each particular it was procured by subornation of perjury on the part of the defender or of his agent Alexander Macdonald, a private detective, acting on his instruction, and who, she averred, was employed by the defender to get up the case against her.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

Argued for the pursuer;—By her amended averments she had gone further than merely making allegations that the evidence of certain witnesses was false. She had alleged that Macdonald, as agent for the pursuer in the original action, had gone to the two Fairbairns, and two other witnesses, and obtained false evidence from them by subornation of perjury. There was no decision in the law of Scotland on the question whether allegations of perjury alone were a relevant ground of reduction of a decree. The dicta, however, in the cases of Forster<sup>1</sup> and Lockyer<sup>2</sup> shewed that a distinction was recognised between such a case, and a case like the present, where there were specific allegations made of subornation of perjury amounting to fraud on the part of the successful party in the action. These averments at all events fell to be admitted to probation.

Argued for the defender;—There were no relevant averments to remit to probation. The evidence of the witness Christina Fairbairn was not material, the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House having both disregarded it, and besides, at the previous trial, an unsuccessful attempt had been made to shew that her evidence was false. As regarded Elizabeth Fairbairn there was sufficient evidence to warrant the decree apart from her evidence. The test of reducing a decree was the materiality of the evidence said to be false. A new trial, especially in consistorial causes, was not to be granted where the alleged culpability might have been discovered by ordinary diligence before the trial.<sup>3</sup>

LORD YOUNG.—I was not one of the Judges who heard the original action of divorce, and I am therefore not at all intimate with the facts of it. But I have regarded this action of reduction of the decree obtained in that action as raising questions of the very highest importance, and as involving questions of very great difficulty.

The decree of divorce was pronounced in the Outer-House in 1886, and in the Inner-House in February 1887, and this action of reduction was brought in the end of 1887, substantially—and in so far as I mean to notice it at all—on the ground that material evidence on which the decree proceeded was false and perjured, and that some of it, at all events, was not only false and perjured, but was procured by the pursuer's agent by the commission of the crime of subornation of perjury.

detective made, or the time or place when he made them; and, without such specification, the averments are irrelevant. . . .

"Lastly, in regard to this matter of subornation, the pursuer charges Frederick Reid and his wife, Mrs Reid, as giving false evidence, which is just a reiteration of what was formerly maintained by her after her proof was led, and then comes this general averment,—'The pursuer further believes and avers that the said detective also visited these witnesses, and, profiting by their animosity to the pursuer, induced them to give the said evidence against her.'"

<sup>1</sup> Forster v. Grigor or Forster, Jan. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 445, per Lord Cowan, 448.

<sup>2</sup> Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., June 28, 1876, 3 R. 882, per Lord Justice-Clerk, 896.

<sup>3</sup> Macfarlane's Practice in Jury Trial, p. 271.

No. 95.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

I am not prepared to give at this moment any opinion upon the question whether a decree of divorce or any other decree might be set aside upon the ground that it proceeded on evidence which was false and perjured. I do not require to consider it. We are told that there is no judgment on the point, although there are obiter dicta to the effect that a reduction would not be entertained. I desire to reserve my opinion on that altogether. But it is another question, though involving some of the same considerations, and a more extended question, whether, if the party against whom the decree was pronounced avers that the perjured evidence on which it proceeded was procured by subornation of perjury by the opposite party or his agent, that is not a relevant ground of reduction. It may not be relevant merely that the decree proceeded upon false evidence, and may be none the less relevant if it was procured by the party who obtained the decree. It does not seem to be considered doubtful that in a case of the kind the decree could not stand.

I am not disposed to consider at present the averments of false and perjured evidence, beyond its relation to the witnesses alleged to have been suborned by the pursuer's agent. I do not think it necessary to give any opinion now as to the relevancy of the averments of subornation, or the sufficiency of these averments if proved, to entitle the pursuer to the remedy she asks. I do, however, think that they are such that it is expedient in the interests of both parties, and altogether justifiable on the part of the Court, that we should order an inquiry so as to see how the facts stand before answer upon the legal questions. I say nothing about the materiality of the evidence of the two girls Fairbairn, except that as regards the evidence of one of them the Court proceeded on it more or less in the action of divorce. It is averred that the husband's case with regard to his wife having been put into the hands of Macdonald, he deliberately set about procuring false evidence, and got these two girls, partly by offers of bribes and partly by threats, to consent to give evidence which it is averred was altogether false. I do not go into the details any further than to say that it is averred in the proposed amendments that they gave evidence to the effect that Mrs Begg and the co-defender acted in an unbecoming manner, and in a manner which indicated some immoral relations between them. All the evidence of the Fairbairns is on that, and was confined to matters tending to prove exhibitions of familiarity of a character favouring the view of the pursuer that they were leading an immoral life together. Now, as I have said, the averment here is that they have since confessed that all this evidence was false, and was given by them in the knowledge that it was false, and further, that they were suborned to give it by bribes offered and threats made by Macdonald. I said more than once during the debate that probably the evidence on the matters of fact would present a simpler issue than the legal question on which we heard argument. We were assured by the defender that there was no foundation for these statements, and that they were quite untrue. If that is so, it is not likely that the Court will be imposed on in regard to the two young girls, the only question being whether their story was false and was induced by Macdonald acting in the manner alleged. It should be a shorter story than is presented for consideration by the legal questions in the case, which are, as I have said, attended with great difficulty about setting aside the decree of divorce. If there should be a failure to establish this story of perjury and subornation—as I hope there will be—there is an end of the matter. If, however, the pursuer should succeed in establishing it, we shall have to encoun-

No. 95. ter the legal questions, but we shall know all about the details of the case. If the pursuer did nothing amiss, if Macdonald was merely over-zealous, and there is an absence of crime, there is an end of the matter. If, however, crime is proved, a very serious case will be raised, and we shall have to consider it with reference to the whole details. I abstain from stating my opinion as to whether we should refuse to try the case again, if the proceedings are shewn to be so tainted as the pursuer alleges. I am of opinion, then, on the whole matter that we should allow the pursuer a proof before answer of her averments with respect to the subornation of the Fairbairns.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also agree that we should allow a proof before answer, but nothing more at present. I would in the meantime rather refrain from making any observations on the matter.

LORD LEE and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

ON 15th November 1888 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—

“ Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the pursuer against Lord Fraser’s interlocutor of 30th June 1888, recall the said interlocutor in hoc statu; allow the pursuer to amend the record, and the defender to answer the amendments, and, in order thereto, open up the record; and the amendments and answers having been made, of new close the record as amended: Before further answer, and reserving all questions of expenses, allow the pursuer a proof of her averments with regard to the subornation of Elizabeth Fairbairn and Christina Ramsay Fairbairn: Appoint the same to proceed before Lord Rutherford Clark, at such time or place as his Lordship shall fix; and grant diligence at the instance of the pursuer against witnesses and havers.”

Proof was led before Lord Rutherford Clark, but as the Court were of opinion that the pursuer’s allegations had not been substantiated, it is unnecessary to consider it.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, after reviewing the evidence, was of opinion that the pursuer had completely failed to establish her allegations of subornation of perjury.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur, and I do not propose to make any observations on the evidence which has been led. Important questions have, however, been raised and argued, and as we must dispose of the whole case, I think it right to refer to them. The grounds upon which in this action the defender has sought to reduce the decree pronounced against her in the original action are that that decree was obtained by means of wilfully false and perjured evidence procured by an agent for the pursuer, who knew it to be false. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the record was irrelevant, that it did not set forth grounds relevant to set aside the decree which is impugned. He therefore dismissed the action, and it is upon a reclaiming note against his interlocutor that the case is now before us.

The case was fully argued in November last, with this result, that we allowed the record to be amended so as to make the allegations of wilful perjury and subornation more specific. We did not decide that the amendments made the record relevant, but we thought it fitting to allow a proof before answer. We heard argument not only on the relevancy of a reduction of a decree of divorce, or of any other decree, on the head of perjured evidence procured by subornation, but also on the head of wilful and corrupt perjury by itself, and without such subornation. The proof before answer which we allowed has been taken, and we now have, as I have said, to decide the whole case. Being of opinion with your Lordship that the allegations of subornation have not been substantiated, we have now to consider and determine the question previously argued, but not then decided, whether, with these out of the case, there is a relevant record. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment is really under review, although we recalled it in hoc statu to admit the proof, that the decree is well founded.

I think it would require very exceptional circumstances to admit a reduction of a decree on the ground that perjury had been committed in the trial. It is constantly a matter of discussion in jury trials and in trials on evidence before a Judge, whether certain evidence is true or false, or, without suggesting perjury, whether it is reliable. Perjury is sometimes, though rarely by discreet counsel, imputed in perfect good faith, and a jury or the Court not taking the same view may refuse to act upon it. I have no idea that in such a case the judgment which follows could be relevantly impugned on the ground of perjury. It is no doubt dreadful to think that in pronouncing judgment in a very important matter injustice may be done induced by perjury. It is also a dreadful thing to contemplate injustice being done by an error in law on the part of the Judge. But in this world such things happen, I suppose, more frequently owing to an erroneous decree upon an error in law on the part of the Judge than owing to false evidence. If they do happen we have to take into consideration the impossibility of carrying on the business of Courts of justice by trying and re-trying cases on such grounds as error in law or error in fact. Upon the head of legal error, if that error has been induced by fraud, which it conceivably might be, then there might be a reduction, or if an error in point of fact has been induced by fraud, of which subornation of perjury is a typical instance, that may be a ground for reducing the decree which proceeded upon it. It was therefore in that view that we before answer allowed a proof of the fraud which was alleged to have been practised upon the Court.

It is not necessary to express an opinion upon the matter, but I may say that in my opinion, if it had been proved that fraud had been practised upon the Court by a person even in the subordinate position of a detective inducing witnesses to say what was false, we should have set aside the decree obtained thereby. That, however, having failed, nothing remains here, and the result is that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which, as I have said, was recalled in hoc statu to allow the pursuer to lead her evidence of subornation, ought to be adhered to.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD LEE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Having resumed consideration of the cause, with the proof adduced under their interlocutor of 15th November last, find the averments of the pursuer irrelevant : Dismiss the action : Find the defender entitled to expenses."

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—STUART & STUART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 95.

Feb. 27, 1889.
Begg v. Begg.

No. 96.

LOCHORE AND CAPLEDRAE CANNEL COAL COMPANY AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Cooper.

Mar. 2, 1889.
Lochore and Capledrae
Cannel Coal
Co.

Company—Liquidation—Powers of provisional liquidator—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), secs. 95, 96, and 97.—Circumstances in which the Court appointed an official liquidator in the winding-up of a company, and gave him the powers conferred by the 95th, 96th, and 97th sections of the Companies Act, 1862, with special power to borrow money on the security of the assets of the company.

1st Division.
M.

THE LOCHORE AND CAPLEDRAE CANNEL COAL COMPANY was registered on 29th June 1872 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1867, its objects being to carry on certain mining undertakings in Fife. Its capital of £110,000, divided into 11,000 shares of £10 each, which was subsequently increased by an additional issue of 2000 shares, having been exhausted, and the company being considerably in debt, it was resolved, at a meeting of the company held on 8th February 1889, that the directors should take steps to place the company in liquidation in order to dispose of it as a going concern, either to a reconstituted company or otherwise.

The company, the Union Bank, who were creditors, and Mr J. D. Lawrie, who was a shareholder of the company, presented a petition under the Companies Acts, 1862, praying that the Court should order the company to be wound up, that Mr Richard Brown, C.A., should be appointed provisional liquidator, with power to exercise the duties specified in sections 95, 96, and 97 of the Companies Act, 1862, without the sanction of the Court; that the provisional liquidator should be authorised to borrow a sum of £2500 for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company, and protecting its interests; and on resuming consideration of the petition, with or without answers, to appoint Mr Brown official liquidator, with the foresaid powers.<sup>1</sup>

The petitioners averred;—"There is no prospect of the company being successful with the money resources at its command. If a sale be effected of the property and undertaking of the company, there will be a considerable surplus of assets to be divided among the shareholders, and the petitioner Mr Lawrie will be entitled, as a shareholder, to a substantial portion of such surplus.

"It is expedient, in the interests of the creditors and shareholders of the company, that the undertaking of the company be disposed of as a going concern, and that in the meantime the business of the company be carried on with a view to the beneficial winding-up of the company. It is also necessary that the liquidator be authorised to borrow money to the extent of £2500 to enable the business to be carried on, and to meet the payments required to protect the company's rights in Benarty Colliery."

On 12th February 1889 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation (Fraser) ordered intimation and advertisement, and appointed Mr Brown provisional liquidator, with the powers asked, and on 2d March following the First Division pronounced this interlocutor:—

"HAVING resumed consideration of the petition and proceedings, order that the Lochore and Capledrae Cannel Coal Company be wound up by the Court under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886: Nominate and appoint Richard Brown, chartered accountant in Edinburgh, to be official liquidator of the said company, with all the powers conferred by the 95th, 96th, and

<sup>1</sup> Authorities.—Palmer's Company Precedents (4th edn.) 707, Form 596; Buckley on the Companies Acts (5th edn.), 261.

97th sections of the Companies Act of 1862, but declaring that No. 96.
the power of the official liquidator to borrow money on the security of the assets of the company shall be and is hereby restricted Mar. 2, 1889.
to an amount not exceeding the sum of £2500, the said Richard Lochore and Brown always finding caution for his intrusions and manage- Caplethrae ment in common form before extract, and decern: Farther, remit Cannel Coal the petition and proceedings to Lord Kinnear to proceed therein Co. in terms of the statutes."

DRUMMOND & REID, W.S., Agents.

JAMES EAGLESHAM & COMPANY, Pursuers (Appellants).—Ure.

No. 97.

ADAM DICKSON AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Process—Petition against custodier of stolen property under Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii).—Multiplepinding. Mar. 2, 1889.
Eaglesham &
Co. v. Dickson.

ON 1st December 1888 James Eaglesham & Company, manufacturers, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against Adam Dickson, Central Police Office, Glasgow, who was the 2D DIVISION. custodier, under the Glasgow Police Act, of property taken possession of Sheriff of in the public interest in criminal cases, and against certain pawnbrokers. Lanarkshire.
The prayer of the petition was for delivery of a number of articles which I.
they averred had been stolen from their premises by James Patrick while in their employment, and for the theft of which he was now undergoing a term of imprisonment.

On 20th December 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) dismissed the petition, and, "in respect no appearance has been entered by any person called as defender, finds no expenses due, and decerns."

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 21st January 1889, adhered. The ground upon which the Sheriffs proceeded was that they were of opinion that the principal defender might be exposed to risk of future claims being made for the goods in his custody if in an action like the present decree was given against him for delivery to the pursuers; the usual and proper course where there were a number of possible claimants to the goods was to bring an action of multiplepinding.

The pursuers appealed.

THE COURT, holding that the Sheriffs were wrong, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against, and remit the cause to the Sheriff, with instructions to grant the prayer of the petition."

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C., Agents.

FRANCIS S. ALLAN (Surveyor of Taxes), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Darling— No. 98.
A. J. Young.

WILLIAM MILLER, Respondent.—R. V. Campbell—G. R. Gillespie.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Allan v.
Miller.

*Revenue—Inhabited House Duty—Different tenements let to one tenant for cumulo rent—Verbal lease—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 15), sec. 13, subsec. 1.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec.
13, subsec. 1, provides, as to inhabited house duty, that "where any house being one property shall be divided into and let in different tenements, and any of such tenements are occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business," &c., the occupier of such tenement shall be relieved of the duty.*

Held (following Smiles v. Crooke, 13 R. 730) that the exemption applied in a case where different tenements (one of which was used solely for business

No. 98. purposes) were let to the same tenant from year to year under a verbal lease at a cumulo rent.

Mar. 6, 1889.

Allan v.

Miller.

Exchequer

Cause.

1st Division.

C.

At a meeting of Commissioners of Income-Tax for the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, William Miller appealed against an assessment made upon him for the year 1887-88 of 12s. 6d., being the inhabited house duty at the rate of 6d. per pound on £25, the annual rent of a dwelling-house and shop occupied by him at 59 Main Street, Rutherglen.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal, and discharged the assessment.

On the motion of Francis S. Allan, Surveyor of Taxes, a case was stated for the consideration of the Court.

From the case it appeared that the premises let to Mr Miller consisted of a spirit shop, a dwelling-house, a bakehouse, and sheds. There was no written lease of the subjects, which were let simply from year to year at a cumulo rent of £35.

The parties were agreed that of that rent £10 was fairly applicable to the bakehouse and sheds, and that house duty was not exigible thereon.

The spirit shop and the dwelling-house had no internal communication with one another, and, taken separately, neither of them was of the value of £20 per annum.

The Surveyor of Taxes maintained that the subjects were not "divided into and let in different tenements," in the sense of the statute. The case was distinguishable from that of Smiles v. Crooke,<sup>1</sup> where the subjects were separately entered in the lease. Here there was no lease, and all that was known was that they were let to one man at a cumulo rent. The view of the Commissioners simply read the words "let in different tenements" out of the Act.

Counsel for Miller were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is just one point on which it is possible to make any distinction between this case and that of Smiles v. Crooke, and the question is whether that distinction is material. In that case there was a written lease, and the different tenements were described as such in the lease. Here there is no lease, the subjects being merely let from year to year. But if in point of fact these tenements are so different as to answer the description in section 13 of the Act, then if there had been a lease they must have been separately described in it, or they would have been wrongly described. In that view, I do not think the distinction between the cases is in the slightest degree material, and therefore I think the decision in Smiles v. Crooke must be followed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT affirmed the decision of the Commissioners.

SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—WYLIE & ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

---

<sup>1</sup> Smiles v. Crooke, March 6, 1886, 13 R. 730.

JAMES WHYTE AND OTHERS (Dalglish's Trustees) Pursuers (Real Raisers). No. 99.

THOMAS CARRITT AND OTHERS (Bannerman's Executors) Defendants (Claimants).—Murray.

RALPH RADCLIFFE WHITEHEAD, Defender (Claimant).—D.-F. Mackintosh
—Wallace.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

MRS MARGARET DALGLISH OR WILSON AND OTHERS, Defendants (Claimants).

MARY LANG OR DALGLISH, Defender (Claimant).

Succession—Fee and liferent—Fee with protected succession—Repugnancy—Vesting.—A truster directed his trustees to divide his estate into shares in a certain manner, "said shares to be payable to my said children as soon as my estate shall be realised and converted into cash." In the event of the death of any of the children before receiving payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such decesser was to be divided among the surviving children or their issue.

By a codicil he directed his trustees "to invest the shares of my means and estate falling to my daughters," "so soon as the same is realised and can be invested upon heritable security, taking the rights thereto conceived in favour of such daughters in liferent for their liferent use alienably, and to the child or children of their bodies, if more than one, equally among them in fee"; declaring that such liferent provisions were to be purely alimentary, exclusive of the jus mariti, but with power to any of the daughters, by writing under her hand, to continue her liferent to her husband, and to apportion the fee among her children.

A daughter who had married died without issue, predeceased by her husband, and leaving a will. She had not received payment of her share. Held that the settlement and codicil taken together conferred upon each daughter a fee which vested a morte testatoris, subject only to a restriction in favour of her issue, in the event of her having such.

JAMES DALGLISH, manufacturer, Glasgow, died on 24th July 1849, leaving a trust-settlement dated 7th May 1847, with a codicil thereto dated 3d March 1848. By the settlement he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his son James Dalglish junior and others as trustees. He directed his trustees, inter alia, to make payment to his widow "of a free yearly jointure or annuity of £400."

By the third purpose of the settlement the truster directed his trustees, in the event of his daughter Isabella being alive and unmarried at the date of his death, to pay to her a legacy of £500 over and above her share of his means and estate; and by the fourth purpose he appointed his trustees "to divide the remainder and residue of my said means and estate into twenty-eight equal parts or shares, four of such parts or shares to be paid to each of my four daughters, and six parts or shares to each of my two sons; and on the death of my said spouse, in case she shall survive me, I direct my said trustees to divide the sum set apart for answering her annuity, and the proceeds of the house and furniture liferented by her, among all my children in the same proportions, said shares to be payable to my said children as soon as my estate shall be realised and converted into cash; which provision in favour of my said daughters shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands they may presently have or may afterwards marry, and not subject to the debts or deeds of such husbands or the diligence of their creditors, and the same shall be under their entire control and disposal; and in the event of the death of any of my said children before receiving payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such decesser shall be divided among my surviving children or their issue in the proportions foresaid;

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

No. 99.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

and in the event of the death of any of my said children leaving lawful issue, the share of such deceiver shall be paid to said issue equally share and share alike."

By the codicil the truster directed his trustees "to invest the shares of my means and estate falling to my daughters at my death, and at the death of their mother, in case she shall survive me, so soon as the same is realised and can be invested, upon heritable security, taking the rights thereto conceived in favour of such daughters in liferent for their liferent use alienably, and to the child or children of their bodies, if more than one, equally among them in fee; declaring that said liferent provisions shall be purely alimentary, exclusive of their husbands' jus mariti, not attachable for his or their debts, nor assignable by my said daughters. But providing and declaring that my said daughters or any of them may, if so disposed, by a writing under their hands, continue the liferent provision to their husbands during their respective lifetimes, burdened with the support of the children, and may divide and apportion the fee among their children in such proportions, and under such limitations and conditions as they think proper to impose." The truster was survived by his widow and by one son and four daughters.

The son, Robert James Dalglish, died in 1866 without issue.

The truster's widow died in 1876.

The youngest daughter, Jane, married a Mr Bannerman. She died without issue, and predeceased by her husband, on 22d January 1888. She left a settlement, by which she conveyed her whole estate to Thomas Carritt and others as her executors.

After her death a question arose as to whether the capital of her share of the trust-estate had vested in her or had become intestate succession of Mr Dalglish, or had passed in virtue of his settlement to his children who survived her and the issue of those who predeceased her.

In order to the settlement of these questions Mr Dalglish's trustees raised a process of multiplepoinding for distribution of her share.

Claims were lodged by (1) Mrs Bannerman's executors, who claimed the whole fund on the ground that Mrs Bannerman's share had vested in her, and was therefore carried by her will; (2) Ralph Radcliffe Whitehead, the only son of Mrs Whitehead, one of the truster's daughters who had predeceased Mrs Bannerman, who maintained that on a sound construction of the settlement and codicil the share of the truster's estate liferented by Mrs Bannerman had become intestate succession of the truster, or otherwise, that he was entitled to it under the survivorship clause above quoted. Similar claims were lodged for the children of Mrs Price, another daughter of the truster.

On 7th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) found that the executors of Mrs Bannerman were entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio.*

---

* "OPINION.—The scheme of this will and codicil seems to be that there is first, what is not strictly a residuary destination but a division of the estate unequally—sons receiving larger shares than daughters. And then in the will there follows a proper residuary clause dealing with the case of any of the children dying before receiving payment of his or her share. It appears to me that under the will, apart from the codicil, there cannot possibly be intestacy; because every contingency is provided for.

"Now, the only alteration made upon that scheme by the codicil is this: The testator proposed that instead of giving the daughters their shares absolutely at his death, settlement should be made in their favour, and he directs that to be done by the trustees as soon as his property is realised and capable of invest-

Ralph Radcliffe Whitehead reclaimed, and argued ;—Mrs Bannerman never took more than a liferent of her share. The testator by the codicil

No. 99.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

ment. They are to take separate rights heritably secured in favour of the daughters, with a destination which is there described. It appears to me, therefore, that this case has this analogy with the two cases of Fulton and Lindsay in 1880, that it is a case of a trust for members of the testator's family to be effected not by the direct and immediate dispositive act of the testator, but by a conveyance to be afterwards executed by the trustees in conformity with directions given to them. Then it will be necessary to consider what would be the true construction of a conveyance of an heritable security to daughters in the terms expressed in the codicil, taking along with the codicil the leading direction of the will, which is referred to in the codicil.

"Now, there is a series of decisions regarding destinations in liferent and fee, and so far as any particular destination has been interpreted the decisions must receive effect, because this branch of the law has been very authoritatively systematised. I must observe, however, that the meaning put upon the same words of destination varies according to the cause of granting, and the same words receive very different interpretations according as they occur in a deed of purchase or in a deed of gift.

"Again, if it is a question of carrying out a power to settle money, we must find out what are the proper words of destination, and give effect to that power ; and we are not necessarily to use the precise words of the power in the deed carrying it into execution. Supposing the destination had been in the very words in the codicil, 'to the child or children of their bodies, if more than one, equally among them in fee.' That, according to the old authorities, would not have vested any beneficial right of fee in the daughter ; she would merely be a liferenter with a fiduciary fee for behoof of her children ; and if no children, the fee is undisposed of under the terms of the settlement. That is, as I take it, the case contemplated by the Lord President in his opinion delivered in the case of Fulton ; the fee is untransferred ; and there being no proper residuary clause in Fulton's will the result was that this particular share fell into intestacy. Then it is equally clear that if this had been a case of a title-deed of property purchased by the lady herself, then, according to the destination in the codicil, the daughter would be the fiar, and would hold the fiduciary fee for children, but failing children for herself. In short it would be a right of fee with a simple destination. But now this is a case of a conveyance to be executed by trustees in such terms as will carry out the testator's will, and while my attention has been called to the observation of the Lord President in Fulton's case—that whatever was directed to be done must be held as done—an observation which is of course indisputable—that still leaves open the consideration of the question, what is it that was directed to be done ? This question cannot be determined by merely looking at the bare terms of the codicil. The testator's intention must be collected from the will and codicil taken together. This is the principle, I think, of the later decision in Lindsay's case, a decision pronounced by the two Divisions sitting together. That case I hold to be entirely consistent with Fulton, because the Court were dealing with two different things. In Lindsay's case, it is true, you have not a will and a codicil as we have here, but you have two clauses in the same will, which on a first impression appear to be inconsistent with one another, and therefore the question is much the same as if it had arisen in the construction of a will and codicil which were more or less inconsistent.

"Now, the view of the majority of the Court in the case of Lindsay (8 R. 281), which view seems to me to be in accordance with the best principle of trust interpretation, is that you are to look at the leading intention in favour of the family, and if there is a leading intention clearly expressed in favour of making an out-and-out gift to the family, and there is in a subsidiary clause a direction to make a settlement, you must frame the settlement in such terms as will prevent the share from going over to another family. So strongly fixed is this principle (that the trustees in framing the deed must ascertain the testator's inten-

No. 99.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

restricted to a liferent what was no doubt under the fourth purpose of the settlement a gift to daughters of a fee. There was no need for attempting to reconcile these provisions. The later in date must have effect. The presumption was that the codicil was intended to make an alteration on the deed. In Fulton's Trustees v. Fulton<sup>1</sup> there was in the first instance an absolute gift to children of one share each in the father's estate, the share of each daughter to be invested in heritable security for her in liferent only and her children in fee. A daughter having survived the father but died without issue, it was held that she never had any right but a bare liferent, and that her share was intestate succession of the truster. That case was exactly in point. It was not overruled in the subsequent case of Lindsay,<sup>2</sup> as the respondents suggested. The latter was distinguishable, first, because there the truster's object was held to be with regard to part of his estate, to benefit his family by his first marriage, and to secure that a share of his estate which had been liferented by his daughter by that marriage, if she died leaving no issue, should not pass to the children of the second family. In the second place, it was distinguishable, because there the apparent repugnancy occurred between two clauses in the same deed. It was, of course, desirable to reconcile them. But in this case the repugnancy was between the settlement and the codicil, and the presumption was that the latter was intended to alter the former.

Argued for Mrs Bannerman's executors;—No doubt the object of the codicil was to make some alteration on the settlement. But the question was what alteration, i.e., whether an alteration on the constitution of the gift, or an alteration consisting only in a direction to settle in a protected manner the gift already made. The latter—protected succession—was the true intention and effect of the codicil. The case was ruled by those of Lindsay and Gibson's Trustees. There was no doubt that there was tion from the whole instrument), that in the two other cases that have been referred to—Gibson's Trustees<sup>2</sup> and Lady Massy<sup>3</sup>—the Court directed the execution of a deed in the form of a destination which was unfamiliar to Scotch conveyancers (a very unusual form of destination) because that only was supposed to be capable of carrying out the testator's wishes. Accordingly I come to the conclusion that in the present case the trustees would not have carried out the testator's directions if they had taken heritable security in the precise terms used in the codicil. It would be their duty to take into account the leading direction of the will itself, which is in no way expressly revoked, and which directs a partition amongst the families giving certain shares to sons and certain shares to daughters. The security to be taken would have provided that in the case of there being no family the share of the decesser should be divided amongst the surviving children or their issue. I ought to notice that an argument was founded on the closing words of the codicil, 'But providing and declaring that my said daughters, or any of them, may, if so disposed, by a writing under their hands, continue the liferent provisions to their husbands.' I do not found much upon that clause, because it is also capable of being read as a limitation of the fee to the daughters. It would rather be in favour of the daughters having a more limited right than one of fee in the event of there being children of the marriage. But then, in that event, the children were to get the fee, and it is only in that case that it is thought necessary to give the wife a power of continuing her liferent to her husband. These words do not seem to me to militate against the theory that in the event of failure of issue the daughter is to have the reversion of the fee.

"The result is that I sustain the claim of Mrs Bannerman's executors."

<sup>1</sup> Fulton's Trustees v. Fulton, Feb. 6, 1880, 7 R. 566.

<sup>2</sup> Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay and Others, Dec. 14, 1880, 8 R. 281; Gibson's Trustees v. Ross, July 12, 1877, 4 R. 1038.

<sup>3</sup> Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 173, 45 Scot. Jur. 127.

vesting a morte testatoris under the settlement. In Fulton's case there was not, as here, the direct conveyance of the fee to the daughter. But the case of Lindsay, if there were not that distinction also between it and that of Fulton, must be held to have overruled that authority.

At advising, the opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE) was delivered by

No. 99.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

LORD LEE.—The competition which has arisen in this case depends upon the question whether under the trust-settlement of the late Mr James Dalglish his daughter Jane Dalglish or Bannerman, who survived him and died without issue, had a vested right to a share of his means and estate. The Lord Ordinary has decided in favour of vesting as at the testator's death, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

The settlement is composed of two parts, the original trust-deed and a codicil. These must be read together, and as the codicil does not expressly revoke any of the provisions of the original settlement, I think that it cannot be construed as altering the settlement excepting to the extent necessary to give effect to the directions which it contains.

The leading purposes of the trust are, firstly, to provide an annuity of £400 to the testator's widow; secondly, in case of his daughter Isabella being unmarried at his death, to pay to her a legacy of £500 over and above her share of his means and estate at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his decease; and thirdly, to divide the residue among his children in certain proportions. It is upon the terms of the deed and codicil as regards this last purpose that the question has arisen.

The provision of the deed is as follows:—"In the fourth place, I appoint my said trustees to divide the remainder and residue of my said means and estate into twenty-eight equal parts or shares, four of such parts or shares to be paid to each of my four daughters, and six parts or shares to each of my two sons; and on the death of my said spouse, in case she shall survive me, I direct my said trustees to divide the sum set apart for answering her annuity, and the proceeds of the house and furniture liferented by her, among all my children in the same proportions, said shares to be payable to my said children as soon as my estate shall be realised and converted into cash; which provision in favour of my said daughters shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands they may presently have or may afterwards marry, and not subject to the debts or deeds of such husbands or the diligence of their creditors, and the same shall be under their entire control and disposal; and in the event of the death of any of my said children before receiving payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such deceiver shall be divided among my surviving children or their issue in the proportions foresaid; and in the event of the death of any of my said children leaving lawful issue, the share of such deceiver shall be paid to said issue equally, share and share alike."

But by the codicil the testator, in virtue of the reserved powers in his deed of settlement, directed his trustees "to invest the shares of my means and estate falling to my daughters at my death, and at the death of their mother, in case she shall survive me, so soon as the same is realised and can be invested, upon heritable security, taking the rights thereto conceived in favour of such daughters in liferent for their liferent use alienably, and to the child or children of their

No. 99.

Mar. 6, 1889.
Dalglish's
Trustees v.
Bannerman's
Executors.

bodies, if more than one, equally among them in fee; declaring that said liferent provisions shall be purely alimentary, exclusive of their husbands' jus mariti, not attachable for his or their debts, nor assignable by my said daughters. But providing and declaring that my said daughters, or any of them, may, if so disposed, by a writing under their hands, continue the liferent provision to their husbands during their respective lifetimes, burdened with the support of the children, and may divide and apportion the fee among the children in such proportions and under such limitations and conditions as they think proper to impose."

The testator was survived by his widow (who died in 1876), and also by one son and four daughters. The son's share was duly paid to him, but the capital of the shares falling to the daughters was retained to meet the claims of children under the codicil. One of the children, Jane Dalglish or Bannerman, has recently died without issue, but leaving a settlement, and it is her share that is in question.

It is said as against the claim of her testamentary representatives that the effect of the codicil was to suspend vesting, and that her share has either become undisposed of residue or is disposed of by the survivorship clause of the deed.

My opinion is that the codicil was not intended to result in intestacy on the part of the testator with respect to the share of a daughter dying without issue, and I think that its terms do not support a construction of the settlement which shall have that result. It appears to me that the sole object of the codicil is to protect the capital or fee of a daughter's share for her children, if there should be such children. It is settled by the case of Lindsay's Trustees, 8 R. 281, that this is a purpose which is not inconsistent with vesting. In that case there was a direction that the £1000 bequeathed to Catherine Bruce Lindsay should be held so as to give "to herself liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body equally among them the fee thereof." But the sum was, in the first place, bequeathed to her as a legacy payable six months after the testator's death. It was held that the direction to secure the fee to children was contingent on the existence of children, and there being none, that her right was free of the direction, which was applicable only to that contingency. In short, the principle affirmed by that decision was that where a bequest is merely burdened with a trust for children, that burden falls off if children should not exist. The restriction of the parent's right for behoof of his or her children therefore implies no purpose of creating intestacy.

The case of Fulton's Trustees, referred to by the reclaimer's counsel, 7 R. 565, was different in one material respect from the present. It was not clear that the terms of the original bequest were such as to confer a fee upon the daughters, whereas in the present case it was conceded by the Dean of Faculty that under the deed of settlement, had it stood alone, the daughter must have taken a fee a morte testatoris. But if that case decided the point which is here raised, and which was also raised in the case of Lindsay's Trustees, it must be held to have been overruled by the decision in the latter case, which was a unanimous judgment of seven Judges, including all the Judges who took part in the decision of Fulton's Trustees.

THE COURT adhered.

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agree.

JAMES COOK Junior, Pursuer (Respondent).—Salvesen.
WALLACE & WILSON, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Wilson.

No. 100.

Mar. 7, 1889.

Reparation—Apprehension and imprisonment for civil debt—Necessity for notice of petition for warrant to imprison—Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 42), secs. 3 and 4 (subsec. 3).—The defender in an action for aliment of an illegitimate child was charged to make payment of the sums contained in a decree in the action. On his failure to implement the decree, a petition was presented to the Sheriff, under the Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882,* craving a warrant to commit him to prison. The Sheriff de plano granted warrant to search for and apprehend the debtor, and “to bring him before the Sheriff for examination.” The law-agents of the creditor caused the warrant to be executed. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the law-agents, on the ground that they had put in force an illegal warrant, held (1) that the warrant for the debtor’s apprehension was illegal, and (2) that the action against the law-agents who executed the warrant was relevant.

In November 1888 James Cook junior, Glasgow, raised an action against Wallace & Wilson, writers there, concluding for payment of £500 in name of damages. 1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
C.

He stated that in 1887 decree was pronounced against him, in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, in an action for aliment of an illegitimate child.

The pursuer averred that he had been charged on 5th January 1888 to pay the sums contained in the decree, but that he was unable to do so.

He further averred,—(Cond. 4) “On or about 19th January 1888 the defenders, as agents for Miss Adam [the pursuer in the action for aliment], presented a petition to the Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute at Paisley, under the Civil Imprisonment Act, craving a warrant to commit the pursuer to prison for a period not exceeding six weeks, or until he should pay to the defender the foresaid sums in name of inlying expenses, aliment, and interest thereon, and expenses of process, amounting in all to the sum of £13, 17s. 4d. The said petition was signed by the defender David Wilson, as law-agent for Miss Adam. On said date the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) granted a warrant to search for and apprehend the pursuer, and bring him before the Sheriff for examination.” (Cond. 5) “On 24th

* Section 3 of the Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, enacts,—“From and after the commencement of this Act no person shall, except as hereinafter provided, be apprehended or imprisoned on account of his failure to pay any sum or sums decreed for aliment.”

Section 4.—“Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, any Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute may commit to prison for a period not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum or sums of aliment and expenses of process decreed for, or such instalment or instalments thereof as the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute may appoint, or until the creditor is otherwise satisfied, any person who wilfully fails to pay within the days of charge any sum or sums of aliment together with the expenses of process for which decree has been pronounced against him by any competent Court, provided :— . . . (3) That the failure to pay shall be presumed to have been wilful, until the contrary is proved by the debtor, but that a warrant for imprisonment shall not be granted if it is proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute that the debtor has not, since the commencement of the action in which the decree was pronounced, possessed or been able to earn the means of paying the sum or sums in respect of which he has made default, or such instalment or instalments thereof as the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall consider reasonable.”

No. 100. January the pursuer was, about eight o'clock in the morning, and while in bed, apprehended under said warrant, upon the instructions of the defenders as acting for Miss Adam. The pursuer's apprehension caused great commotion and alarm in his father's house. The pursuer's mother was very anxious, and arranged to go to Paisley with him. They accordingly drove to Paisley in pursuer's father's machine, arriving there between ten and eleven o'clock. The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) being otherwise engaged, the pursuer was detained in custody at the Court-house till about half-past two o'clock, when his Lordship took the matter up, and granted warrant to imprison the pursuer for six weeks, and found him liable in £2, 2s. as the expenses of the application." (Cond. 6; "The pursuer was then removed in custody to Glasgow, and was taken to the defenders' office to endeavour to get the matter settled." (Cond. 8; "The pursuer has been advised that the procuring and enforcing of said warrant to apprehend him, and under which he was apprehended, was wrongous and illegal. No notice was previously given to the pursuer that such a petition was to be presented, and it was only served upon him at the moment of his apprehension. The petition was a civil Sheriff Court proceeding, while the pursuer was treated worse than if he had been under a criminal charge. He was literally dragged from his bed, taken before a Judge without any opportunity of procuring legal advice, and summarily condemned to six weeks' imprisonment. The statute does not authorise apprehension before an order for imprisonment is pronounced, and the fact that imprisonment was the remedy craved did not imply that the pursuer was to be apprehended at the outset of the proceedings."

He pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The warrant to apprehend the pursuer, and his subsequent apprehension thereunder, as condescended on, being illegal and contrary to the statute, and having caused serious loss and damage to the pursuer, the defenders are liable in reparation as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) No relevant case.

On 7th February 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the second plea in law for the defenders, and appoints the pursuer within eight days to lodge the issue or issues which he proposes for the trial of the cause." * * "OPINION.—In July 1887 the pursuer was decerned, by a decree of the Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute, to make payment to Jessie Adam of certain sums of money as aliment for the support of an illegitimate child of which the pursuer is the father. On 5th January 1888 the pursuer was charged to make payment of the sums contained in said decree; but having failed to implement the charge a petition was presented to the Sheriff under the Civil Imprisonment in Scotland Act (1882), craving the Sheriff to grant warrant to commit the pursuer to prison. On this petition the Sheriff granted a warrant to search for and apprehend the pursuer, and 'bring him before the Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute for examination.' The defenders (acting as law-agents for Miss Adam) put this warrant into the hands of a sheriff-officer for execution. The pursuer was accordingly apprehended by the sheriff-officer and taken before the Sheriff-substitute at Paisley, who, after hearing the pursuer, committed him to prison for six weeks.

"The pursuer now avers that the warrant for his apprehension, and his apprehension following thereon, were illegal, and he sues the defenders for damages on the ground that they obtained the same and gave instructions for the execution thereof. The defenders plead that the action is irrelevant. I am of opinion that that plea should be repelled.

"By the Civil Imprisonment Act it is provided that a creditor in a decree

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—Under sec. 4 of the Civil Im- No. 100.
prisonment Act, 1882, the Sheriff might commit to prison until payment

Mar. 7, 1889.
Cook v. Wallace & Wilson.

for aliment which has not been implemented may apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to commit the debtor to prison; and on such an application the Sheriff may commit the debtor to prison for a period not exceeding six weeks, unless it is proved to his satisfaction 'that the debtor has not, since the commencement of the action in which the decree was pronounced, possessed or been able to earn the means of paying the sum or sums in respect of which he has made default.' It is obvious therefore that before a warrant to commit the debtor can competently be granted, the debtor must have an opportunity of satisfying the Sheriff that he has not been possessed or been able to earn the means of paying his debt. To enable him to do this he must be brought before the Sheriff. But by what form of procedure is he to be brought before the Sheriff? In answering this question it has to be observed that the whole proceedings are taken under the civil and in no sense the criminal jurisdiction of the Sheriff. Now, the ordinary mode by which a debtor is brought by a creditor before the Sheriff to answer in a civil process for his debt or obligation is by citation. It is not material whether the Sheriff grants warrant for the debtor's citation in ordinary form, or ordains the debtor to appear before him at a certain time. These are but two different forms by which the debtor is called on to appear before the Judge.

"In the present case, however, neither of these forms were adopted; the Sheriff granted at once a warrant to search for and apprehend the pursuer; a warrant which was not prayed for in the petition, and a warrant which, in my opinion, was illegal and ultra vires of the Sheriff in the circumstances. The statute does not authorise the Sheriff to issue such a warrant; and I know of no authority anywhere in our law conferred upon a Sheriff in the exercise of his civil jurisdiction by which he is authorised in limine of the proceedings before him to grant warrant for the apprehension of any debtor or alleged debtor, unless it be in the exceptional case of a debtor said to be in fuga, and even there the warrant to apprehend does not proceed on the mere statement of the creditor, but on proof affording a prima facie case that the creditor's statements are true.

"If there is no authority in the law for granting such a warrant as that now under consideration, there is neither authority nor excuse for it in our practice. The statute, indeed, is of too recent date to have had any practice founded on it which could be regarded as in any sense authoritative. Such practice as has followed upon the statute has not been uniform, nor in all cases quite regular. I had occasion in the Bill-Chamber to consider a case where the Sheriff, on an application under this statute to commit a debtor to prison, had, without notice of any kind to the debtor, or affording him any opportunity of explaining his failure to pay the debt, de plano granted warrant for the debtor's committal to prison for six weeks, a procedure which was not only illegal because contrary to the statute, but obviously unfair to the debtor. I do not know what the practice has been in other counties, but in Forfarshire (with which I was officially connected) the practice was to order intimation of the petition to the debtor, and to appoint him to appear to answer to the same at a specified time. This, I think, is the right practice.

"It was said on behalf of the defenders that to give notice of the petition to the debtor would only enable him to abscond. The same thing might be said of the service of a summons, for it gives notice to the debtor of the claim made against him, and enables him to quit the jurisdiction or dispose of his property before any decree can be obtained. Or take the case of an application for breach of interdict. The citation there would enable the respondent to quit the jurisdiction and avoid the penalty due to his offence; yet even in such a case (which is quasi criminal) the respondent is not apprehended, but cited to appear and answer to the complaint. But the proper answer to the objection stated is, that there is no presumption that a law-abiding citizen will fail to render obedience to the citation of a competent Court. The assumption of the power, either by a Sheriff or any other authority, to order the apprehension of any citizen, which

No. 100. of sums contained in a decree of aliment. That power necessarily conferred a power to grant a warrant for apprehension of the debtor. If it did not, and it was necessary to give intimation of the presentation of the petition for imprisonment to the debtor, the Act would defeat its own purpose in many cases, as the debtor would, on getting the notice, abscond. There was no hardship in no notice of the warrant for apprehension being given, because in the charge to pay intimation was given to the debtor that, in the event of payment not being made, imprisonment would follow, and he might have lodged a caveat that he wished to be heard before any warrant was granted.

Counsel for the pursuer was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary is quite unimpeachable. Under the Debtors Act, 1880, apprehension or imprisonment for debt is abolished, subject to two exceptions, the second of which is “sums decerned for aliment.” Section 3 of the Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, enacts that from the commencement of the Act “no person shall, except as hereinafter provided, be apprehended or imprisoned on account of his failure to pay any sum or sums decerned for aliment.” The provision there referred to is contained in section 4, the effect of which is to entitle a creditor in such a debt to commit the debtor to prison, but to do so he must first apply to the Sheriff. That, of course, infers the institution of some sort of summary procedure, and in that procedure it is open to the debtor to satisfy the Sheriff that he cannot pay the debt, and that he has not been able to earn enough to do so. It seems to me that it is a condition of the debtor being apprehended or put in prison that he shall have failed to satisfy the Sheriff on those points. If that be so, I cannot doubt that the apprehension and imprisonment in this case were illegal, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT adhered.

STURROCK & GRAHAM, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 101. ROBERT BRUCE (Inspector of Poor of Fordoun), First Party.—Loc.
HONOURABLE CHARLES J. R. H. STUART FORBES TREFUSIS AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Kennedy.

Mar. 7, 1889.
Bruce v. Ratepayers of For-doun.

Poor—Assessment—Concurrence of Board of Supervision to alteration of mod-of assessment—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), secs. 34, 36—Poor-Assessments Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 37), sec. 1.—Held that a parochial board, which had, under sec. 36 of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, adopted, for purposes of assessment to poor-rates, a classification of lands and heritages, was entitled to abandon the classification without obtaining the concurrence of the Board of Supervision.

1ST DIVISION. AT a meeting of the Parochial Board of the parish of Fordoun.
C. Kincardineshire, held on 2d October 1847, it was resolved as follows:—

is not directly authorised by the law, is not to be allowed; and I think the Sheriff in granting the warrant in question assumed a power which he did not possess.

“If the warrant was illegal, there can be no doubt the defenders are liable for instructing it to be executed.”

"1st, That from and after the 26th day of November next, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, the funds for the support of the poor in this parish be raised by assessment. 2d, That the mode of assessment to be adopted shall be that first narrated in the Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83, namely, one half of the sum required shall be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants and occupants of lands and heritages within the parish. 3d, Tenants and occupants shall, with concurrence of the Board of Supervision, be classified as under—(1) Tenants and occupants of lands for tillage or grazing, including houses and buildings necessary for their management personally occupied or used by the farmer; (2) Tenants and occupants of shops or other premises in which mercantile or manufacturing business is conducted; and (3) Tenants and occupants of dwelling-houses, gardens, and pleasure grounds. In reference to each of these classes, the following scale of rates shall be adopted:—Whatever rate of assessment it may be necessary to impose on class 1st, double that rate shall be imposed on class 2d, and quadruple the rate charged on class 1st shall be levied on class 3d."

No. 101.
Mar. 7, 1889.
Bruce v. Ratepayers of For-doun.

The terms of the resolution were duly communicated to the Board of Supervision, and the Board intimated their approval thereof.

The assessment was thereafter imposed in accordance with the said classification of lands and heritages until 3d August 1888, when, at a meeting of the Parochial Board, a resolution was carried by sixteen votes to fifteen, "that the existing classification for rating of tenants shall be discontinued, and all classes of property be rated alike," and the inspector was instructed to send a copy of the resolution to the Board of Supervision and to ask if their consent was required. The Board of Supervision intimated that they "cannot approve of the resolution of the Parochial Board." On 18th September 1888, it was moved that the resolution adopted at the meeting of 3d August should be rescinded as not having met the approval of the Board of Supervision. It was also moved that the former resolution be adhered to. The latter motion was carried by seventeen votes to sixteen, and the inspector was instructed "to forward the resolution to the Board of Supervision." The Board of Supervision intimated that they "cannot approve of the resolution of the Parochial Board to impose the assessment without a classification of occupants in terms of section 36 of the Poor-Law Act."

The assessment for the year 1888 having been imposed upon all classes of property alike in terms of the resolution of 3d August 1888, the Hon. Charles J. R. H. Stuart Forbes Trefusis and others, ratepayers in the parish, appealed to the Parochial Board against the assessment on the ground that it was illegal. The Parochial Board dismissed the appeals, but resolved in the meantime not to take legal proceedings against any of the ratepayers for recovery of their rates.

In the above circumstances a special case was, on 18th February 1889, presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

Robert Bruce, inspector of poor of the parish of Fordoun, as representing the Parochial Board of the parish, was the first party to the case, and the Hon. Charles Trefusis and others, ratepayers in the parish, were the second parties thereto.

The following questions were stated:—" (1) Whether the Parochial Board, having adopted a classification of lands and heritages, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, in terms of the 36th section of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Act, 1845, are entitled, without the concurrence of, and notwithstanding disapproval by, the said Board of Supervision, to abandon the classification so adopted, and to impose the assessment upon the owners and occupants of lands and heritages without any classifica-

No. 101. tion? 2. Whether the assessment imposed in terms of the said resolution of 3d August 1888 is legal, and can be enforced?"

Mar. 7, 1889. The first party contended "that the concurrence of the Board of Super-Bruce v. Rate- vision is not necessary to entitle the Parochial Board to abandon altopayers of For- gether classification of lands. By the 36th section of the Poor-Law down. Act of 1845 it is made lawful for the Parochial Board to classify lands with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision. The Board of Supervision, however, have no power to compel the Parochial Board to make a classification, and the Parochial Board may impose the assessment upon the owners and occupants of lands and heritages without any classification. That being so, it would require express enactment to prevent the Parochial Board abandoning a classification without any concurrence. The provisions of the Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 37) apply only to parishes which at the date of the Act were raising the funds requisite for the relief of the poor in the manner authorised in the 34th section of the Act of 1845, but repealed by the said Act of 1861."*

* By the 34th section of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Act of 1845 it is enacted "that when the parochial board of any parish or combination shall have resolved to raise by assessment the funds requisite, such board shall, either at the same meeting or at an adjournment thereof, or at a meeting to be called for the purpose, resolve as to the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed; and it shall be lawful for any such board to resolve that one half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, or to resolve that one half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, and the other half upon the whole inhabitants, according to their means and substance, other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland; or to resolve that such assessment shall be imposed as an equal percentage upon the annual value of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages situate in Great Britain or Ireland; and when the parochial board shall have resolved on the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed, such resolution shall be forthwith reported to the Board of Supervision for approval; and if the manner of assessment so resolved upon shall be approved by the Board of Supervision, the same shall be adopted and acted upon in such parish or combination, and shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the Board of Supervision; and if the Board of Supervision shall disapprove of the manner of assessment so resolved upon as aforesaid, the parochial board shall, upon such disapproval being intimated, forthwith meet and resolve upon another mode of imposing the assessment consistent with law, and shall report such resolution to the Board of Supervision; and the manner of imposing the assessment so resolved upon shall be adopted and acted upon in such parish or combination, and shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the Board of Supervision."

By the 36th section it is enacted,—“That where the one half of any assessment is imposed on the owners and the other half on the tenants or occupants of lands and heritages, it shall be lawful for the parochial board, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, to determine and direct that the lands and heritages may be distinguished into two or more separate classes, according to the purposes for which such lands are used and occupied, and to fix such rate of assessment upon the tenants or occupants of each class respectively as to such Boards may seem just and equitable.”

By the Poor Assessments Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 37), it is enacted, section 1,—“From and after the first day of January one thousand eight

The second parties contended "that on a sound construction of the No. 101. Acts referred to the Parochial Board were not entitled, without the concurrence or approval of the Board of Supervision, to discontinue, or alter, or depart from the existing mode of assessment, viz., one half on owners and the other half on tenants and occupiers, according to rental with classification; and that as the resolution of the Parochial Board altering the existing mode was submitted to the Board of Supervision and disapproved of, the assessments imposed in terms of the said resolution are illegal and cannot be enforced. If the existing classification were regarded by the Parochial Board as unsatisfactory or defective, their proper course was to have classified as new, and submitted the amended classification for the approval of the Board of Supervision."

Mar. 7, 1889.
Bruce v. Ratepayers of For-doun.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is here an anomaly, which is perhaps an inexpedient anomaly, namely, that in certain cases the classification of lands and heritages adopted by certain parishes is permanent in this sense, that it cannot be altered without the sanction of the Board of Supervision, while in other cases that Board is not entitled to interfere. But anomalies are often introduced by Acts of Parliament, they are sometimes expedient, and sometimes inexpedient, but if we find them necessarily resulting from an Act we must recognise them, and give effect to them.

hundred and sixty-two, so much of section 34 of the Act of the eighth and ninth years of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the Amendment and better administration of the Laws relating to the Relief of the Poor in Scotland,' as makes it lawful for any parochial board of any parish or combination of parishes in Scotland to raise one half of the funds requisite for the relief of the poor persons entitled to relief from the parish or combination by assessment upon the owners of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, and the other half upon the whole inhabitants according to their means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain and Ireland, or to raise such funds by assessment imposed as an equal percentage upon the annual value of lands and heritages within the parish or combination, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland, is hereby repealed: And every parochial board of any parish or combination of parishes now raising such funds in terms of the parts of the said recited Act which are hereby repealed as aforesaid, shall, before ceasing to raise such funds, and within two months after the passing of this Act, resolve to adopt the first mode of assessment specified in section 34 of recited Act, and to classify lands and heritages equitably in terms of the thirty-sixth section of the said recited Act, and shall forthwith report such resolution to the Board of Supervision, which is hereby authorised and required to determine whether or not the classification so resolved on is equitable; and in the event of their considering the classification thereby made as not equitable, to vary or alter the same as to them shall seem just; and until the said first mode of assessment so resolved on, with relative classification, shall have been approved of by the Board of Supervision, the assessment for relief of the poor in any parish where the classification may not be approved of shall continue to be raised according to the mode now in operation in such parish; and after the proposed classification in any parish shall have been approved of by the Board of Supervision, it shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the said Board: Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the parochial board of any parish or combination of parishes from collecting any such assessment actually imposed prior to the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two according to the mode legally in force in the parish or combination at the date when such assessments were imposed."

No. 101.

Mar. 7, 1889.
 Bruce v. Ratepayers of For-doun.

Now, in the original Poor-Law Act of 1845 it is provided by the 34th section that "When the parochial board shall have resolved on the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed, such resolution shall be forthwith reported to the Board of Supervision for approval; and if the manner of assessment so resolved upon shall be approved by the Board of Supervision, the same shall be adopted and acted upon in such parish or combination, and shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the Board of Supervision." Those are very plain and simple words. They occur in a long section, but in themselves they do not allow of two constructions. That provision is repeated in the 35th section, which deals with parishes in which the assessment has heretofore been imposed according to local Act or custom.

After those two sections comes a section (36) providing for the classification of lands and heritages where the first method of assessment mentioned in sec. 34 is adopted. It is there enacted that "it shall be lawful for the parochial board, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, to determine and direct that the lands and heritages may be distinguished into two or more separate classes, according to the purposes for which such lands are used and occupied, and to fix such rate of assessment upon the tenants or occupants of each class respectively as to such boards may seem just and equitable."

Now, it is not said there that when that classification has been once adopted it shall be permanent, or that it shall be incompetent for the parochial board to alter or depart from it altogether without the sanction of the Board of Supervision. The provision on that matter contained in secs. 34 and 35 is of set purpose omitted from sec. 36. Of course it might be contended that when a classification is once adopted it shall be permanent and unalterable. I should not, however, be inclined to adopt that reading, unless forced to do so by very clear words. I think that nothing would be more inexpedient than to do so. The condition of the lands in the parish may vary very much, and the number of houses, farms, and shops relatively to each other may vary in one direction or the other, and, therefore, it may become very expedient, and even necessary for justice, to vary a classification which has become unsuitable to the times. Now, if the classification is not to be permanent it is impossible to contend that the power to alter is vested in anyone, in the first instance, other than the parochial board; and if there is no provision for the sanction of the Board of Supervision being obtained, it necessarily follows that the discretion to alter is in the parochial board alone.

If that is clear under the original statute, how are we to import into that Act the provisions of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. c. 37, which are distinctly confined to a certain class of parishes and of parochial boards? The immediate object of that Act was to abolish all manner of assessment save one, namely, that of putting one half of the assessment on the owner and one half on the tenant of the land. From the passing of that Act there is no manner of assessment recognised except the one first set forth in sec. 34 of the Act of 1845; all other methods are repealed expressly.

The Act of 1861 says,—“And every parochial board of any parish or combination of parishes now raising such funds in terms of the parts of the said recited Act which are hereby repealed as aforesaid.” There is the nominative of the sentence, and what is said about it is “shall, before ceasing to raise such funds, and within two months after the passing of this Act, resolve to adopt the first mode of assessment specified in section thirty-four of recited Act, and to classify lands and heritages equitably in terms of the thirty-sixth section of the said recited Act, and shall forthwith report such resolution to the Board of Supervision, which is hereby authorised and required to determine whether or not the classification so resolved on is equitable." Now, that is the end of the first member of the clause, and it can hardly be maintained that, so far as we have gone, the enactment has any application except to those parishes which previously assessed on means and substance, or partly on means and substance and partly on land, and which are hereby ordered in all time coming to assess lands and heritages according to the first mode specified in section 34, and to accompany the mode by a classification in terms of sec. 36.

But then Mr Kennedy seems to think that the clause becomes more comprehensive as it goes on, and includes parishes which are not included in its earlier provisions. It would be very strange if that were found to be the case. The Act consists practically of only one clause, and if it had been intended to do what is maintained, surely the provision would have been found in a separate section. But I think that all the provisions of the Act are in one section, for the obvious reason that all the provisions of the section apply to the same subject, and that is the nominative to the first sentence which I have already pointed out. The section goes on, after the part I have read, in these terms:—"And in the event of their considering the classification thereby made as not equitable, to vary or alter the same as to them shall seem just; and until the said first mode of assessment so resolved on, with relative classification, shall have been approved of by the Board of Supervision, the assessment for relief of the poor in any parish where the classification may not be approved of shall continue to be raised according to the mode now in operation in such parish." That is to say, the parish will continue to levy according to means and substance, or according to means and substance and land until the provision for converting the mode of assessment into the one now prescribed as the regular legal mode has been carried through, and with it the classification. Can that sentence, then, be applicable to any parishes but those which have hitherto levied on means and substance, and are hereby forbidden 'to do so any longer? The section then goes on,—“And after the proposed classification in any parish shall have been approved of by the Board of Supervision, it shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the said Board.” Can it be said that in this last member of the sentence the whole subject of the statute is so extended as to apply to every parish in Scotland, whereas the whole of the earlier part of the sentence applies to a limited class of parishes? I think not, and that no benefit can be taken by the objecting ratepayers from this last enactment; and if we are thrown back on the original Act it seems to me, for the reasons I have already stated, that by the strongest implication, almost as strong as express words, the classification of lands once adopted by the parochial board with the sanction of the Board of Supervision must either be permanent (which I think is a hopeless contention), or must be alterable by the parochial board alone.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative.

WILLIAM B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—D. LISTER SHAND, W.S.—Agents.

No. 101.

Mar. 7, 1889.
Bruce v. Ratepayers of For-doun.

No. 102. REV. ROBERT MACPHERSON AND OTHERS (Anderson's Bursary Trustees),
First Parties.—Glegg.

Mar. 7, 1889.
Anderson's
Bursary
Trustees v.
Sutherland.

WILLIAM SUTHERLAND AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—R. L. Orr.

Succession—Charitable bequest—Uncertainty.—A testator bequeathed a sum to found bursaries for behoof of "residents in the parish of Alves, or in the parish and burgh of Elgin." The parish of Elgin extended beyond the burgh, and parts of the burgh were outside that parish. Held that the description included residents in any part of the parish or of the burgh.

2D DIVISION.
M.

WILLIAM ANDERSON, Elgin, died on 10th May 1884. By his trust-disposition and settlement he directed his trustees to pay "to the ministers of the Established and Free Churches of Scotland in the parish of Alves, the three Free Church ministers and senior Established Church minister in the parish of Elgin, and to Robert Young, solicitor, to be held by the said ministers and their respective successors in office, and by the said Robert Young and his nearest heir-male for the time, who shall be resident in the county of Elgin, in trust to invest the same and to pay the yearly interest thereof for bursaries to four young men at one of the universities in Scotland, the said four young men to be of good character and fair talents, either residents in the parish of Alves or in the parish and burgh of Elgin, whose parents are respectable and in narrow circumstances (residents in the parish of Alves to be preferred on equal terms)." The bursars were to be selected by the trustees in such way as they might consider best.

As the parish of Elgin extended beyond the burgh, and as parts of the burgh were in the parishes of New Spynie and St Andrew's, a difficulty arose as to the meaning of the words "in the parish and burgh of Elgin."

A special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court on the questions,—"(1) Must the persons entitled to the benefits of the bequests . . . be residents in that part of the parish of Elgin which is also in the burgh of Elgin? or (2) Are the terms of the bequest to be construed so as to include residents in any part of the parish of Elgin, and also residents in any part of the burgh of Elgin?"

The first parties were the Rev. Robert Macpherson and others, the trustees of the bursary fund. The second parties were William Sutherland and James M. Anderson, two intending candidates for the bursaries, the former of whom resided in the landward part of the parish of Elgin, and the other in that part of the burgh of Elgin which lay in the parish of New Spynie.

The case stated :—"The landward part of the parish of Elgin, which is of large extent and populous, is without the burgh, and, on the other hand, the burgh of Elgin extends in certain directions beyond the parish of Elgin into the adjoining parishes of New Spynie and St Andrew's. The parish is eleven miles or thereby in length by an average breadth of about three and one-half miles. At the date of the will, the population of the burgh within the parish was returned at 8600; of the burgh outwith the parish, about 1100; and of the parish outwith the burgh, about 1260. There are in the parish of Elgin in all three Free Churches and ministers, two in the burgh of Elgin, and the third in the landward part of the parish at Pluscarden, six miles or thereby distant from the burgh."

The second parties referred to Bogie's Trustees v. Swanson,<sup>1</sup> where the Court sustained the claim of the "Mars" Training Ship to share in a bequest "to the Ragged Schools in Dundee," though the ship was moored in the Tay, near the Fifeshire side, and beyond the parish and burgh of Dundee. They maintained that the intention of the testator was to benefit the whole burgh and the whole parish of Elgin. The nomination of the Free Church minister at Pluscarden as a trustee shewed the testator's intention to extend the benefit beyond the burgh. No. 102.

<sup>1</sup> Bogie's Trustees v. Swanson, Feb. 5, 1878, 4 R. 634.

Mar. 7, 1889.
Anderson's Bursary
Trustees v.
Sutherland.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The expressions of this will are ambiguous. The bursars are to be “residents in the parish of Alves or in the parish and burgh of Elgin.” Giving the words a fair construction, I arrive at the conclusion that the contention of the second parties should receive effect. The first area to be benefited is the parish of Alves and the next area is, I think, a parish also, the parish of Elgin. It is difficult to see why the testator should have favoured the parish of Alves, and then limited his gift in naming the next area to that part of the parish of Elgin which is within the burgh. I think the testator's idea was to benefit both parishes and the burgh, thereby extending the benefit to persons residing in parts of the burgh beyond the limits of the parish of Elgin.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. There is nothing to induce us to think that the testator intended to confine his bounty to residents in that part of the burgh of Elgin which is within the parish of Elgin, that is, to favour only a part of the town of Elgin. I reject that construction of his words. I think the other view is more consistent with his intention as expressed where he describes the objects of his bounty as “residents in the parish” of Elgin, which will include the whole parish and that part of the burgh which is in the parish, and residents “in the burgh of Elgin.” I think your Lordship's view is not only in harmony with the testator's intention, but in accordance with a strict construction of the words.

LORD LEE concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative, and found and declared accordingly.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S., Agents.

THOMAS STURROCK (Clerk to Commissioners of Police of Dalkeith), Pursuer (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—M' Neill.

DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, Defender (Appellant).—*R. Johnstone—
C. K. Mackenzie.*

No. 103.

Mar. 8, 1889.
Commissioners of Police of Dal-
keith v. Duke
of Buccleuch.

Police—Street—Burgh Footway—Maintenance—Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 149.—The Police and Improvement Act, 1862, enacts by sec. 149,—“The owners of all lands or premises fronting or abutting on any street shall at their own expense when required by the commissioners cause footways before their property respectively on the sides of such street to be made, and to be well and sufficiently paved . . . and shall thereafter, from time to time, as occasion may require, repair and uphold such footways; provided always that where the lands or premises of any owner front or abut on any street for a continuous length exceeding one hundred yards, and such lands are unfeued or unbuilt on, it shall not be lawful to the commissioners to require such owner to construct such footway, but the commissioners may themselves cause such footway to be constructed in so far as they think proper, and shall be entitled forthwith to recover from such owner one-third of the expense thereof, and the remaining two-thirds thereof whenever the lands fronting or abutting on the footway so constructed by them are actually feued or built upon, or laid out or used as a garden or pleasure ground, or pertinent of a house.”

No. 103.

Mar. 8, 1889.
Commissioners of Police of Dal-
keith v. Duke
of Buccleuch.

These are the material facts. The question in the case does not regard any of them. It is the question of law whether on these facts the Duke is liable to pay the whole expense of the repairs, or is exempt from liability for them, or is bound to make payment in respect of them, but only to the extent of one-third. We heard argument in support of each of these views, and no other view was urged upon us. Now, the first part of section 149 relates to the construction by owners of footpaths fronting their properties, and the repairing and upholding them when formed. The second part of the section is a proviso confined to a case in "which it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners of Police" to require the owner to construct the footway. It is thus expressed,—“Provided always, that where the lands or premises of any owner front or abut on any street for a continuous length exceeding 100 yards, and such lands or premises are unfeued or unbuilt on, it shall not be lawful to the commissioners to require such owner to construct such footway, but the commissioners may themselves cause such footway to be constructed in so far as they think proper, and shall be entitled forthwith to recover from such owner one-third of the expense thereof, and the remaining two-thirds thereof whenever the lands fronting or abutting on the footway so constructed by them are actually feued or built upon, or laid out or used as a garden or pleasure ground or pertinent of a house.”

Now, I think there is no room for ambiguity there. Where it is lawful for the Commissioners to require the owner to construct a footway in front of his property he must at his own expense construct and maintain it. That is the first part of the clause. But the second part limits the power of the Commissioners to require owners to construct footways in cases contemplated by it. Where the owner's lands front the street for more than 100 yards, and are unfeued and unbuilt on, then it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners to require the owner to construct the footway. Now, the operation of this upon the first part of the clause is manifest. The Commissioners have unlimited power to oblige the owner to uphold the footway where it is lawful to require him to construct it, but that does not apply where, under the second part of the clause, it, “shall not be lawful” for them to force him to construct the footway. Now, according to the findings in fact which I have read, the lands here in question are within the provisions of the second branch of the section. It is “not lawful” for the Commissioners to oblige the Duke to construct the footway opposite to them. But under the section it was lawful for them if they saw fit to construct it themselves, and “forthwith” to recover from such owner “one-third of the expense thereof, and the remaining two-thirds thereof whenever the lands fronting or abutting on the footway so constructed by them are actually feued or built upon, or laid out and used as a garden or pleasure ground or pertinent of a house.” The Commissioners constructed the footpath. They were therefore entitled to recover one-third of the expense of construction. The question, however, is what liability the Duke is under, if any, for the repair of what it was “not lawful” to call upon him to construct? In the second part of the section, unlike the first, there is no provision as to the expense of repairs. But the footpath must be upheld, and there are only two persons—the Duke and the Commissioners—to do it, whether one of them is to do it alone or whether they are to do it between them. The Act says nothing on the subject. Yet a rule must be extracted from it under which the footpaths are to be upheld. I think the fair and reasonable view, and that which must be imputed to the Legislature, is that the cost of upholding the footways should be divided in the same propor-

Police: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the petition, and decerns: Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process." * No. 103.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The only obligation upon him was to pay one-third of the expense of making any footway which the Commissioners should resolve to construct, and this had been paid. Had the Commissioners been in a position to require him to construct a footway, he would doubtless have been obliged to maintain it when constructed, but they were not in that position, for his lands were unbuilt on. Therefore the second part of sec. 149 applied to the case, and that part contained no obligation on owners to maintain footpaths which the Commissioners constructed. The explanation was that the Act contemplated it to be reasonable that those who used streets should bear the cost of the repairs. But so long as the owner's land was unfeued and unbuilt on the footpath could not be required for his use, but for that of the community only. The defender was willing, however, to bear one-third of the expense of maintenance. In no view could he be made to bear more.

Argued for the pursuers;—The Act laid the obligation to maintain upon owners. Owners had both to construct and maintain in some cases, which were dealt with in the first part of the section. In others, dealt with by the second part, they had an exemption from bearing at first the whole cost of construction, but that exemption did not extend to any part of the expense of maintenance.<sup>1</sup> Otherwise the Act did not impose the expense upon anyone.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The question in this case relates to the liability of the Duke of Buccleuch to repair and uphold certain footways constructed in 1882 by the Police Commissioners of Dalkeith in front of certain property of the Duke in Dalkeith. The answer to it depends on the proper construction of section 149 of the General Police Act, 1862. The Sheriff has found in fact "that the lands or premises of the defender front or abut on the east side of Buccleuch Street, the south side of Eskbank Road, and the east side of New Edinburgh Road for a continuous length exceeding 100 yards, and are unfeued and unbuilt on," and though some observations adverse to that finding were made at the debate the parties ultimately were agreed that it is right. The next material finding is that the work executed "did not consist of constructing new footways, but in repairing those that had already been formed," and the next that "the cost of making the said repairs amounted to £72, 12s. 3d., the sum now sued for."

* "NOTE.— . . . The defender maintained that the 149th section of the Act did not impose upon him the burden of repairing footways which had been formed on roads or streets along which his lands fronted or abutted for a continuous length exceeding 100 yards.

"It is clear that under the first part of this section the owners of lands or premises fronting a street for less than 100 yards are bound not only to construct footways but to keep them in repair and uphold them. The second part of the section relieves the owners of lands which front or abut for a continuous length of more than 100 yards of two-thirds of the expense of the construction of the footways, at least until the lands are feued or built on. It is true that this part of the clause says nothing as to the persons who are to keep these footways in repair after they are constructed. The Sheriff, however, although not without hesitation, has come to be of opinion that the defender is bound to keep them in repair, or, if they are repaired by the Commissioners, to repay them the expense of doing so."

<sup>1</sup> Police Commissioners of Old Aberdeen v. Leslie, March 18, 1884, 11 R. 733.

No. 103. These are the material facts. The question in the case does not regard any of them. It is the question of law whether on these facts the Duke is liable to pay the whole expense of the repairs, or is exempt from liability for them, or is bound to make payment in respect of them, but only to the extent of one-third. We heard argument in support of each of these views, and no other view was urged upon us. Now, the first part of section 149 relates to the construction by owners of footpaths fronting their properties, and the repairing and upholding them when formed. The second part of the section is a proviso confined to a case in "which it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners of Police" to require the owner to construct the footway. It is thus expressed,—“Provided always, that where the lands or premises of any owner front or abut on any street for a continuous length exceeding 100 yards, and such lands or premises are unfenced or unbuilt on, it shall not be lawful to the commissioners to require such owner to construct such footway, but the commissioners may themselves cause such footway to be constructed in so far as they think proper, and shall be entitled forthwith to recover from such owner one-third of the expense thereof, and the remaining two-thirds thereof whenever the lands fronting or abutting on the footway so constructed by them are actually fenced or built upon, or laid out or used as a garden or pleasure ground or pertinent of a house.”

Now, I think there is no room for ambiguity there. Where it is lawful for the Commissioners to require the owner to construct a footway in front of his property he must at his own expense construct and maintain it. That is the first part of the clause. But the second part limits the power of the Commissioners to require owners to construct footways in cases contemplated by it. Where the owner's lands front the street for more than 100 yards, and are unfenced and unbuilt on, then it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners to require the owner to construct the footway. Now, the operation of this upon the first part of the clause is manifest. The Commissioners have unlimited power to oblige the owner to uphold the footway where it is lawful to require him to construct it, but that does not apply where, under the second part of the clause, it, “shall not be lawful” for them to force him to construct the footway. Now, according to the findings in fact which I have read, the lands here in question are within the provisions of the second branch of the section. It is “not lawful” for the Commissioners to oblige the Duke to construct the footway opposite to them. But under the section it was lawful for them if they saw fit to construct it themselves, and “forthwith” to recover from such owner “one-third of the expense thereof, and the remaining two-thirds thereof whenever the lands fronting or abutting on the footway so constructed by them are actually fenced or built upon, or laid out and used as a garden or pleasure ground or pertinent of a house.” The Commissioners constructed the footpath. They were therefore entitled to recover one-third of the expense of construction. The question, however, is what liability the Duke is under, if any, for the repair of what it was “not lawful” to call upon him to construct? In the second part of the section, unlike the first, there is no provision as to the expense of repairs. But the footpath must be upheld, and there are only two persons—the Duke and the Commissioners—to do it, whether one of them is to do it alone or whether they are to do it between them. The Act says nothing on the subject. Yet a rule must be extracted from it under which the footpaths are to be upheld. I think the fair and reasonable view, and that which must be imputed to the Legislature, is that the cost of upholding the footways should be divided in the same propor-

Mar. 8, 1889.
Commissioners of Police of Dal-
keith v. Duke
of Buccleuch.

tion as the cost of constructing them. There seems to be good reason for that, No. 103.
 and no reason to the contrary. The two alternatives to that course are, first, Mar. 8, 1889.
 that the Commissioners shall pay two-thirds of the cost of construction and all Commissioners of sioners of Dal-keith v. Duke
 the cost of upholding. I think that alternative is not reasonable, and I reject of Buccleuch.
 it. The other alternative is that the owner shall pay the whole expense of upholding. An argument worthy of consideration presented in favour of that alternative is that the first part of the section lays on the owner the whole cost of upholding as well as that of constructing, and that while the second part relieves him to a certain extent of the cost of construction it does not relieve him at all of the cost of maintenance, but says nothing upon that subject.
 That view does not commend itself to my mind. I think that, taking the first part of the section in connection with the second, the obligation to bear the whole expense of upholding is imposed only with respect to footways which it is lawful for the Commissioners to compel owners to construct.
 The owners are in that case to repair and uphold "such" footways. I should not be disposed to adopt the view that owners are also liable to uphold footways which it is not lawful for the Commissioners to compel them to construct, even if it were more plausible than I think it is. I should rather, if that were necessary, be ingenious to avoid it, for the reason and equity of the matter are that the cost of constructing and upholding shall be divided between the parties according to the same rule.

I am of opinion that the defender is liable in one-third of the expense of repairs, but no further.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I incline to the opinion that the Sheriff is right.
 I think that the meaning of section 149 is that the Police Commissioners are entitled to require footways to be constructed in front of all properties within their jurisdiction at the expense of the owners, and that when these are constructed the cost of maintaining them is laid on the owner. In certain circumstances indeed, which occur here, the obligation to construct is not laid on the owner, but the footways may be constructed by the Commissioners themselves, and they are entitled to recover from the owner one-third of the expense of construction forthwith, and the remainder when his lands are feued or built upon.
 But I think that when the footway is constructed the obligation of upholding it rests with the owner. As I read the section, the obligation to uphold is without exception; the only exceptional case is that in which the owner is not obliged to construct the footway, but the Commissioners may do so.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had some difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the interpretation of the clause which rules this case. I confess my first leaning was to the third of the three views to which Lord Young has alluded, and which has not been adopted either by his Lordship or by Lord Rutherford Clark. My impression was that the obligation on owners to maintain footways depended on whether they were "such" footways as the Commissioners are entitled to require owners to construct as provided by the first part of the section. Where land is unfeued and unbuilt upon for a length of 100 yards the Commissioners are not entitled to require the proprietor to construct any part of the footway. It is only after they have done it themselves that they can exact one-third of the expense from the proprietor. It seemed to me therefore difficult to read the words "such footpaths"—which refer back to foot-

No. 103.

Mar. 8, 1889.
Commissioners of Police of Dal-
keith v. Duke
of Buccleuch.

paths which the Commissioners can require the proprietor to construct—as applying to footpaths as to which the Commissioners have no such power. But after further consideration I have come to the opinion that the result at which Lord Young has arrived is not only reasonable in itself, but is consistent with the terms of the section, that the measure of the obligation of maintenance is to be found in the extent of the obligation to pay the cost of construction. As the cost of construction is laid upon the owner, so also, and to the same extent only, is the cost of upholding laid upon him. The defender here is liable in one-third of the expense of construction, and I think it is a fair reading of the statute that he is liable in one-third only of the expense of maintenance.

LORD LEE concurred with the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact (1) that the lands of the defender referred to in the record front or abut on the east side of Buccleuch Street, the south side of Eskbank Road, and the east side of New Edinburgh Road for a continuous length of 100 yards, and are unfeued and unbuilt upon; (2) that the work in respect of which the sum sued for is claimed by the Commissioners of Police was executed not in making new, but in repairing existing footpaths ex adverso of the said lands: Find in law that in terms of the second branch of the 149th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, the defender is liable for one-third of the cost of upholding the said footpaths, and no further, as long as the ground opposite to said footpath remains unfeued and unbuilt upon: Therefore recall the judgments of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £24, 4s. 1d. sterling, being one-third part of the sum sued for: Find no expenses due by either party to the other, and decern."

THOMAS STURROCK, S.S.C.—GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 104.

Mar. 8, 1889.
Stewart v.
Highland
Railway Co.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, BART., Pursuer (Respondent).—

Sol.-Gen. Darling—Dundas.

THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—

D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Railway—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. cap. 19), sec. 120—"Superfluous lands."—A piece of ground, acquired by a railway company under compulsory powers, had not been used by the company for more than ten years after the completion of their works, and had not been sold by them. It could not be utilised by the company unless they could take additional land from the adjoining proprietor, which was beyond their statutory powers. Held that the ground was superfluous land within the meaning of the 120th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
M.

In April 1888 Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, Baronet, of Grantully, Murtly, and others, raised an action against the Highland Railway Company, concluding for declarator that certain land in the county of Perth which had belonged to the pursuer's author, and had been acquired in 1856 by the Perth and Dunkeld Railway Company (now represented by the defenders) under the compulsory powers of their Act, had become superfluous lands in the sense of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845,* and so had vested in him as the owner of the adjoining lands.

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 19),

The land in question, which was a little more than an acre in extent, was separated from the defenders' line of railway (which was a single line) by the public road. It had been used in the construction of the line as a spoil bank, but after the line had been made, more than ten years before the date of the action, it had been applied to no use by the defenders, and they had not sold it. They stated, however, that "the said lands are in a position which may necessitate their use by the defenders, and have not become superfluous lands. In fact the defenders anticipate that the said lands will in the near future be required for the purposes of their undertaking. They expect shortly, inter alia, to lay down a double line of rails between Blair-Athole and Stanley, and for this purpose the possession of the said piece of land will be essential. The land has not been let, nor has it been a source of profit to the defenders, but it has been retained by them solely because they saw that it would be ultimately required for the purposes of the railway." They, however, admitted that for this purpose they would require to obtain parliamentary powers, both to divert the public road and to acquire more ground compulsorily from the pursuer.

No. 104.
Mar. 8, 1889.
Stewart v.
Highland
Railway Co.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The land described in the summons not having been required or used by the defenders or their predecessors for the purposes of their undertaking, and having thus become superfluous land within the meaning of the 120th section of the said Act, the pursuer, as proprietor of the adjoining lands, is entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (2) No relevant defence having been stated, the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The land being required by the defenders for the purposes of their undertaking, and having on that account been retained by them, is not superfluous land within the meaning of the statute. (2) The said land not being superfluous land within the meaning of the statute, the defenders should be assolizied, with expenses.

On 27th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

provides,—“With respect to lands acquired by the promoters of the undertaking, under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, but which shall not be required for the purposes thereof, be it enacted as follows: . . .” Section 120.—“Within the prescribed period, or if no period be prescribed, within ten years after the expiration of the time limited by the special Act for the completion of the works, the promoters of the undertaking shall absolutely sell and dispose of all such superfluous lands in such manner as they may deem most advantageous, and apply the purchase-money arising from such sales to the purposes of the special Act, and in default thereof all such superfluous lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same.”

* “NOTE.—The principle upon which it is to be determined whether land is superfluous in the sense of the Lands Clauses Act has been laid down by the House of Lords, in the Great Western Railway Company v. May, L. R., 7 Eng. and Irish App. 283, and according to that judgment, the question to be considered is, whether, at the expiration of the statutory period of ten years, the land is required for the purposes of the undertaking? The piece of ground in dispute is separated from the existing line of rails by a public road; and it was stated at the bar that it was originally acquired and used by the promoters of the undertaking as a spoil bank, a temporary purpose which has come to an end. But the defenders allege that they have all along anticipated that, in the natural development of their traffic, it would be required for a more permanent purpose

No. 104.
 Mar. 8, 1889.
 Stewart v.
 Highland
 Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question turned upon the meaning of the word "undertaking." By the term "undertaking" was meant the whole scheme which the company had in view; it was not restricted to the powers actually conferred by the company's Acts, if the purposes were such as were fairly in view of the promoters, although they might have thought it unnecessary to ask for parliamentary powers until they actually came to carry out the whole scheme as originally contemplated.<sup>1</sup> That was the state of matters here, for the doubling of the line had from the first been in the view of the company so soon as the traffic should demand it. The mere doubling of the line they could carry out without additional powers, but they admitted that they could not divert the road without such powers, or at least without arrangement with the road trustees, or acquire more ground compulsorily. The case was distinguishable from that of May,<sup>2</sup> relied on by the Lord Ordinary, where the undertaking was in every sense complete. The onus was on the pursuer, who had already been paid for the ground which he sought to reacquire for nothing,<sup>3</sup> and he had failed to discharge it.

Argued for the pursuer;—The purposes of the defenders' undertaking were defined by parliamentary powers, and the doubling of this line was not within those powers.<sup>2</sup> It might be that if they had specifically averred that they were going within a definite period to use the land, of their undertaking which they expect shortly to carry out, viz., the construction of a double line of rails between Stanley and Blair-Athole, because, in the event of their doubling the line as they propose, the ground will be required both for the purpose of diverting the public road above mentioned, and also for its former purpose as a spoil bank. It may be doubtful whether the latter purpose is sufficient to satisfy the conditions of the Act of Parliament. But if there was a reasonable prospect at the end of the ten years that the ground would be required for diverting the road in order to lay down a double line of rails, that would appear to me to be a purpose for which the company were entitled to retain it, provided that the construction of such a line were within the scope of the undertaking authorised by their Acts of Parliament. The defenders admit that, in order to construct a double line, they must obtain land from the pursuer, which they have no means of acquiring otherwise than by agreement with him; or, in other words, that the purpose for which they desire to retain the land is one which they have no power under the existing Acts to carry into effect. But a purpose which they cannot execute in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them by their Acts of Parliament cannot be within the scope of the undertaking sanctioned by those Acts.

---

"It is said that according to the judgment of the House of Lords in Hooper v. Bourne, L. R., 5 App. Cases, the burden of proving a title to the land as superfluous lies upon the claimant. But in the admitted circumstances of this case, it appears to me that the burden has been discharged. It is admitted that the land has never been used except for a temporary purpose, which ceased with the construction of the railway, and that the only purpose for which the company desire to retain it is one which they cannot execute without the pursuer's consent. But works which cannot be executed under the powers conferred upon the undertakers by their Acts are not part of the statutory undertaking. It follows that the purpose for which the land is required by the defenders is not a purpose of the undertaking; and that is sufficient to satisfy the definition of superfluous land."

<sup>1</sup> Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, L. R., 2 Chanc. App. 201.

<sup>2</sup> Great Western Railway Company v. May, L. R., 8 and Ir. Ap. 283.

<sup>3</sup> Betts v. Great Eastern Railway Company, L. R., 8 Exch. 294, 3 Exch. Div. 182, H. L., 49 L. J. Exch. 197; Hooper v. Bourne, L. R., 5 App. Cas. 1; North British Railway v. Moon's Trustees, Feb. 8, 1879, 6 R. 640.

or even to obtain powers from Parliament to do so, that would be a relevant defence,<sup>1</sup> but their defence did not come up to that. No. 104.

At advising,—

Mar. 8, 1889.
Stewart v.
Highland
Railway Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case concludes for declarator, “that the portion of land . . . which was acquired by the predecessors of the defenders from the predecessor of the pursuer for the purposes of their undertaking, not having been required or used by the defenders or their predecessors for said purposes prior to the date of citation, . . . has become superfluous land within the meaning of the 120th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.” The defence set up by the defenders is, that there is a reasonable probability of their requiring the land in question for the purposes of their undertaking. There is no doubt that if that were made out it would be a good answer to this declarator. But the position of the ground is that the only use that has ever been made of it has been as a spoil bank in the construction of the line. It has never been used in any other way. It is not in immediate contiguity to the line of railway, but is separated from it by the public road. It is moreover not disputed by the Highland Railway Company that they are unable to make use of this piece of land unless they obtain additional powers and acquire additional land. In that state of the facts I think the proper view to be taken is that the land, not having been used for thirty years, and not being capable of being used without new powers, and not having been disposed of to others, does fall under the provisions of the Act, 1845. The defenders say that they propose to double their line at this place, and that to do so they will require the ground, not for their line, but for the purpose of diverting the public road; but that, again, is an end which they cannot accomplish without getting fresh powers from Parliament. Even if they did obtain those powers, it is not disputed that they could not accomplish their object without taking additional land from the proprietor, who now wishes to have it declared that this portion of land has reverted to him, and from whom they could not acquire the ground except compulsorily.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to the declarator sought.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN SIM, Pursuer (Respondent).
SCOTTISH NATIONAL HERITABLE PROPERTY COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray.

No. 105.

Mar. 12, 1889.
Sim v. Scottish National Heritable Property
Co., Limited.

Expenses—Auditor's report—Fees to counsel.—Held that when no fee has been sent to counsel for a particular piece of business in a cause, it may be sent and made a charge against the opposite party after the party who instructed the counsel has been found entitled to expenses.

<sup>1</sup> Caledonian Railway Co. v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co., July 2, 1869, 7 R. 956; Queen v. Wycombe Railway Co., Jan. 26, 1867, L. R., 2 Q. B. 310; Tiverton and North Devon Railway Co. v. Loosemore, March 25, 1884, L. R., 9 App. Cas. 480.

No. 105. IN an action at the instance of John Sim against the Scottish National Heritable Property Company, Limited, the defenders were successful, and were found entitled to expenses.

Mar. 12, 1889. When their account of expenses came to be taxed by the Auditor, it appeared that fees had been sent to counsel in the earlier stages of the case, viz., for the closing of the record and for a discussion on issues, but 1ST DIVISION. that no fee was sent to junior counsel for attending at the proof.

Lord Fraser. The defenders proposed to charge a fee to junior counsel for attending at that stage of the case.

M.

The Auditor reported the point to the Court.

Counsel for the defenders moved that the proposed fee should be allowed. Under the general regulations applicable to the table of fees of 1876 the rule was, that "a party shall not upon any account be allowed to pay or state higher or additional fees to counsel after he has been found entitled to expenses than were actually paid at the time." Here no fee had been sent for the proof, and the defenders were therefore not proposing to augment the amount of a fee sent at the time, or to send an "additional fee." The fee ought to be allowed on the rule laid down in former decisions<sup>1</sup>—that where fees had not been sent at all during the progress of the case they might, notwithstanding, be charged afterwards.

The pursuer was not represented.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This provision of the Act of Sederunt, Dec. 19, 1835, or of the Regulations of the Table of Fees of 1876, has been several times before the Court, and of course we cannot now go back on the cases which have been cited to us. It is, however, I think, quite in accordance with those cases to hold that when no fee has been sent for a particular piece of business in a case, it may be sent and charged for afterwards, when the party has been successful. Any fee sent at the time must be supposed to be adequate, and the winning party is not entitled to augment it afterwards at the expense of his opponent. The distinction between this case and that must regulate our decision here. Here, at the proof, no fees were sent to junior counsel, and therefore the winning party does not propose to send a higher fee, or an additional fee—that is, to add in amount to a fee sent. On that ground (which is the same as we went on in the case of Batchelor and Young) I think this fee ought to be allowed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT allowed the fee in question.

WILLIAM FRASER, S.S.C.—R. AINSLIE BROWN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 106. CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—R. Johnstone.

Mar. 14, 1889. ALEXANDER CROSS & SONS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Asher—Ure.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Cross & Sons. Railway—Undue preference—Defence to action for carriage of goods—Railway Commissioners—Transference of action—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33), sec. 83—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854

<sup>1</sup> Tough's Trustees v. Dumbarton Water Commissioners, May 14, 1874, 1 R. 879; Batchelor v. Pattison, July 15, 1876, 3 R. 1086; Young v. Johnson & Wright, May 19, 1880, 7 R. 760.

(17 and 18 Vict. c. 31), secs. 2 and 3—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 No. 106. and 37 Vict. c. 48), sec. 6—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Mar. 14, 1889. Vict. c. 25), secs. 12 and 58.—In 1888 a railway company sued a firm for sums due in respect of the carriage of their goods over the company's line. The Caledonian Railway Co. v. Cross & Sons. defenders pleaded that the rates sued for were illegal, and averred in their defences, as originally lodged, that the company had conceded to other traders mileage rates for the carriage of their goods "which they refused to concede to the defenders, . . . although the goods are of the same description." Subsequently they added an averment that the company had charged them with higher rates than other traders for the carriage of the same class of goods over precisely the same journey. The Lord Ordinary allowed the defenders a proof of their averments as amended, but disallowed a proof of their original averment, on the ground that the preference therein set forth was only struck at by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854, and that (on the authority of Murray v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 11 R. 205) the defence founded on that Act was irrelevant, as interdict was the only remedy provided by that statute. The defenders reclaimed, and moved the Court to transfer the cause to the Railway Commissioners, under sec. 58 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, which came into operation on 1st January 1889. The Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but further, refused to transfer the cause to the Commissioners, on the ground that the defence under the Act of 1854 would (on the authority of Murray's case) be as irrelevant before the Railway Commissioners as it was in the Court of Session, and that, therefore, the defenders could not take any benefit by the transference.*

* The following sections of the various Railway Acts were referred to in the case:—

Sec. 83 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, provides,—“And whereas it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly either in the hands of the company or of particular parties: It shall be lawful, therefore, for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein, and in the special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway as they shall think fit: Provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton per mile or otherwise, in respect of all passengers and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the same line of railway under the same circumstances, and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made either directly or indirectly in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway.”

Sec. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Regulation Act, 1854, provides that no railway company “shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever,” &c.

Sec. 3 of that Act provides,—“It shall be lawful for any company or person complaining against any such companies or company of anything done or of any omission made in violation or contravention of this Act to apply in a summary way by motion or summons . . . in Scotland to the Court of Session in Scotland . . . or to any judge of any such Court, . . . and if it be made to appear to such Court or such Judge on such hearing . . . that anything has been done or omission made in violation or contravention of this Act, it shall be lawful for such Court or Judge to issue a writ of injunction or

No. 106.

Mar. 14, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Cross & Sons.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
C.

IN May 1888 the Caledonian Railway Company raised an action in the Court of Session against Alexander Cross & Sons, seed merchants and manure manufacturers, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £1635, 17s. 11d., being the amount of accounts incurred (after deduction of certain sums paid to account), by the defenders to the pursuers for carriage of goods.

The pursuers in cond. 2 stated the amount of the account.

The defenders answered;—(Ans. 2) “The account is referred to. Admitted that the defenders paid to account £1660, 11s. 4d. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the defenders conduct a large business in the manufacture and sale of chemical manures, which contain from ten per cent to fifty per cent of sulphate of ammonia. The value of these manures is from £2 to £7 per ton. The value of sulphate of ammonia is £12 per ton. Nevertheless the pursuers have conceded to various oil companies, and amongst others to Young’s Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company, Limited, mileage rates for the carriage of sulphate of ammonia which they refuse to concede to the defenders for the carriage of their chemical manures, although the goods are of the same description. The rates charged to the defenders are very much higher than the mileage rates charged to the interdict restraining such company or companies from further continuing such violation or contravention of this Act, and enjoining obedience to the same: And in case of disobedience of any such writ of injunction or interdict it shall be lawful for such Court or Judge to order that a writ or writs of attachment or any other process of such Court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or interdict shall issue . . . and such Court or Judge may also, if they or he shall think fit, make an order directing the payment by any one or more of such companies of such sum of money as such Court or Judge shall determine, not exceeding for each company the sum of £200 for every day after a day to be named in the order that such company or companies shall fail to obey such injunction or interdict.”

Sec. 6 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1873, provides,—“Any person complaining of anything done . . . in contravention of sec. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 . . . may apply to the Commissioners . . . and they shall have and may exercise all the jurisdiction conferred by sec. 3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, on the several Courts and Judges empowered to hear and determine complaints under that Act, and may make orders of like nature with the writs and orders authorised to be issued and made by the said Courts and Judges, and the said Courts and Judges shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any decision or order of the Commissioners, cease to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them by that section.”

Sec. 12 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, provides,—“Where the Commissioners (appointed by secs. 2-7 of the Act), have jurisdiction to hear and determine any matter, they may, in addition to or in substitution of any other relief, award to any complaining party who is aggrieved such damages as they shall find him to have sustained; and such award of damages shall be in complete satisfaction of any claim for damages, including repayment of overcharges which, but for this Act, such party would have had by reason of the matter of complaint.”

Sec. 56 enacts that the Act shall come into operation on 1st January 1889.

Sec. 58 provides,—“Every action or proceeding which might have been brought before the Railway Commissioners if this Act had been in force at the time when such action or proceeding was begun, and is at the commencement of this Act pending before any superior Court, may, upon the application of either party, be transferred by any Judge of such superior Court to the Railway and Canal Commissioners under this Act, and may thereupon be continued and concluded in all respects as if such action or proceeding had been originally instituted before that commission, provided that no such transfer, nor anything herein contained, shall vary or affect the rights or liabilities of any party to such action or proceeding.”

said oil companies.* The pursuers carry goods for the said oil companies and other traders between the following Glasgow stations, viz., Port-Dundas, Stobcross, Buchanan Street, Sighthill, and London Road on the one hand, and the following stations on the other hand, viz., Auchterarder, Bridge of Allan, Brechin, Coatbridge, Cumbernauld, Crieff, Stirling, Balerno, Edinburgh, Midcalders, Biggar, and Lanark. The pursuers carry goods for the defenders between the same stations. For carriage of the same description of goods the pursuers have, in the account sued for, charged to the defenders between these stations, or some of them, higher rates than they have charged to the said oil companies and other traders. In like manner, the pursuers have in the account sued for charged higher rates to the defenders than to the said oil companies and other traders as regards carriage of goods between the following Glasgow stations, viz., Eglinton Street and General Terminus on the one hand, and Bishopton, Port-Glasgow, Kilmarnock, and Stewarton on the other hand."

No. 106.

Mar. 14, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Cross & Sons.

The pursuers, in reference to that answer, averred;—"The statements contained in the answer are denied. With reference to the statement added to the record as an amendment, it is explained and averred that the whole of the defenders' goods of the kind mentioned by them are carried to and from their works, near Port-Dundas, and to and from Port-Dundas station of the pursuers' railway, and that no such goods are carried for the defenders between any of the stations mentioned in the amendment, and no charges for the carriage of such goods between these stations are included in the accounts libelled."

The defenders further averred;—(Ans. 3) "Explained that the rates charged by the pursuers in the said accounts are in excess of the charges made to the said oil companies and other traders, and constitute an illegal and unjustifiable preference against the defenders in favour of the said oil companies and other traders. The pursuers have conferred an undue and illegal preference in favour of the said oil companies and other traders, and an undue and illegal prejudice to the defenders, in respect that they have charged a mileage rate to the said oil companies and other traders, and have refused to concede the same to the defenders, although the class of goods conveyed was in both cases of the same description. If the mileage rates charged by the pursuers to the said oil companies and other traders be applied to the said accounts, then the payments already made by the defenders are sufficient to discharge the same. The defenders refer to the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, and particularly section 83 thereof, the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and particularly section 2 thereof, and to the other statutes applicable to railway rates. The defenders refer also to the private Acts of Parliament applicable to the pursuers' company."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having carried the goods referred to, and the sum sued for being the balance due and resting owing to them in respect of said carriage, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defence stated is irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The rates charged by the pursuers in the accounts sued on being such as to constitute an undue and illegal preference in favour of other traders, and to the prejudice of the defenders, are not recoverable. (2) The pursuers having given an undue and unreasonable preference to other traders, and having subjected the defenders to an undue and illegal disadvantage by charging the rates in the accounts sued on, are not entitled to decree as libelled.

* The following averments to the end of the paragraph were added subsequently to the original closing of the record.

No. 106. On 21st January 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the defenders a proof of their averment that the pursuers have charged lower rates to other traders than the rates charged by the defenders for goods of the same description conveyed or propelled by carriages or engines passing only over the same portion of the lines of the pursuers' railway, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation; and appoints the proof to be taken before the Lord Ordinary on a day to be fixed."

Mar. 14, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Cross & Sons.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The defence rested on two grounds, viz., that the company had conferred illegal preferences—(1) under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and (2) under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. The Lord Ordinary had allowed proof with regard to the first ground of defence, but refused it on the other as being irrelevant. The reclaimers' motion was, however, that the action should be transferred to the Railway Commissioners acting under the Act of 1888, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether the defence, so far as based on the Act of 1854, was relevant or not. By section 58 of the Act of 1888, it was provided that such an action as the present might be transferred to the Commissioners, the only condition imposed being that the transference should not affect the rights and liabilities of any party to the action. A transference would not affect the rights of the company here, because, although after the decision in Murray's case,<sup>1</sup> it could not be maintained that an action for damages or for repayment of overcharges was maintainable in a Court of law when preferences struck at by the Act of 1854 were complained of, still, the fact of preferences having been granted being established before the Railway Commissioners acting under the Act of 1873, it would be competent for the trader to bring an action for repayment of the overcharges founded on the decision of the Commissioners that an illegal preference had been granted.<sup>2</sup> If that were so the railway company here could * "NOTE.—As the record was originally framed, the defenders' averments appeared to me to be irrelevant. It was decided in Murray v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 11 R. 205, first, that in order to bring the enactment of 1845, upon which the defenders rely, into operation, it was necessary that the traffic carried for different parties should be conveyed for the same distance over the same portion of the line, and secondly, that a complaint under the Statute of 1854 is not competent before this Court. The pursuers maintain that the amendment does not remove the defects of the original averment or record. But I think it may be read as meaning that goods for other traders were carried for lower rates between the same points of arrival and departure; and this is the meaning which the defenders' counsel stated that it was intended to convey. The statement lodged in obedience to the last interlocutor is not a satisfactory compliance with the order; but I am satisfied by the explanation at the bar that the defenders ought not to be considered in default, and that it would be too strict a construction of their averments as now amended to hold them irrelevant on the ground suggested.

"The defenders moved that the case should be transferred to the Railway Commissioners under the 58th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. The pursuers maintain that the action is not one of those to which that section applies, and that if it were, the transfer, which is not imperative, ought not to be made. It appears to me that it would be inexpedient to decide either of these questions until it has been finally determined whether the defence is irrelevant, and to what extent."

<sup>1</sup> Murray v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 29, 1883, 11 R. 205.

<sup>2</sup> Manchester and Lincoln Railway Co. v. Denaby Main Colliery Co., 1883, L. R., 11 App. Cas. 97—per Lord Chancellor, p. 112; Lancashire Railway Co. v. Greenwood, 1888, L. R., 21 Q. B. D. 215—per J. Kay, p. 218.

suffer no disadvantage by the transference, for by section 12 of the Act of 1888 the Commissioners were empowered to award damages to a trader complaining of illegal preferences, and the award was to include repayment of overcharges. That section supplied the defect which existed under the previous Acts, where no power was given to the Commissioners to award damages for preferences struck at by the Act of 1854, the trader's remedy being no longer limited to interdict as formerly. If, therefore, the proof as limited here by the Lord Ordinary went on, the defenders might raise separate proceedings against the company before the Commissioners, founding on the company's breach of the Act of 1854. If, therefore, the transference were granted, there would only be one proceeding, and that before the Commissioners, instead of an action in this Court, and a separate proceeding before the Commissioners, as would be the case if the Lord Ordinary's judgment were allowed to stand.

Argued for the respondents ;—The reclaimers had not shewn that they had any interest to ask a transference. The Court had a discretion as to whether they would transfer the cause or not, and here it would be most inexpedient. It was impossible to say when the Commissioners would sit in Scotland, and the transference might result in very long delay. Further, it would still be incompetent in this action, which was raised before the Act of 1888 came into force, to lay anything in the nature of a money claim resting on the 1854 Act before the Commissioners. Such a defence as was made here was incompetent, under the authority of Murray's case, not only in this Court, but before the Commissioners, and therefore the transference would be useless as regarded the defence founded on the Act of 1854, and proof had already been allowed of the defence on the Act of 1845.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company against certain traders of the name of Cross & Sons for sums due for the carriage of goods belonging to the defenders upon the pursuers' railway. I do not know whether there is any serious dispute as to the fact that the goods were carried, and that, apart from the defence stated, the amount charged is correct enough. However, that matter will go to probation if it is disputed. But the answer which the defenders make to this claim is substantially contained in the answer to the second article of the condescendence. The first averment there is "that the defenders conduct a large business in the manufacture and sale of chemical manures, which contain from 10 per cent to 50 per cent of sulphate of ammonia. The value of these manures is from £2 to £7 per ton. The value of sulphate of ammonia is £12 per ton. Nevertheless the pursuers have conceded to various oil companies, and amongst others to Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company (Limited) mileage rates for the carriage of sulphate of ammonia which they refuse to concede to the defenders for the carriage of their chemical manures, although the goods are of the same description. The rates charged to the defenders are very much higher than the mileage rates charged to the said oil companies." Now, these averments do not comprehend the averment that the goods of the two parties are carried under the same circumstances over precisely the same line of railway, or anything else that would bring it under the operation of the 83d section of the Act of 1845, and therefore they must be held to apply to the provision of the Act of 1854 against undue preferences. Now, it has been quite settled, I think, by the case of Murray, which is referred to by the Lord Ordinary, that no claim can be brought in this Court

No. 106.

Mar. 14, 1899.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Cross & Sons.

No. 106. against a railway company for a violation of the Act of 1854. The only remedy provided by that Act, and the only remedy up to the present day, so far as I know, is that the company which violates that provision shall be restrained from doing so for the future by interdict, and shall also, if they persevere in their evil courses, be subjected to a penalty of so much a day. And, therefore, that part of the averment of the defenders, I think, is entirely irrelevant. If the party who makes that averment could not in an action in this Court enforce any claim against the railway company, just as little can it be pleaded in defence against an otherwise just claim made by the company.

Mar. 14, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Cross & Sons.

But there is another part of the averment which the Lord Ordinary has held to be relevant, and has remitted to probation, and that is an averment founded upon the Act of 1845; and we must hold, therefore, with reference to the form of interlocutor, that what he has done is to refuse a proof of the first part of that averment as being irrelevant, and to allow a proof of the second portion of it. He has had some doubt, I think from the terms of his note, as to whether the averment under the Act of 1845 is quite satisfactory or complete, but that has not been raised before us in argument, as I understand, and therefore I see no reason for doubting the propriety of the Lord Ordinary's appointment of a proof in this case, unless we were to yield to the motion of the defenders that this case should be sent to the Railway Commissioners under the Act of last year. Now, I cannot see what benefit the defenders could very well have by this transference of the case to the Railway Commissioners, because if the complaint under the Act of 1854 cannot be made the subject of an action, just as little can it be made the subject of a claim for money to meet the claim of the pursuers. The question would arise in the same way before the Railway Commissioners as it does here, and this averment under the Act of 1854 would be just as irrelevant, and must be just as much disregarded by the Railway Commissioners as it is by this Court, in so far as it is made the foundation of a money claim. It is quite open of course to the defenders to bring some proceeding before the Railway Commissioners for the purpose of preventing the continuance of the illegal practice of which they complain. Whether it is precisely the same now under the Act of 1888 as it was under the Act of 1854 or under the Act of 1873 it is needless to inquire, but it must be in the form of a complaint to stop an illegal proceeding, and not in the form of a complaint for payment of money. I am therefore for refusing the motion and adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD ADAM.—I entirely concur.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT adhered.

HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 107. MRS MARY JANE LANG, Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—C. S. Dickson.
ROBERT LATTA AND OTHERS (Lang's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Gloag—C. N. Johnston.
Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

Contract—Marriage contract—Informality—Rei interventus—Writ—Natural execution—Agent and Client.—A widow brought an action of reduction of her antenuptial marriage-contract against her husband's trustees on the ground that the notary-public who executed the deed on her behalf, she being unable to write, was at the time acting as her husband's law-agent in the matter. Held No. 107.

 that, assuming that the execution of the deed was invalid, the marriage, which took place on the faith of the contract, validated the deed rei interventu. Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's Trustees.

Question, whether the execution was invalid.

ON 25th October 1887 Mrs Mary Jane Armstrong or Lang, widow of 1ST DIVISION.
 Walter Lang of Chapelton, near Dumbarton, raised an action against Lord Lee.
 Robert Latta and others, the trustees of her deceased husband, and C.
 against her children, concluding, inter alia, for reduction of the antenuptial marriage-contract entered into between her and her husband on 30th September 1878, and for declarator that she was entitled to terce and jus relictæ, as at the date of his death, which occurred on 28th May 1887.

The following facts were not in dispute between the parties:—In 1868 the pursuer, who was then a widow, became housekeeper to Walter Lang, and continued to be so till 30th September 1878, when he married her.

Prior to her marriage the pursuer gave birth to three children, of whom Lang was the father. All of these children were alive at the date of the marriage, but one of them died before the raising of the action. In September 1878 Lang, who was then upwards of seventy-one years of age, became dangerously ill, and on the urgent request of the minister and certain of the elders of the parish, he resolved to marry the pursuer, and legitimise their children. The pursuer, who was anxious to have her children legitimised, agreed to marry him, and proclamation of banns was made in the Parish Church of Dumbarton on Sunday 29th September 1878, and the marriage took place on the evening of the following day.

Shortly before the ceremony, the antenuptial contract in question was signed by Mr Lang, and was also signed by Mr Robert Macfarlane, writer and notary-public, Dumbarton, on behalf of, and (as was alleged by the defenders, Mr Lang's trustees) on the special authorisation of, the pursuer, who could not sign her own name.

The contract contained a discharge of the wife's legal rights, which were greater than the provisions in her favour in the marriage-contract.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "Shortly before the ceremony was performed, the said Walter Lang instructed his law-agent, Mr Robert Macfarlane, writer and notary-public, Dumbarton, to prepare the pretended antenuptial contract now sought to be reduced. The said contract was not submitted in draft to the pursuer, nor to anyone on her behalf. It was not read over by her, nor to her, before it was executed, nor were the contents of it explained to her before it was executed. The pursuer was unable to read or write or to sign her name. The said Robert Macfarlane was present at the execution of the deed as the agent of the said Walter Lang, and he had prepared the deed as Mr Lang's agent. He was then, and had been for some time, the private agent of the said Walter Lang in all his matters of business. The pursuer gave no instructions for the execution of the said deed on her behalf, and had no knowledge of its execution, but it bears to have been executed notarially for her by the said Robert Macfarlane as a notary. The said Walter Lang and the said Robert Macfarlane concealed from the pursuer the provisions contained in the said deed, and she had no knowledge of its contents or effect. They also concealed from her the amount of means and estate which then belonged to the said Walter Lang. The provisions made in favour of the pursuer by the said deed are totally inadequate for her support, and are utterly disproportionate to the means and estate which then belonged to the said Walter Lang, and which were left by him at the time of his death."

No. 107. (Cond. 5) "The said pretended marriage-contract is void, or, at all events, reducible, from the fact that the notary, who is said to have executed it on the pursuer's behalf, was the private agent of the said Walter Lang, and as such prepared the said marriage-contract upon his instructions, and was in attendance at the execution thereof as his agent. It was unlawful for him to occupy the position of agent for the husband and to act as notary for the wife in the execution of the said contract, under which they had conflicting interests. The interests of the pursuer were not protected by the said notary, but, on the other hand, he acted in the interests of the said Walter Lang, and both he and the said Walter Lang fraudulently concealed from the pursuer the provisions and effect of the said contract, and also the amount and value of the said Walter Lang's means and estate, and the legal rights which would accrue to her as his wife."

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

The defenders denied these averments.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The said marriage-contract is null and void, in respect the pursuer never authorised it to be executed on her behalf, and the pursuer is therefore entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions. 2. Separatim, The said marriage-contract ought to be set aside, in respect (1) that it was notarially executed for the pursuer by a notary who was at the same time acting as the agent of the other party to the contract; and (2) that the contract was not read over to the pursuer, nor its provisions and effect explained to her, before it was executed. 3. In any event, the said marriage-contract is not binding on the pursuer, in respect that if executed by her authority at all, it was procured from her by fraudulent concealment on the part of the said Walter Lang and his agent as to its nature and effect.

The defenders pleaded;—1. The pursuer's averments being irrelevant, the action ought to be dismissed. 2. The pursuer's averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders ought to be assolizied. 3. The pursuer having suffered no lesion, is not entitled to have the contract reduced.

Proof was led on 29th May 1888. It was proved that the pursuer's main object in entering into the marriage was the legitimization of her children. The proof was mainly directed (1) to prove the relation between Mr Macfarlane (the notary who signed the deed for the pursuer) and Mr Lang, and it was not ultimately disputed that he had acted as agent for Mr Lang on former occasions, and that he so acted in this business; (2) to shew the circumstances in which the deed was signed, and the facts as to the deed being read over to the pursuer, and her authorisation to Mr Macfarlane to sign the deed on her behalf. The more important parts of the evidence on this latter point are given below.*

---

* The pursuer deponed,—“Were you asked by anybody to sign any paper that day (the day of the marriage)? (A.) No; I cannot write. (Q.) Did anybody speak to you about any paper which you were wanted to sign if you could have written? (A.) No. I did not hear anything that day about a marriage-contract, except what Mr Gray had said.† I saw Mr Macfarlane sign something that day, but I did not know what it was. He asked me to touch his pen with my finger when he was signing, and I did so. This was in Mr Lang's bedroom, after the marriage. I was not told why I was wanted to touch Mr Macfarlane, I just did as I was asked. I did not know what the paper was that he was signing, and no explanation was given to me about what the writing was. When Mr Macfarlane was in the room in the afternoon, on the occasion when he called first, he took me into a room and said Mr Lang was to give me £100, and I asked

---

† She had heard Mr Gray, the parish minister, say to Mr Lang that he should get a marriage-contract.

On 29th June 1888 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:— No. 107.
 “Finds that the notary by whom the deed under reduction was executed

Mar. 15, 1889.
 Lang v. Lang's
 Trustees.

what it was for, and he said it was merely as a present, and that if Mr Lang did not live I would get a living off the estate with my family. That was all Mr Macfarlane said at that time. . . . (Q.) Was the paper which Mr Macfarlane signed when he asked you to touch his pen read over to you? (A.) There was a paper read, but I don't know what kind of a paper it was. (Q.) Were you asked to attend to it? (A.) No, I never was. I was just ben the room. . . . I was not told what the paper was that was read. (Q.) And did you follow or understand it? (A.) No; I did not. The first that I saw of the paper that Mr Macfarlane had with him was his taking it into Mr Lang's room. I don't know what the draft of a paper is. (Q.) Was any paper put before you that day as what they were going to write out, or was any paper put before you to see if you would agree to that, or take it? (A.) No.”

In cross the pursuer deponed,—“(Q.) Did you ask Mr Macfarlane whether you would be entitled to a third of Mr Lang's estate? (A.) No, I did not. (Q.) Did you say anything about your share in his means and estate? (A.) No. I have mentioned all that passed. (Q.) Did Mr Macfarlane not tell you you would not get that? (A.) That was all that passed. (Q.) Are you quite sure? (A.) Yes, quite sure, as far as I mind. (Q.) Had you any idea that you would get anything if there had not been a marriage-contract? (A.) I never knew anything about it until after Mr Lang died, when Mr M'Arthur read it to me. I never knew anything about a marriage-contract till then. I did not know what Mr Macfarlane was reading when Mr Jardine [one of the instrumentary witnesses to the marriage-contract and docquet] and the others were present before the marriage—whether it was a will or not; but I saw there was writing on the paper. I would hear what was said, but I don't remember at this distance of time what it was. (Q.) Did you not hear what Mr Macfarlane read? (A.) It is very likely I would at the time. (Q.) Did you know it was about the marriage? (A.) I did not know anything about it. I don't remember hearing anything read about the £100 I was to get. I don't remember a word that was read.”

Mr Macfarlane deponed,—“Mr Lang was ill when I went to see him on Monday, 30th September 1878. On reaching the house I saw the pursuer, who ushered me into Mr Lang's room. Mr Lang said,—‘They have been at me to marry her, but I am not going to do it until I have a settlement with her,’ or words to that effect. Mrs Lang was out and in the room while I was there, and I cannot say at this distance of time whether she heard that or not, but I rather think she did. Mr Lang then told me he would marry her when this was arranged, and then he dictated to me what he was going to do for Mrs Lang, and Mrs Lang was there and heard it. I did not write to his dictation; he told me what he was going to do, and I took a note of it in the ordinary way, and came into my office and instructed my clerk, Mr Bayne, to draw up a contract on the notings I gave him. Mrs Lang was present at my meeting with Mr Lang and heard all that passed, and she had nothing to add, as I learned or understood. I went back to Mr Lang's with the draft of the contract. I saw the pursuer on that occasion. I was never there that day without seeing and speaking to her. I was there two or three times. I took the pursuer into a room by herself shortly before the signing of the contract, but we had had communications before that. I took her into the room to make assurance doubly sure, and to explain thoroughly to her the effect of the contract, and to ask if she thought we could get any more out of Mr Lang. I said, ‘Do you think we can get any more out of him?’ We then passed on to a number of other questions, amongst others, whether it was worth while delaying, and the result of it all was that she thought it was best to go on and to sign this. We then came back into the room where Mr Lang was, and I said Mrs Lang plainly understood it, but I will read it over. (Q.) You explained the terms of the deed to her in that room? (A.) I did, most faithfully. (Q.) And are satisfied she understood it? (A.) Thoroughly. (Q.) Did she ask you anything about her legal rights—

No. 107. for the pursuer was acting at the time as the law-agent of the deceased Walter Lang, the other party to the contract, and on his instructions and employment: Finds that as such agent the said notary was personally interested in the deed, and was incapacitated by the law from acting as a notary in the execution of the deed for the pursuer; to this extent sustains the reasons of reduction; therefore repels the defences: Reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, and appoints the cause to be put to the roll in order that the remaining conclusions may be disposed of.*

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

her jus relictæ? (A.) She did. Of course I knew her, being a next-door neighbour, and she had perfect freedom in speaking to me. She said, 'Well, if he dies will I no get a third of his money?' and I said, 'Not if you sign this,' having the contract in my hand. (Q.) Are you quite sure she said that? (A.) Perfectly; words to that effect as near as possible. (Q.) Did she give you the impression that she was aware of a widow's rights in law? (A.) She was aware. She followed up what I have stated by asking, 'Will I not get a third of his rents if he dies?' and I said, 'Not if you sign this.' I did not say anything about her getting a present of £100; nothing like it was ever mentioned. . . . I think I was aware that the pursuer could not write. She authorised me, as a notary, to sign the deed for her. I got the authority before I signed the deed for her. When I got the authority, I wrote the docquet, and the docquet was also read. . . . (Q.) Did you think, in advising Mrs Lang, that Mr Lang would not have married her at all if she had not accepted the marriage-contract? (A.) Clearly he would not. My impression is that he would not have married her at all if he had not thought he was dying. (Q.) Can you say whether that idea was not in Mrs Lang's mind also? (A.) In conversations with Mrs Lang, she was really anxious to get into the position of a married woman, and I discussed with her whether there was any chance of Mr Lang's recovery, and of more being got by delay."

* "OPINION.—The pursuer of this action is the widow of Walter Lang of Chapelton. She here seeks to reduce an antenuptial marriage-contract between her and her husband, which is alleged to have been executed by her notariaily on the day of her marriage, viz., 30th September 1878. The deed confessedly made a very poor and inadequate provision for her, which was 'accepted by her in full satisfaction of all terce of land, legal share of moveables, and every other thing that she, jure relictæ or otherwise, could ask, claim, or demand . . . through his death, his own free will only excepted.'

"But the grounds of reduction which were chiefly relied on go only to this, that the deed was not well executed.

"The pursuer and her husband (whose housekeeper she was) had lived together for about ten years before the marriage, and she had borne him three children. It is not disputed that she desired to marry him for the sake of the children. But the proof shews that in point of fact the marriage was brought about, not by her, but by the parish minister and one or two elders, who were visiting him at a time of severe illness. During the week previous to the marriage he was thought to be dying, and the witness Jardine was sent to Glasgow to find out how a marriage could be accomplished without awaiting the proclamation of banns. During the same week it appears that the witness Mr Macfarlane was busy, as Mr Lang's law-agent, with the preparation of his testamentary settlements. The banns were proclaimed by Mr Lang's instructions on the 29th, and the marriage took place on the afternoon of the 30th. It was not until the morning of the 30th, according to the witness Macfarlane, that he was told anything of the intended marriage. He was then sent for, and received instructions from Mr Lang as to the marriage-contract. He prepared the deed presumably in accordance with his instructions. It gives to the pursuer, as Mr Lang's wife, the same provisions substantially as she was to have received under the unexecuted settlements as Mr Lang's housekeeper and the mother of his illegitimate children. But if the deed under reduction is saying that the mere fact that a notary who signed for one party to a

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was no authority for No. 107.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

valid, she agreed to accept this in full of her legal rights. The question is, whether that deed is ineffectual upon any of the grounds stated?

"The principal objection urged at the debate was that the deed was not well executed, in respect that the notary who signed it on the pursuer's behalf was the agent of Mr Lang, the other contracting party, and was acting at the time under his instructions. In disposing of this objection it must of course be assumed that the formalities required by the 41st clause of the Conveyancing Act were observed; that the deed was read over to the pursuer, and that she gave authority to Mr Macfarlane to subscribe it for her. But if it be the fact that Mr Macfarlane, the notary, acted in all he did as agent for Mr Lang, and was present solely in his interest and for his purposes, I cannot doubt that a serious question arises regarding his qualifications to act as notary in the execution of the deed for the other party.

"It is settled by the case of Ferrie v. Ferrie's Trustees (1 Macph. 291), and by the authorities there cited, that a notary cannot as such execute a deed in which he is himself concerned. In that case the deed (a testamentary trust-settlement) was executed notarially and in good form by two notaries and four witnesses, but one of the notaries (Mr Adam Paterson, a well-known solicitor in Glasgow) was also one of the five gratuitous trustees to whom the execution of the testator's will was committed, and the deed authorised the employment by the trustees of one of their own number as agent, with remuneration. It was held that the deed was null, because one of the notaries was disqualified. In the words of the Lord President, 'The law excluded Mr Paterson from acting as a notary in the execution of this deed.' Lord Curriehill's opinion puts his judgment on the ground that it was settled 'that the acts of a notary in the exercise of his office will not be effectual where he is personally interested.'

"In the present case the notary was not interested as a beneficiary under the deed, but the evidence shews that he was intimately concerned in it as the agent of Mr Lang, and was interested to the extent of charging Mr Lang as his employer with his fees, both as agent and as notary. He says that he acted also as agent for Mrs Lang, but he admits that he was not employed by her, and that he took his instructions from Mr Lang. It was on his behalf that he had prepared the deed, and was present to get it executed. He thought the provisions of the deed in favour of Mrs Lang mean and inadequate, but he took, in my view of his evidence, no steps to inform himself as to Mr Lang's means, such as a separate agent would have taken, with a view to advising Mrs Lang concerning the full effect of the renunciation of her legal rights. He trusted to her knowledge on that subject, and states that she asked a question indicating her acquaintance with the legal rights of a widow. Upon this point, however, he is contradicted by Mrs Lang, and is not corroborated. I am not satisfied upon the evidence that she put any such question as he mentions. But the conflict of evidence as to the extent of Mr Macfarlane's explanations to her illustrates the difficulty and danger which must be experienced, even by the most conscientious agent, in attempting to combine agency for one of the contracting parties with the position of notary executing the deed for the other. Mr Macfarlane, I am sure, did not consciously fail to act faithfully towards her, but, upon the evidence, I was satisfied that he acted solely as agent for Mr Lang.

"This being so, did the law allow him, upon the employment of Mr Lang, to act as notary-public in the execution of the deed by the other party? It seems clear that if Mr Lang had happened to be a notary-public himself, he could not have executed it notarially for the other party. Could he, then, do by an agent that which he could not have done himself, supposing that no agent had been employed or required? I think not; and my opinion is that Mr Macfarlane, as Mr Lang's agent, was so much identified with his interests, and so far personally interested in the execution of the deed, that he was disqualified for acting as notary for Mrs Lang.

"I think it unnecessary to go back upon the old authorities, but the case of

No. 107. deed was at the same time agent for the other party nullified the deed.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

Questions of a kindred nature had been before the Court on many occasions during the last two or three centuries,<sup>1</sup> and the fact that this identical question had never been decided was an argument in favour of the view that the objection was bad, as the same facts must have occurred many times before. The case of Craig v. Richardson (M. 16,829), which was said to have decided that it was not lawful for the same two notaries to sign for both parties, was perhaps the nearest case to the present; but that case was practically overruled, if indeed it decided that question at all, by the case of Græme v. Græme's Trustees (7 Macph. 14). If it were held in this case that the notary's signature was bad, the result would be to add a new disability, which, considering that the office of notary was not merely Scottish but European, would be most inexpedient. In none of the institutional writers was it laid down that such an execution as there was here invalidated the deed so executed. But further, if there were an error here in the notarial execution, it was cured by homologation. The marriage would not have taken place if the contract had not been entered into, and the subsequent marriage cured any mere error in formality.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the respondents;—Under the authorities referred to by the reclaimers, especially the case of Ferrie's Trustees,<sup>1</sup> and the treatise on the Græme's Trustees (7 Macph. p. 14), like the case of Stoddart (1799, M. 16,857), appears to me to be distinguished by this, that the judgment was there put upon the ground that the deed was not a contract, but a testamentary and revocable deed.

"The case of Nisbet v. Newlands (1630, M. 17,016 and 5682) was referred to. But I think that the separate report, under the head 'Homologation,' shews a distinction. For there was there a conveyance which had taken effect during the husband's life, and the judgment was put upon the ground of homologation.

"I therefore sustain this reason of reduction.

"Secondly, with regard to the question whether the deed was executed by the authority of the pursuer, there is one aspect of it in which I should give my verdict for the pursuer. If Mr Macfarlane was disqualified from acting as notary in the execution of that deed for the pursuer, he was incapable of receiving authority to that effect, and did not receive it. But if I am wrong upon the first ground of reduction, I should hold the evidence insufficient to contradict the notary's docquet, attested as it is, and supported by the evidence of the witnesses Jardine and Bayne.

"Thirdly, upon the question whether the deed was read over to the pursuer, my verdict again is for the defenders. I think that it was proved that it was read over. Mr Jardine's failure of memory is not sufficient to falsify the docquet attested by himself as well as by Bayne (Frank v. Frank, 1795, M. 16,825).

"Fourthly, as to the alleged fraudulent concealment, I am of opinion that it is not proved. There was no duty of disclosure imposed upon Mr Lang, excepting in so far as the employment of his own agent to act as a notary for the pursuer may have given rise to an obligation to see that she was fully advised. I am assuming at present, however, that the deed was well executed. In this view it was a deed between parties of full age, and not to be set aside without proof of fraud. Fraud not being proved, the pursuer cannot set aside the deed on the ground merely that she agreed to a bad bargain."

<sup>1</sup> Scot v. Lord Drumlanrig, 1628, M. 846; Russel v. Kirk, Nov. 27, 1827, 6 S. 133; Stoddart v. Arkley, 1799, M. 16,857; Craig v. Richardson, 1610, M. 16,829; Græme v. Græme's Trustees, Oct. 21, 1868, 7 Macph. 14, 41 Scot Jur. 15; Ferrie v. Ferrie's Trustees, Jan. 23, 1863, 1 Macph. 291, 35 Scot Jur. 196.

<sup>2</sup> Cheap v. Mowat, 1626, M. 17,014; Muir v. Crawford, 1628, ibid.; Nisbet v. Newlands, 1630, M. 17,016; Braidy v. Braidy and Muir, 1662, M. 17,018; Forrest v. Robertson's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1876, 4 R. 22, Lord Deas, p. 37.

"office of notary,"<sup>1</sup> this deed was bad. A notary could not on these authorities, apart altogether from the Statute (1579, c. 80), execute a deed as notary to which he was a party. Here he was acting for one of the parties, and the same principle ought to apply to such a case. There were conflicting interests in the matter, and Mr Macfarlane could not properly serve both parties. His primary duty was to the husband, on whose behalf he had many times acted as agent, and on whose behalf he was so acting on the occasion in question. A notary, considering the solemn nature of his duties, should be in a position of perfect neutrality.<sup>2</sup> The error here was not merely technical but substantive. The deed was really an unsigned document. All the cases cited by the defenders, with regard to homologation, were cases of statutory informality, and therefore had no application here. There could be no homologation here unless it were proved that the marriage would not have taken place unless the contract was signed, and Mr Macfarlane's evidence did not amount to that. It was distinctly decided in a recent case by the House of Lords that marriage could not validate a marriage-contract entered into under essential error.<sup>3</sup> Such error was here proved by Mrs Lang's testimony.

No. 107.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's
Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This is an action to set aside an antenuptial marriage-contract into which the pursuer is said to have entered on 30th September 1878. It is directed against the trustees and executors of the pursuer's late husband, and also against her children. She has a very material interest to reduce the contract, because it contains a discharge of her legal rights, which are of greater value than the conventional provisions.

The pursuer had for a considerable time been the mistress of the late Mr Lang, and had borne three children to him. In 1878 Mr Lang became seriously ill, and he was urged by his friends to marry the pursuer. He does not appear to have been very willing to do so. But he ultimately consented, and the marriage was celebrated on 30th September 1878, the marriage-contract having been previously executed on the same day.

The marriage-contract was prepared by Mr Macfarlane, a writer in Dumbarton, on the instructions of Mr Lang, and he says that he received his instructions in the presence of the pursuer. He further states,—Mr Lang said, "They have been at me to marry her, but I am not going to do it until I have a settlement with her." As the pursuer could not write, the contract was executed by her notarially, and Mr Macfarlane acted as the notary.

The sole ground of reduction relied on in argument was that Mr Macfarlane was disqualified from acting as notary inasmuch as he was the agent of the other party. The pursuer did not attempt to set aside the contract on the plea that it was obtained from her by misrepresentations or undue influence. It is true that she says that she was ignorant of its terms, and that she did not understand that she was entering into a marriage-contract. These matters are, however, introduced into the case not as substantive grounds of reduction, but as indicating the reason of the rule for which the pursuer contends.

I have further to observe that the objection on which the pursuer relies is not an objection which appears ex facie of the contract. On the contrary, so far as the deed shews, the prescribed legal formalities were duly observed.

<sup>1</sup> On the office of Notary, 6th edit. (1821) p. 248.

<sup>2</sup> Laird Gormock v. The Lady, 1583, M. 16,874.

<sup>3</sup> Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 21.

No. 107. The question which is thus raised is important. I do not think that it is ruled by any of the cases that were cited to us. It was decided in Ferrie's Trustees (1 Macph. 291) that a trust disponee cannot act as the notary of the truster, though there something may have turned on the fact that the notary might and probably would have a personal benefit from the settlement, inasmuch as he was the agent of the truster, and as the deed contained an express dispensation of the ordinary law applicable to a trustee who acts as agent for the trust. In the old case of Craig (M. 16,829) it was held that the same notary cannot subscribe for both the parties to a contract. But the soundness of this decision was more than doubted by Lord Deas in the case of Græme (7 Macph. 14), though it was regarded with more favour by Lord Ardmillan. The latter case was decided on the single ground that no statutory nullity was incurred because the same notaries had subscribed for each of the two parties to a mutual disposition and settlement which bore to be revocable by either. These are the only cases which have any direct application to the present, and they do not give us much assistance in the determination of it.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Lang v. Lang's Trustees.

I confess that I think it very undesirable that the agent of the one party to a contract should act as the notary of the other. It is of great importance to preserve the purity of the office of notary, and to require that he shall not be under any influence which might induce him to be either corrupt or careless in the discharge of his duty. And these considerations present themselves with great force, when we keep in view the duties which devolve on the notary who acts for an illiterate person. But there is a very analogous case when such considerations would not, I think, prevail against the validity of the deed. If the pursuer had been able to write, and if the same agent had acted for both parties, the contract would not be void but only voidable, though the Court, before sustaining it, would require to be satisfied that it was obtained with perfect fairness, and with full intelligence on the part of the wife.

I am glad to think that we need not decide this difficult and delicate question, because we can determine this case on another ground.

It is to my mind quite certain that before the marriage was celebrated the parties intended to enter into a marriage-contract, and we have in writing the contract which they intended to execute. The pursuer, no doubt, says that she did not know that she was entering into any contract, and affects to say that she knew nothing of what was done. I cannot take this off her hands. I prefer the testimony of Mr Macfarlane, whose veracity and honour were not impeached, and who is supported in the main by the other parties who were present. He gives distinct evidence to the effect that he read over the deed to the pursuer, and explained the meaning and effect of it. That the deed was read over is clear from the evidence of the pursuer herself. For she says that she "did not know what Mr Macfarlane was reading when Mr Jardine and the others were present before the marriage." Unless Mr Macfarlane was guilty of a fraud, which he had no interest to commit, and which it is not alleged that he did commit, the whole proceedings were conducted with perfect fairness, and the intended contract was fully understood by the pursuer.

The marriage followed upon it, and in my opinion any imperfection in the mode of execution has been removed rei interventu. The case of Nisbet (M. 17,016) is a direct authority to that effect, and it is in accordance with the recognised law that informal contracts may be so validated. There the Court had to consider a marriage-contract where only one notary subscribed for each party. It is clear that this was no subscription at all, and that so far as mere execution went the contract was absolutely void. But it was held that the contract was not challengeable provided marriage had followed upon it, because marriage is an act of homologation which bars objections. The worst that can be said of the contract in question is that it was not signed by the pursuer by reason of the disqualification of the notary. But the marriage followed upon it, and I think that we may accept the statement of Mr Macfarlane, which is in accordance with the reasonable and legal inference, that the marriage would not have taken place if the contract had not been executed. In sustaining the marriage-contract in question we are within the rule of the case to which I have referred, and we are merely acting on the well-established principle, which applies to marriage-contracts, as it applies to all other contracts, that informality in legal execution is cured rei interventu.

LORD ADAM and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assolized the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—Agents.

HUGH HOGARTH AND OTHERS (Owners of "Westfalia"), Pursuers (Respondents).—C. S. Dickson—Ure.

ALEXANDER MILLER, BROTHER, & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Darling—Murray.

No. 108.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

Ship—Charter—Freight—Hire payable in advance—General average agreement.—In a charter-party the charterer became bound to pay hire for a steam-vessel at a certain rate per month, and the owners to provide the officers and crew and stores.

It was stipulated that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service."

On 30th September 1887, on a voyage from the West Coast of Africa to Harburg, the high-pressure engine broke down, and the vessel put in to Las Palmas in the Canary Isles, where she was pronounced to be unfit to proceed on her voyage. As repairs could not be effected in that port, the owners and charterers arranged to send from England a tug to bring the ship to Harburg, it being agreed that the cost should be treated as general average.

The ship arrived at the port of discharge by the use of her low-pressure engine and with the assistance of the tug. The charterer paid £867 as his share of general average.

In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for hire of the ship from the time she left Las Palmas with the assistance of the tug till she was discharged, held (1) (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the ship had not been "in an efficient state" from the time of the accident, and that in terms of the charter-party the owner had no claim to hire for the subsequent voyage, but (2) (dub. Lord Young) that the charterers must pay hire for the period during which she was necessarily engaged in discharging her cargo at the port of arrival.

By charter-party, dated 26th February 1887, Alexander Miller, Brother, & Company, Glasgow, hired from Hugh Hogarth, the managing owner, the steamship "Westfalia" (1135 tons), "to be by them employed in carrying lawful and non-injurious merchandise between such ports within the following limits, viz., Swansea and Rotterdam, or other ports in the United King-

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

No. 108. dom and Continent, to such safe ports on the West Coast of Africa as charterers direct and back to Europe. . . .”

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

It was provided by the charter-party that the owners should provide and pay for the provisions and wages of the captain and crew, and for the insurance of the ship and for her stores, and “maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service.” On their part the charterers agreed to provide and pay for “all the coals, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, expense of loading and unloading, and all other charges whatsoever, except those before stated.”

The charterers agreed “to pay for the use and hire of said vessel at the rate of 8s. sterling per gross register ton per calendar month [about £15 per day], . . . hire to continue until her redelivery to the owners (unless lost) at a safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent (between Havre and Hamburg inclusive). Payment of the said hire to be made in cash in Glasgow monthly in advance. . . .” The captain though appointed by the owners was to be under the direction of the charterers. The charterers were to have the option of continuing the charter for a further voyage on giving the owners fifteen days’ notice prior to the expiration of the first mentioned term.

The charter-party also provided that “In the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease till she be again in an efficient state to resume her service, but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers’ risk and expense.” It further provided that “should the vessel be lost any freight paid in advance and not earned (reckoning from the date of her loss) shall be returned to the charterers.”

After the completion of the first voyage the charterers exercised their option to continue the charter for a second voyage, and despatched the vessel to the West Coast of Africa for a cargo of kernels and palm-oil to be brought to Harburg on the Elbe. Having loaded her cargo she started on the homeward voyage on 14th September 1887. On the voyage she called at Las Palmas in the Canaries for coals on 29th September. The next day, 30th September, when about ninety-six miles from Las Palmas, her high-pressure engine broke down in consequence of the breaking of the piston-rod and of damage to the piston and other machinery. It was found necessary in consequence to put back to Las Palmas, which was done partly under sail and partly by means of the low-pressure engine. The ship would not steam astern, so that there was considerable difficulty found in getting her safely into the harbour.

The ship was surveyed at Las Palmas. The surveyors refused to certify that she was seaworthy and could proceed home under her low-pressure engine. Intelligence of the break-down and of the survey was telegraphed to the owners. There were not materials for repairing the vessel at Las Palmas, and it was calculated that it would take two months to send out materials and tools to repair her there. Negotiations took place between the owners and the charterers as to whether the ship should be discharged at Las Palmas, brought home and repaired, and then sent out again for the cargo, or whether an attempt should be made, taking all risks, to bring her home with her cargo under her low-pressure engine alone, or whether a tug should be sent out to tow her home. Before the course to be taken had been settled Hogarth, the managing owner, telegraphed to his underwriters’ agents on 7th October, — “Been endeavouring all week, coax ‘Westfalia’ home, own power, but the surveyors consider it unwarrantable. Waiting your response about towage." No. 108. The underwriters on the ship agreed to authorise that the vessel should be towed home. The owners and charterers also agreed that that course should be adopted. The latter were anxious to get the cargo home, as they had sold it in anticipation of its arrival. A tug was hired for £1100 to go out to bring the ship home, and on a computation of the relative value of the ship in her broken-down state and of the cargo it was estimated that as a matter of general average the share of the charterers in this expense would be about £800, and that of the owners about £300.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

The tug started from Las Palmas with the "Westfalia" in tow on 18th October, and after a passage of eleven days reached the mouth of the Elbe on 29th October, and Harburg on the 31st. This length of voyage little, if at all, exceeded an average passage. During the voyage the "Westfalia" used her low-pressure engine, which had the effect of shortening the time of the voyage by three or four days.

On 1st November the ship began to discharge, the discharging being done by the charterers. Repairs were also proceeded with at the same time, without interrupting the discharge. The discharge was not completed till 10th November. This period was somewhat longer than the average period for discharging the vessel. The charterers' proportion of the expense of bringing home the ship and cargo was fixed by an average adjuster at Harburg at £867, 9s. 11d. This sum they paid to the owners. Hogarth, as managing owner, claimed payment for the hire of the ship from 18th October, when she left Las Palmas with the tug, to 10th November, when her discharge was completed. This hire at the rate stipulated in the charter-party amounted to £341, 4s. 8d.

The charterers having refused to pay this sum, the owners, on 13th March 1888, raised an action against them to recover it. They averred;—"At least from and after 18th October the said ship was in an efficient state to resume her service; and she was, from at least 18th October, engaged on her service under said charter and actively pursuing her voyage, and continued to do so till 18th November. If the said ship had not been efficient, and but for the services rendered by her upon and after 18th October, neither she nor the cargo would have reached the port of discharge till long after they did, and the defenders would thus have suffered very serious loss. The value of the services thus rendered by the said ship to the defenders, and the benefit thereby derived by the defenders, who in consequence recovered their full freight and got the said ship ready for another voyage, all precisely as if there had been no accident, amounts to not less than the sum sued for."

The defenders averred;—(Stat. 5) "From 30th September 1887, when the 'Westfalia's' machinery broke down, till 11th November 1887, when the repairs upon it were completed (which includes the period for which hire is claimed in the summons), the ship was not in an efficient state to resume her service." (Stat. 6) "The expense of bringing the ship and the cargo from Las Palmas to Harburg was submitted to an average adjuster, who fixed the proportion payable by the defenders at £867, 9s. 11d., and the defenders paid that sum to the pursuer Hogarth acting as aforesaid. Instead of the said sum of £867, 9s. 11d., the sum which the defenders would have had to pay as hire, had the ship been efficient, is the sum sued for,—that is to say, only £341, 4s. 8d."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) In terms of the charter-party, freight being due for the period from 18th October, decree should be granted as concluded for. (3) In respect of the services rendered by the said ship to the defenders on and after 18th October, which benefited the defenders to at least the extent of the sum sued for, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

No. 108.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) In terms of the clause of the charter-party quoted, no freight having been due for the period from 30th September to 10th November, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The charter-party having, between 18th October and 10th November, been superseded by the average agreement, and the defenders having paid their contribution under that agreement for bringing the ship and cargo to Harburg, as fixed by the average adjuster, are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The defenders not having benefited by the services founded on, but, on the contrary, having had to pay a sum greatly in excess of the value of said services, are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

After a proof, from which the facts above narrated appeared, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in the sum of £320 sterling, with interest as concluded for, for which decerns: Finds the defenders liable in expenses.”*

* “OPINION.—The ‘Westfalia’ was chartered by the defenders, they binding themselves by the charter-party to pay hire for the steamer at a certain rate per registered ton. It was stipulated, however, ‘that in the event of any loss of time from . . . break-down of machinery . . . the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service.’

“The high-pressure engine of the ‘Westfalia’ broke down on the morning of the 30th September, and the ship put back to Las Palmas, where she remained till 18th October, during which time she was surveyed and declared, by some of the surveyors at least, to be unseaworthy. No repairs were executed on the engine at Las Palmas, because there were no means there of executing such repairs. The ‘Westfalia’ left Las Palmas on 18th October under steam, with her low-pressure engine alone working, accompanied, and in some measure assisted, by a tug-steamer sent out from England. She arrived at Harburg, her port of destination, on the 31st October, where she delivered the part of her cargo deliverable there. The high-pressure engine was repaired at Harburg, and the ‘Westfalia’ sailed again for Antwerp with the remainder of her cargo on 11th November.

“The pursuers seek decree for the hire of the steamer for the period between 18th October and 10th November, which the defenders refuse to pay on the ground that the ‘Westfalia’ was not in ‘an efficient state to resume her service’ during that period. I think the defenders are wrong. The service which the steamer was bound to render to the defenders under the charter-party was to carry the cargo to the port of delivery. That the ‘Westfalia’ was in a condition efficiently to render this service is best proved by the fact that she did it. The cargo was carried and safely delivered. The break-down in the machinery had not rendered the steamer inefficient for her service, although it had made her less efficient than she had been; and had she proceeded on her voyage, instead of putting back when the engine broke down (as on the evidence I am prepared to hold she could quite safely have done), I think there would have been no reason for suggesting that her full hire had not been earned.

“The defenders, however, plead that they are not liable for the hire sued for, because they have had to pay more than the amount of the hire on account of the tug-steamer sent out to her aid. I think this affords no answer to the pursuers’ claim. The tug was sent out because all concerned were desirous of having the ‘Westfalia’ home as soon as possible, for the reasons stated by Mr Hogarth. Had the expense of the tug been borne by the pursuers alone, the defenders could plainly not have pleaded that the assistance rendered by the tug had absolved them from their liability for the hire of the ‘Westfalia.’ Nor, in the circumstances, can they plead this, although they paid a part of the expense of the tug, for they agreed that the whole expense of the tug should be treated as general average, and it was so treated. But payment of general average, whether the amount be large or small, does not exempt a consignee from liability for freight, nor affect the shipowner’s right to his hire, which comes to him in place

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had failed No. 108. to observe the difference between this charter-party and the ordinary form of a contract of affreightment. He had decided the case on the principle that if a ship arrive, however unseaworthy, she had earned her freight. But that consideration did not apply to a charter under which freight was to be payable monthly in advance, and was to be so independent of the bringing home of the cargo that even if ship and cargo were lost, the freight was payable up to the date of the disaster. This was indeed not a charter-party for the carriage of goods, but a charter-party for the letting of the ship, the law of which was that which applied to the hiring of any moveable.<sup>1</sup> For that reason "hire," and not "freight," was correctly said in the charter to be payable by the defenders. Now, there was no doubt in fact that the ship broke down. The surveyors at Las Palmas distinctly gave it as their opinion that she could not safely go home with her cargo under her low-pressure engine alone, and the defenders were not bound to submit to the risk of allowing her to make the attempt. It was said that, assuming her unseaworthiness, the tug made her seaworthy by supplying the power in which she was deficient, and the Lord Ordinary had held that with the aid of the tug she had performed the contract. But if the ship was unseaworthy, or not "efficient," as the charter expressed it, the tug would not make her so, and the ship did not in point of fact perform her contract. She only did so by the power of the tug, for which the defenders had paid more than £800. The pursuers did not ask hire for the time when the ship lay disabled at Las Palmas. But nothing was done there to repair her, and therefore the condition on which hire was to be resumed did not come into operation till she was repaired at Harburg, and again "in an efficient state to resume her service." As to the period during which the vessel lay at Harburg to be unloaded, the vessel was not then "efficient," and hire could not be due. The repairs were not finished till the 11th November, before which time the discharge was at an end. The pursuers might as well sue the defenders for hire for the period during which the vessel lay broken down at Las Palmas. But for the contribution by the defenders towards the expense of the tug, the pursuers might have recovered hire for the discharging under the doctrine of recompense, but

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

of freight. There is no evidence whatever that the arrangement made as to average was intended to supersede or affect to any extent the rights and obligations of parties under the charter-party.

"It was suggested rather than argued that the 'Westfalia' was unable to earn her hire from Las Palmas, because she was declared to be unseaworthy. But an unseaworthy ship may earn freight, of which there was a notable instance in the case of Turner (1 Macq. 334), where freight was earned by a ship rendered so unseaworthy during her voyage that her owners were held entitled to abandon her as a constructive loss. As I have said, the hire of the 'Westfalia' came to her owners in place of freight, and was earned if the service was rendered, whether the 'Westfalia' was seaworthy or not.

"The voyage in question from Las Palmas did not exceed much, if any, the average time occupied by the 'Westfalia' on such a voyage. Yet it does appear from the evidence of the pursuers' own witnesses that the 'Westfalia' did not go at the full speed customary with her when both her engines were working. Whether this, on a strict construction of the charter-party, entitles the defenders to any deduction from the stipulated hire, I am by no means clear, but I think they are in equity entitled to some deduction in the circumstances, and accordingly I will allow them £21, 4s. 8d., which is nearly equal to the amount of the steamer's hire for a day and half."

<sup>1</sup> Carver on Carriage by Sea, sec. 112, and sec. 542; Havelock v. Geddes, 1809, 10 East, 555.

No. 108. here the defenders were not lucrati to any extent, and nothing was due under the contract. The hire now sued for had contributed nothing to the general average expense of towing, which it ought to have done if the pursuers intended to charge hire.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

Argued for the pursuers;—The charter-party was not a mere agreement for hire of a moveable, but an ordinary contract of affreightment.<sup>1</sup> The cost of bringing home the ship, as the defenders' own pleas shewed, was to be treated as general average. On that footing they joined in getting the tug. But, as the Lord Ordinary remarked, payment of general average did not affect the shipowners' right to the hire of their ship. It was the defenders' interest to get the cargo home, as they had sold it while in transit, and for that reason they joined in getting the tug. If the pursuers alone had paid for the tug, the defenders could not have maintained their defence, and the fact that they had made a voluntary arrangement to join in hiring the tug, for their own interest, without any stipulation that they should be free from paying hire under the contract, should not make any difference. The ship, with the help of the tug, had made the voyage in an average time, and indeed could have made it under her low-pressure engine alone. At all events, with the tug's aid she was quite seaworthy and efficient.

As to the period while the ship lay at Harburg for discharge.—The ship was perfectly fit to give delivery of her cargo. She kept it dry and safe, and it made no difference for that purpose that the high-pressure engine was still unrepaired.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to a claim for freight, or rather claim for hire of a vessel—the “Westfalia”—for a certain period under a charter-party which is somewhat peculiar in its terms. The defenders hired the ship from the managing owner, Mr Hogarth, for the purpose of a voyage or voyages within certain limits at “8s. per gross registered ton per calendar month.” The hire was to continue during the whole time, “until her redelivery to the owners (unless lost) at a safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent (between Havre and Hamburg inclusive).” The ship was under the care of a captain and crew engaged by the pursuers, the captain being, however, under the defenders' orders, according to the arrangement, and acting as their servant in all matters relating to the trading purposes of the vessel.

On the 30th September, on a homeward voyage, the ship's high-pressure engine broke down, and she was compelled to put into Las Palmas in the Canary Islands. Now, the charter-party stipulated that “in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service.” Therefore no question could arise as to any period exceeding forty-eight hours during which the vessel should be at Las Palmas in an inefficient condition. No hire was payable while she lay there unable to resume her voyage. The owners, the pursuers, then entered into negotiations with the defenders as to the course to be followed. The former were desirous, if possible, that the vessel should be sent home under her low-pressure engine only, the high-pressure engine having broken down, and, as one of the telegrams expresses it, they tried to “coax her home” under the low-pressure engine alone—that is, they endeavoured to induce the official surveyors at Las Palmas to authorise her to come away from that port as seaworthy and make for her port of discharge under her low-pressure engine. But the surveyors declined to do this. They thought they could not allow her to leave Las Palmas under her low-pressure engine alone as a seaworthy ship. On the evidence I think they were plainly right. The very difficulty which the ship experienced in getting into the port of Las Palmas under her low-pressure engine shews, I think, that it would have been dangerous to the ship and cargo to have attempted in the condition in which she was to make the voyage to Europe. But it is not necessary for us to come to a definite conclusion on that matter. The question whether, as between the pursuers and defenders, the ship was seaworthy when at Las Palmas, seems to be conclusively settled by the fact that the surveyors at that place would not allow her to proceed to sea as a seaworthy ship.

<sup>1</sup> Scrutton on Charter-Parties, p. 2.

In these circumstances the pursuers and defenders arranged that a tug should be sent out to aid the ship to come home. The expense of the tug was estimated to be £1100, and the pursuers negotiated with the defenders as to what proportion of that sum they, as interested in getting their cargo home, would be willing to pay. The pursuers' own interest, on the other hand, was to get their ship home. She could be repaired much more easily and cheaply in Europe than at Las Palmas, where there were no means of repairing her, and to which place, if she were to be repaired there, materials would have required to be sent out at a loss of time which, according to the proof, would have been about two months. It was clearly for the interest of both parties, therefore, that means should be taken to get her home at once. It was arranged that the defenders should pay £800 and the pursuers £300 of the £1100. Thereafter the tug was sent out, and on 31st October the ship arrived at Harburg under tow of the tug, with her low-pressure engine aiding. She was then discharged, the discharge being completed about 10th November.

The pursuers claim hire for the period occupied by this voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg and for the period when she lay at the latter place to be discharged. These two demands must be dealt with separately. As to the former, the pursuers say that the ship was made seaworthy by having the assistance of the tug; that it does not matter if she were in herself unseaworthy (which, indeed, they do not admit) if, being provided with the tug, she was able to come safely home, and they point to the fact that she did come safely home. That is the view which the Lord Ordinary has adopted. I cannot concur in it. The position of the parties when the negotiations began was, that they were both dealing with an unseaworthy vessel, and devising an expedient to get her home in her unseaworthy condition. I think she was plainly unseaworthy, "broken down" as the pursuers themselves expressed it in their letter, and that they were quite right to deal with the vessel on that footing. She could not come home by her own power, for the surveyors would not allow her to go, and it would take two months to repair her, and therefore as a special arrangement for a special period, during which she was unseaworthy and required to be brought home in that condition, the tug was hired and sent out. The same arrangement settled between the parties their whole relative duties and liabilities for the period during which the vessel was thus being brought home in her broken-down state, and I think the defenders' sole duty for that period was to pay the £800 which they agreed to pay as their share in that transaction. That is my opinion as to

No. 108.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

No. 108. the first of the periods I have mentioned, and, according to that opinion, the defenders must succeed.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

But the defenders also decline to pay hire for the period during which the vessel was being discharged at Harburg. The discharge took longer than it should have done, in consequence, it is said, of what Mr Hogarth calls in one of his letters "your bungling stevedores." It is probable enough that the stevedores, knowing that the ship could not sail again until repaired, were not very expeditious in discharging her. The defenders, in one of the letters before us, pointed this out, and told them that such delay would not do, as they, the defenders, had to pay hire for the ship while she lay for discharge. Now, I think that was right, and that the defenders must pay for a portion of this disputed period at least. Though unseaworthy for the purpose of navigation, the ship was lying at the port with their cargo in her, keeping it dry and safe, and she was quite fit to be discharged in the ordinary way without special labour owing to her condition. Therefore during the time of discharge she was fulfilling all the duty she could be called on to fulfil, and her power to do so was not affected by her unfitness to go to sea, and therefore I hold that the hirers must pay for the time of discharge. But it is another question whether the defenders must pay for the whole period. I think they must pay for so many days as with ordinary promptitude in the work it would have taken to discharge the ship. My opinion therefore is that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and that the pursuers should only have decree for hire for so many days as would ordinarily be occupied in discharging the vessel.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. In order, however, to express my own opinion upon this question of interest (upon which, but that we are differing from the Lord Ordinary, I should have simply concurred with your Lordship), I think it desirable to express my own views in my own language.

The action is for hire of a ship from 18th October to 10th November, under a charter-party dated 24th February 1887. If during that period the vessel was in the defenders' hands in a condition of efficiency as required by the charter-party, the action is unanswerable. The question therefore is whether during that period the vessel was in the hands of the defenders in an efficient condition. My opinion is that she was not. The charter-party though not at all unprecedented is a somewhat unusual one. It is not a contract for the carriage of goods. It is a contract for the hire of a ship, and the shipowners are no more carriers of goods than would be the owners of a waggon who hired it out to a carrier of goods, or to a man who wished it to carry his own goods. This vessel then was hired with the undertaking on the part of the owner to maintain it in an efficient state in hull and machinery. The charterer is to employ it only in carrying "lawful and non-injurious merchandise," and between ports within certain wide limits. The hire is to be paid monthly in advance, and its payment does not at all depend on the carriage of goods, for it is to be paid though no goods are carried, or though the goods are lost, and indeed assuming a loss it would have been paid in advance up to the hour of the loss. This, of course, differs much from the case of an ordinary charter-party, under which, as a contract for the carriage of goods, there is no freight payable except for goods delivered in safety and in like condition as when shipped. That is a significant distinction between this charter-party and an ordinary charter-party, under which if the ship after performing the longest voyage were lost at the harbour mouth, no freight would be payable. No. 108.

Now, in this charter-party there is necessarily a provision made for a calamity overtaking the vessel. Under the ordinary contract if the voyage is impeded by some calamity, it will not signify that there has been delay. The vessel on arrival and safe delivery of her cargo will earn her freight. But here the provision for a break-down of the ship (exceeding forty-eight hours), is that the payment of hire shall cease until she be in an efficient state to resume her service.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

Such being the contract under which it is said that the vessel was in the defenders' hands during the period sued for, what are the facts? The ship's high-pressure engine broke down on 30th September. She thereby ceased to be in an efficient state in hull and machinery. She was with some difficulty (which is described in the evidence) got into Las Palmas in her broken-down, inefficient, and unseaworthy condition on 2d October. The goods however were safe on board her. When was anything done to her to render her safe and efficient? Nothing was done to her till she reached Harburg. Therefore if she was inefficient when the accident occurred to her on 30th September, and continued so until 18th October, she remained inefficient—a broken-down, unseaworthy ship—until she reached Harburg at all events. I think it is admitted by the pursuers that she was inefficient from 30th September till she left Las Palmas on 18th October, for, if not, they would be demanding hire for that period,—Why not, if she was efficient? Now I put the case during the argument—Suppose the charterer had found another vessel in good condition at Las Palmas which could bring home his goods, would he not have been entitled to take his goods out of the “Westfalia,” and bring them home in it? The answer I got at first was “Certainly,” but that was afterwards modified to “Certainly, if the ship was unseaworthy, which is not admitted.” Assuming the unseaworthiness therefore, it was conceded that the owner of the cargo might tranship it to another ship. That must be because in that case this contract by the charter-party was at an end. Now that is a mere illustration, because there was no other ship at Las Palmas to which the cargo could have been transferred. But it shews that the contract by the charter-party, and the obligation to pay hire, had ceased if the ship was unseaworthy, and the owner of the cargo decided to get his cargo home in another way. Let me put another illustration. Suppose the ship had been obliged, instead of putting into Las Palmas, to put into a desert island in her unseaworthy condition, the cargo being safe but useless in the place where it lay, the owner would have required to send out for it and bring it to a place in which it would have some value, and would have held the contract to pay hire for the vessel at an end. Indeed, the case of putting into Las Palmas is not very different from that case, for the cargo was of little or no value there, and the ship could not in reasonable time have been repaired there. It was the interest of the cargo-owner to have his cargo brought to Harburg, which this ship could not do, and it was the interest of the shipowner to have his ship brought where it could be repaired and employed. Accordingly, the owner of the cargo agreed with the shipowner that the best way of rescuing both was to have the vessel towed to Harburg, for although the ship could not bring the cargo she could hold it. The expense was to be divided in the proportion or ratio of the value of the cargo to the value of the ship. That was not done under the charter-party. The charter-

No. 108. party had nothing to do with it. It would have been the appropriate arrangement if there had been no charter-party at all. It might possibly be called a salvage agreement, but at anyrate hire had nothing to do with it.

Mar. 15, 1889. Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co. It is said by the Lord Ordinary, and it was argued to us, that "had the expense of the tug been borne by the pursuers alone, the defenders could plainly not have pleaded that the assistance rendered by the tug had absolved them from their liability for the hire of the 'Westfalia.' Nor, in the circumstances, can they plead this, although they paid a part of the expense of the tug, for they agreed that the whole expense of the tug should be treated as general average, and it was so treated." I am not, however, at all sure that the claim of the ship for freight would have been irresistible if her owner alone had paid for the tug, unless indeed the cargo-owner had consented to that course. To take again the supposition that there had been at Las Palmas another ship ready to take the cargo home, the owner of the cargo could surely have chosen to send the cargo home by it, for it is not the same thing to have a valuable cargo tugged home on board an unseaworthy ship as to have it carried home by a seaworthy ship. I think that the merchant would have been quite entitled to decline such an offer, and that the shipowner would not have been fulfilling his obligation under the charter-party by offering to substitute a tug for the ship's own power. But that was not done. The ship came to Harburg under quite another arrangement, and I think nothing can be decreed for under this action for that voyage. I do not, of course, think for a moment that a mere temporary break-down which can speedily be repaired would bring this contract to an end. Under the contract there is a provision for such a case. Indeed, the contract is that any stoppage which is not greater than forty-eight hours is to be allowed without any damage at all, and if it exceeded that time there must be a limit, and it would be exceeding that limit if, as the pursuers contend, the agreement for hire were allowed to go on as before, deducting only the time during which the cargo was lying useless at Las Palmas.

The vessel arrived at Harburg on 31st October still in an inefficient condition, and the owners set about repairing her so as to return her to the same merchants, the defenders, as soon as the repairs should be completed. The question as to the liability to pay freight while the cargo was being taken out of her is attended with some doubt in my mind. My inclination is to allow nothing, but as a solution of the difficulty, I would assent that there should be allowed, in the circumstances, a sum for a reasonable period in which to discharge the ship, and that four days would be such a period, and the sum £60.

LORD LEE.—I concur, though it is with some hesitation that I have come to a conclusion opposed to that of the Lord Ordinary, whose experience and authority on questions of maritime law and practice I desire to recognise. But I do not find it necessary to differ from the Lord Ordinary in point of law. I assent to his Lordship's observation that "payment of general average . . . does not exempt the consignee from liability for freight, nor affect the shipowner's right to his hire, which comes to him in place of freight." But it appears to me that the question is whether the arrangement made in this case between the shipowner and the charterers was such as to give to the shipowner a claim for hire under the contract for the period between the 18th October and the discharge of the cargo at Harburg, notwithstanding the condition of the steamer during that time. That question seems to depend on whether the arrangement was one for getting the steamship to a place where she could be repaired and discharged, No. 108. or was one whereby she was to be held as efficient for her service. The words of the charter-party must be attended to. They are very explicit. They are "that in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." Now, it is to be observed that this is not an agreement that time lost in consequence of a break-down shall be deducted. It is an agreement that in case of a break-down the hire shall cease until the ship is again efficient for her service. I think that when the break-down which took place here had occurred, and when the shipowner was making the arrangement about bringing the ship home which he did make, he should have made it clear that the hire was to go on from the date of the arrival of the tug, if he intended to maintain that it did so. The ship could not be repaired at Las Palmas, and the shipowner had been endeavouring, as the telegram to which reference has been made expressed it, to "coax" the surveyors to let her return home with her low-pressure engine alone. But that attempt had failed. I think that knowing as the shipowner did the clause of the charter-party, it was for him when he came to arrange with the owner of the cargo that the tug should be sent out—an arrangement which the owner of the cargo was not bound to agree to—to see that it was understood as a part of the arrangement that the hire of the vessel should run on as if the ship were efficient and the break-down had not taken place. But he made no such provision in coming to that arrangement.

Prima facie his position was, after 30th September, that of owner of a ship which was not in a position to earn hire under the charter-party. The view of the Lord Ordinary is that the ship was not inefficient, for he says, "The cargo was carried and safely delivered. The break-down in the machinery had not rendered the steamer inefficient for her service, though it had made her less efficient than she had been; and had she proceeded on her voyage instead of putting back when the engine broke down (as on the evidence I am prepared to hold she could quite safely have done), I think there would have been no reason for suggesting that her full hire had not been earned." I think that view is disproved by the evidence. The ship did not by her own power make the voyage, and she was not fit to make it. It was made by means of the tug. In these circumstances, I concur with both your Lordships in holding that the hire for the voyage from Las Palmas to Harburg cannot be claimed.

There remains the question as to the time during which the ship was unloaded at Harburg. I think the ship while she lay there was efficient for the purpose of safely holding the cargo and discharging it. The view Lord Young has expressed on this matter is certainly difficult to overcome, but I think it is possible to hold that, while the ship lay in Harburg for the purpose of discharging cargo, she was not inefficient for her service. As to the time which ought to be allowed for that, I think that there is some evidence in the letter of 7th November 1887 addressed to the stevedores,—“We were very much surprised and annoyed to learn from your letter of 3d inst., received this morning, that the ‘Westfalia’s’ kernels would only be finished discharging on Saturday, thereby taking a whole week, or at the very least double the time that should have been spent.” I think, having in view that letter, that the shipowner may be

- No. 108. allowed four days as the time reasonably necessary for the discharge. For the shipowner was not responsible for slowness of the stavedore.

Mar. 15, 1889.
Hogarth v.
Miller,
Brother, & Co.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in the sum of £60 sterling: Ordain them to make payment to them of that sum accordingly: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find the pursuers liable to them in expenses: Remit," &c.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

- No. 109. MRS JANE M'NAB AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—Gloag—Murray.
Mar. 16, 1889. DAVID WILKIE CLARKE, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Salvesen.
M'Nab v.
Clarke.

Cessio Bonorum—Notour bankruptcy—Insolvency—Prima facie evidence—Expiry of charge on undisputed debt—Debtors Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), secs. 6, 8, and 9.—Section 6 of the Debtors Act, 1880, provides that in any case under the Act where imprisonment is rendered incompetent "notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment, followed by the expiry of the days of charge without payment."

Section 8 provides that any creditor of a notour bankrupt may present a petition to the Sheriff, setting forth that his debtor "is unable to pay his debts," and praying for decree of cessio.

Section 9 provides that on any such petition being presented, "(1) the Sheriff, if he is satisfied that there is prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy," shall proceed with the petition in the manner provided.

Held that where in a petition for cessio there is produced an expired charge on an undisputed debt, neither paid nor offered to be paid, a presumption of insolvency is raised, and that therefore prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy, within the meaning of section 9 of the Debtors Act, 1880, is established.

Observed that "insolvency" means, in the sense of the Act, present inability to pay a debt due.

Right in security—Bond and disposition in security—Personal obligation—Sale.—Held (following M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees, 14 R. 918) that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security, in the form prescribed by the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, is entitled to recover his debt either by proceeding on the personal obligation, or by exercising the power of sale contained in the bond.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
M.

ON 13th October 1876 David Wilkie Clarke and others granted a bond and disposition in security over certain heritable subjects in favour of Mrs Jane M'Nab and others, in respect of a loan of £2000.

ON 24th January 1888 the lenders charged Clarke, under the personal obligation in the bond, to repay the loan.

The days of charge expired on January 31st without payment being made.

ON that day Clarke presented a note of suspension of the charge, but the note was refused on 14th March by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and on 26th May the First Division adhered to his interlocutor.<sup>1</sup>

ON 4th October the creditors in the bond intimated to Clarke, in terms of the A. S. of 22d December 1882, their intention of presenting a petition for cessio, and on 15th October they presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Dundee.

The state of debt sent with the intimation and lodged with the petition included interest on the debt down to the date of the petition, and the expenses of presenting the petition. No. 109.

<sup>1</sup> See Clarke v. M'Nab, May 26, 1888, 15 R. 670.

On 21st November the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers' averments and relative documentary evidence do not sufficiently warrant the granting of the petition, in respect, and separatim, first, that they do not indicate any interest that the pursuers have to refrain from exercising the power of sale and preferring another process manifestly penal and ruinous to their debtor; second, that the intimation demanding payment and threatening cessio involves a pluris petitio in regard to the debt due, and was, moreover, made four days before it could appear that the charge for payment would be disobeyed; and third, that the inference deducible from the documents does not amount to prima facie evidence of insolvency; therefore dismisses the petition."* Mar. 16, 1889.
M'Nab v.
Clarke.

The petitioners appealed, and argued;—The first ground stated by the Sheriff was ruled by the case of M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees.<sup>1</sup> The second ground proceeded partly upon an error in fact, as the charge had expired months before the intimation of the petition; and further, the doctrine of pluris petitio was only applicable to adjudications. Besides, the petitioner was entitled to claim interest up to the date of the petition, and the expenses of bringing it. With regard to the third ground, there was ample prima facie evidence of insolvency and notour bankruptcy. The expiry of the days of charge without payment being made raised a presumption of insolvency, particularly when a suspension of the charge had been refused, as that took away the only other possible ground for nonpayment, viz., that the debt was not really due. Insolvency was presumed in such circumstances.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the respondent;—It could not be maintained after the decision in M'Whirter that the Sheriff's first ground of decision was well founded. On the second ground.—The claim here was in excess of what was due, and therefore the whole claim was bad. The expenses of the petition had not been incurred when the intimation and state of debt was sent to the respondent. On the third ground.—An expired charge was not of itself sufficient to create a presumption of insolvency. There might be other grounds on which the debtor refused to pay the sum claimed, e.g., that the debt was not due. Prior to the Act of 1880 an expired charge alone was not sufficient to establish insolvency, and the * "NOTE.— . . . There is no evidence of insolvency except the expired charge, and I am not disposed to hold that every expired charge for every debt, however small, is proof of notour bankruptcy against any debtor, however rich, more especially when the creditor has a power of sale, be it under a bond or a pawning, and shrinks at the same time from taking payment of his own debt in the readiest way, as also in proving his averment of insolvency if that averment be really true. But I am satisfied in this case the petitioners' own state of debt contains prima facie evidence of solvency. This state shews that within the last six months, or rather five months, the rents of the property exceeded the interests and outlays by £80, and that in that time the petitioners' debt had been reduced from £2000 to £1907. Therefore it seems to me that the petitioners can be under no reasonable and honest apprehension about the ultimate payment of their debt, and about the regular and termly payment of interest, that there is no prima facie evidence of insolvency, and that there is prima facie evidence that the process is attempted for some other and less justifiable object than the mere payment of debt."

<sup>1</sup> M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees, July 9, 1887, 14 R. 918.

<sup>2</sup> Bell's Comm. p. 317, 5th edit.; Black v. Watson, Nov. 29, 1881, 9 R. 167; Knowles v. Crooks and Balgarnie, Feb. 1, 1865, 3 Macph. 457, 37 Scot. Jur. 226; Teenan's Trustees v. Teenan, March 19, 1886, 13 R. 833.

No. 109. Debtors Act of 1880, which put a debtor so completely at the mercy of his creditor, ought to be very strictly construed, and the standard of evidence required to bring that Act into operation should be very high. Here insolvency was to be inferred solely on the strength of an expired charge nine months old, which could not give rise to any such presumption.

Mar. 16, 1889.
M'Nab v.
Clarke.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The appellants in this case are the creditors of the respondent, David Wilkie Clarke, under a bond and disposition in security, dated 13th October 1876, for £2000, under which Clarke and the other granters of the bond bound themselves to pay that sum conjunctly and severally, and conveyed certain heritable subjects in security for the debt.

On 24th January 1888 the respondent Clarke was charged under the personal obligation in the bond to pay the amount of the debt. The charge expired on 31st January, and on the same day the debtor brought a suspension of the charge. On 14th March the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber refused the note, and his interlocutor was adhered to on 26th May by this Division.

On 4th October the appellants intimated to the respondent, in terms of the Act of Sederunt 22d December 1882, that they intended to apply for an order for cessio, and they did so on 15th October.

It appears that the respondent lodged a caveat, the result being that both parties were heard before the Sheriff-substitute, who thereafter pronounced the interlocutor of 21st November, which is now appealed against.

In that interlocutor the Sheriff-substitute finds that “the pursuers’ averments and relative documentary evidence do not sufficiently warrant the granting of the petition.” He gives three reasons for this finding; the first is, “that they do not indicate any interest that the pursuers have to refrain from exercising the power of sale, and preferring another process manifestly penal and ruinous to their debtor.” Now, it is quite settled that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security is entitled to proceed either on the personal obligation in the bond or to exercise his power of sale. It is entirely in his discretion which he does, and I need only add that that was decided in the recent case of M'Whirter, 14 R. 918. There is nothing therefore in the Sheriff's first ground of judgment.

The Sheriff's second ground is, that “the intimation demanding payment and threatening cessio involves a pluris petitio in regard to the debt due, and was, moreover, made four days before it could appear that the charge for payment would be disobeyed.” With reference to the last observation, as I have already pointed out, it is not true in point of fact, because the charge expired on January 31st, and intimation of the petition was not given till October. With the doctrine of pluris petitio we have nothing to do, as it is admitted that the appellants are creditors of the respondent, and that is sufficient to entitle them to proceed with their petition.

The third ground is thus stated,—“The inference deducible from the documents does not amount to prima facie evidence of insolvency.” It is this last point which we have taken time to consider, but I am of opinion that it is equally ill-founded with the other reasons stated by the Sheriff. The question depends on a consideration of the terms of the Debtors Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), under which the cessio proceedings are taken. The 8th section of that Act provides that “any creditor of a debtor who is notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, or of this Act, may present a petition to the Sheriff of the county in which such debtor has his ordinary domicile setting forth that he (the debtor) is unable to pay his debts, and praying that he may be decerned to execute a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of his creditors, and that a trustee be appointed who shall take the management and disposal of his estate for such behoof, and such process shall be taken and deemed to be a process of cessio." To see what is notour bankruptcy under that Act we must turn to sec. 6, which provides that "In any case in which under the provisions of this Act imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment, followed by the expiry of the days of charge without payment . . ." That being so, sec. 9 shews what the Sheriff has to do when a petition for cessio is presented. It provides, subsec. 1, that "the Sheriff, if he is satisfied that there is prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy, shall issue a warrant appointing the petitioner to publish a notice in the Edinburgh Gazette intimating that such petition has been presented," and so on.

No. 109.
Mar. 16, 1889.
M'Nab v.
Clarke.

Now we have undoubtedly here one element of notour bankruptcy, viz, the expiry of the days of charge without payment being made, and, therefore, the only other thing to consider is whether there is prima facie evidence of insolvency. That is the question which the Sheriff has negatived. Now, we must first ascertain what is the meaning of "insolvency" in the sense of the Act. I think it just means present inability to pay. If a man cannot meet his obligations he is insolvent, and it is no answer for him to say that if he is given time to realise his means he will some day be able to pay.

If that is the meaning of "insolvency" then I think that the fact that the days of charge have expired without payment is prima facie evidence of insolvency; I do not see how there could be better prima facie evidence. The presumption is that the debt has not been paid because the debtor could not pay. It might be said that the debt was not paid because it was not really due, but that answer is not open here, for the charge has been under suspension since already, and as the suspension was refused, and payment has not yet been made, we must take it that the debtor cannot pay.

But we have further a statement of the Sheriff's grounds for thinking that he had not before him prima facie evidence of insolvency. At the end of his note he says,—“But I am satisfied in this case the petitioners' own state of debt contains prima facie evidence of solvency. This state shews that within the last six months, or rather five months, the rents of the property exceeded the interests and outlays by £80, and that in that time the petitioners' debt had been reduced from £2000 to £1907. Therefore it seems to me that the petitioners can be under no reasonable and honest apprehension about the ultimate payment of their debt, and about the regular and termly payment of interest, that there is no prima facie evidence of insolvency, and that there is prima facie evidence that the process is attempted for some other and less justifiable object than the mere payment of debt.” It is quite clear where the error of the Sheriff lies. He says that there is no prima facie evidence of insolvency, because the petitioners can be under no reasonable apprehension of ultimate payment. But as I have already stated the question is not one of ultimate payment, the question is whether there is evidence that the debtor can make present payment. It appears to me on the whole matter that there was here ample prima facie evidence of insolvency, and I have no doubt that when

No. 109. the expired charge was produced there was prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy, and that therefore the Sheriff should have gone on to grant the prayer of the petition. I think, therefore, we should remit to him to proceed with the petition.

Mar. 16, 1889.
M'Nab v.
Clarke.

LORD LEE.—My opinion is that the Sheriff-substitute has gone too fast in throwing out this petition. The case, as was explained to us, was before him on a caveat, and the only question therefore was, whether the petition should be entertained and proceeded with in terms of the statute. It was admitted at the bar that the Sheriff-substitute had erred in supposing that the charge had not expired when the notice was given. There was no dispute, at least no relevant dispute, that the petitioner was a creditor, and I think it impossible to hold that the application was vitiated, either by the fact that interest on the debt was calculated down to the date of presenting the petition, or by the expenses of presenting the petition being stated as a part of the claim. There was therefore a competent petition before the Sheriff.

The only point, therefore, for consideration is, whether there was prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy sufficient to entitle the petitioner to a warrant in terms of the 9th section of the Act. I think that the statute requires the Sheriff to consider this point, and that he is not bound to accept, as in all cases sufficient and conclusive, the fact that a charge for payment has expired. To constitute notour bankruptcy the statute requires that insolvency shall concur with the expired charge. But in the case of an undisputed debt, neither paid nor offered to be paid, I think that an expired charge is sufficient to raise a presumption of insolvency, and therefore affords prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy.

The provisions of the second and third subsections of clause 9, as to the procedure which is to follow, appear to me sufficient to enable the Sheriff to afford the bankrupt an opportunity at a later stage of shewing that the petition ought to be refused.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 110. MARGARET GRANT OR WEIR, Pursuer (Appellant).—A. J. Young—M'Lennan.

Mar. 16, 1889.
Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

THE COLTNESS IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—J. C. Thomson—C. S. Dickson.

Reparation—Title to sue—Parent and Child—Bastard.—Held that the mother of a bastard child has no title to sue an action of reparation in respect of his death.

MRS MARGARET WEIR raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Airdrie against the Coltness Iron Company, Limited. She averred that on 5th May 1888 her illegitimate son, James Grant, a workman in the defenders' employment, had been killed through their fault in one of their pits.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
1.

She further averred that the deceased had been born prior to her marriage with her husband Robert Weir, a miner, that Weir was not his father, that he (deceased) resided with her and contributed to her support, and that she was living apart from Weir.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No title to sue.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mair) repelled in hoc statu this plea, and before answer allowed a proof.*

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue for the trial of the cause.

The defenders opposed the motion, and argued;—There was no title in the mother of a bastard to sue for damages in respect of his death. The case of Renton referred to by the Sheriff-substitute was the only instance of such an action being entertained. The Court had been always careful not to extend the class of persons who might sue such actions, and had confined the class to (1) husbands and wives; (2) fathers and mothers of legitimate children; and (3) legitimate children. The Court had refused to entertain such actions at the instance of a sister in respect of the death of her brother.<sup>1</sup> It would be anomalous to exclude that relation and to include the relation of bastards to their parents. The pursuer had a husband and legitimate children to support her if indigent, and therefore she could not have obtained support from the deceased.<sup>2</sup> In England a mother could not sue in respect of the death of a bastard child, for Lord Campbell's Act gave no such title.

Argued for the pursuer;—The mother of a bastard son was, it might be, as much injured in her feelings by his death from fault as the mother of a legitimate son. She had also the same right to support from him if indigent.<sup>3</sup> The cases quoted for the defenders shewed that on these two * "NOTE— . . . The defenders plead first, that the pursuer has no title to sue. . . . The first of these pleas raises the question whether the mother of an illegitimate child has a title to sue an action of damages and solatium for the death of the child. So far as I am aware, this question has never been authoritatively decided by the supreme Court. Cases of reparation have hitherto been confined to fathers and mothers and their lawful children, and in the two cases of Greenhorn v. Addie, 13th June 1855, 17 D. 860, and Eisten v. North British Railway, 13th July 1870, 8 Macph. 980, the Court has refused to sustain the title of brothers and sisters to sue such actions. In the latter case, however, the Lord President (Inglist) observed,—‘It appears to me that the true foundation of this claim is partly nearness of relationship between the deceased and the person claiming on account of the death, and partly the existence during life, as between the deceased and the claimant, of a mutual obligation of support in case of necessity. On these two considerations in combination, our law has held that a person standing in one of these relations to the deceased may sue an action like this for solatium where he can qualify no real damage, and for pecuniary loss in addition where such loss can be proved.’

“In the present case the deceased was the pursuer's illegitimate son, and there can be no doubt, as between the two, there existed during life a mutual obligation of support in case of necessity. In the recent case of Samson v. Davie, 26th November 1886, 14 Rettie, 113, it was held that a bastard son was liable to maintain his mother. This, in my opinion, is sufficient for the disposal of the defenders' plea. But the question was raised in the case of Renton v. North British Railway, 1869, to be found only in the 6th volume of the Scottish Law Reporter, 255, in which it was held by Lord Jerviswoode (Ordinary) that the mother of an ‘illegitimate child has a title to sue an action of damages and solatium for the death of her child.’ So far as appears, the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was acquiesced in. . . .”

<sup>1</sup> Greenhorn v. Addie, June 13, 1855, 17 D. 860; Eisten v. North British Railway Co., July 13, 1870, 8 Macph. 980, 42 Scot. Jur. 575.

<sup>2</sup> Samson v. Davie, Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 113.

No. 110. considerations in combination the title to sue rested. They were not both present in the case of brother and sister, and that was the reason of the judgment in the cases of Greenhorn and Eisten.
 Mar. 16, 1889. At advising,—
Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action by the mother of a bastard. It is raised in respect of injuries received by the bastard (who was a young man of twenty, residing with the pursuer) in a coal-pit in which he worked. In consequence of the injuries he died, and the action is raised for damages and solatium for his death. The preliminary defence is stated that the pursuer has no title to sue. The Sheriff-substitute has repelled the plea, and decided that the mother of a bastard has a title to sue an action of damages for solatium for the death of the child. He says,—“So far as I am aware, this question has never been authoritatively decided by the supreme Court. Cases of reparation have hitherto been confined to fathers and mothers and their lawful children, and in the two cases of Greenhorn v. Addie, 13th June 1855, 17 D. 860, and Eisten v. North British Railway, 13th July 1870, 8 Macph. 980, the Court has refused to sustain the title of brothers or sisters to sue such actions. In the latter case, however, the Lord President (Inglis) observed,—‘It appears to me that the true foundation of this claim is partly nearness of relationship between the deceased and the person claiming on account of the death, and partly the existence during life between the deceased and the claimant of a mutual obligation of support in case of necessity. On these two considerations in combination, our law has held that a person standing in one of these relations to the deceased may sue an action like this for solatium, where he can qualify no real damage, and for pecuniary loss in addition where such loss can be proved.’”

I think it is accurately stated in what I have read that, with one exception, to which I shall immediately allude, no such action as that now before us has been sustained. Cases of reparation have, as the Sheriff-substitute says (apart from the case of spouses) been confined to fathers and mothers and their lawful children. There is therefore no custom,—that is, no common law,—extending the title beyond fathers and mothers and their legitimate children. Nor is there any statute extending the right to sue further. In England the law on the subject is wholly statutory. It depends on Lord Campbell’s Act, and that Act gives no right to recover at the instance of the parent against a person who by his fault has caused an injury to a bastard child of that parent. That is the latest expression of the view of the Legislature on the subject. There is therefore neither practice, which is just common law, nor statute which can be cited in support of the action.

It seems, indeed, that in one such action—an action by a mother for the death of her illegitimate child—the title to sue was sustained by Lord Jervis-woode. His Lordship repelled the plea of no title to sue, and that case went no further. The question remains open for us, notwithstanding that decision in the Outer-House, for I cannot regard that solitary expression of opinion by a Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House as evidence of the state of the common law.

Another case which was laid before us in argument was the recent decision in Samson v. Davie, 14 R. 113, in which it was held in this Division of the Court that a bastard son was liable to an inspector of poor in relief of advances made to his mother. If that case were decisive of the present we should have required further argument, and probably a consultation with other Judges, before coming to the conclusion to which we have come. But I think it is not conclusive of the present. I dissented from the opinion of the majority, and am still, for my own part, of the opinion I then expressed, and I think the case merits reconsideration. I may mention, as another reason for its being reconsidered on a fitting occasion, that the parties, I have been informed, after an appeal had been taken to the House of Lords, settled the case on the footing that the judgment should be held as reversed, with costs. But it is sufficient for the present purpose that the case does not rule the present. The question here is one of title to sue, and I am of opinion that the pursuer has no title to sue. In our practice in Scotland we have limited the right to sue to parents and legitimate children, and there is no authority for extending it. If that practice is thought to limit it too much there must be legislation on the matter. I do not know whether if there were such it would be thought fit by the Legislature to make the law in Scotland different in this respect from the law as the statute which regulates the matter in England has fixed it. Probably that would not be done.

No. 110.
Mar. 16, 1889.
Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

These actions are of a somewhat anomalous character. When children sue in respect of the death of a father they sue the wrongdoer as a body or family. If a man who had numerous children, some of them out in the world and others living in family with him, were killed through the fault of a wrongdoer, each individual child could not bring an action for his death, so that if there were a dozen children there would be a dozen actions. They could sue only all as a family, and their one action would be for distribution of the compensation among all who suffered.

Again, it was argued that wherever the feelings of the relative were grievously injured there might be an action for solatium against the party in fault. But that cannot be maintained as an accurate proposition in law, for the law refuses actions at the instance of a sister for her brother's death, or at the instance of a brother for that of a sister. Yet the brother and sister may have lived many years together, and loved each other as much as it is possible for people to do, and the death of the brother may have deprived the sister of her home. But yet the law does not allow an action in such circumstances.

I think it would be a source of great perplexity if we admitted such actions. A woman might have many bastards, and if this case were decided otherwise than we propose to do she might have an action for the death of each of them from fault, and in like manner each of them would have an action for her death. That would surely be extravagant. I think that there must be some limit, and that it should be according to our customary law, which does not extend the title to sue further than the case of parents and their legitimate children.

I therefore am of opinion that we should sustain the plea of no title to sue, and dismiss this action.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, sustained the plea of no title to sue, and dismissed the action.

THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C.—W. G. L. WINCHESTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 111.

MARY CAIRNS, Pursuer (Appellant).—*Law.*CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—R. Johnstone.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Cairns v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Reparation—Railway—Master and Servant—Reasonable precautions for safety of workmen.—A surfaceman in the employment of a railway company was killed, when engaged in work on a siding, by being struck by the tender of an engine which was proceeding, tender first, along the siding towards an engine-shed. It was necessary to take the engine in that way to the engine-shed, and it was not being driven at excessive speed. The engine-driver's view of the place where the deceased and the men working with him were engaged was obstructed by the coals on the tender till it was too late to avert the accident. No other precaution to warn the deceased had been taken than a whistle from the engine, but this, owing to frequent whistling and other noises at the place in question, had not attracted notice.

In an action by the widow of the deceased against the railway company for damages for his death, held that the defenders were responsible for the accident, in respect that they had failed to take precautions for securing that the line should be cleared before engines moving tender first were allowed to pass the place at which the accident occurred.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
I.

MRS MARY CAIRNS raised an action against the Caledonian Railway Company for damages in respect of the death of her husband, Francis Cairns, surfaceman, Lochee, through the fault, as she alleged, of the defenders.

The pursuer's husband was a surfaceman in the defenders' employment. On 8th July 1887 he was killed on the defenders' line in the following circumstances. He was engaged on the morning of that day, along with other surfacemen, in "packing sleepers" on a siding between the end of Magdalen Green, Dundee, and the defenders' passenger station in Union Street there. The siding was one leading from the main line between Dundee and Perth to an engine-shed, and was one of a large number of sidings covering a breadth of several hundred yards. Many engines passed over these sidings in the course of the day, and there was necessarily a great deal of noise from shunting of waggons and whistling of engines. While the deceased was engaged at work about seven o'clock A.M., an engine which had brought a goods train from Carlisle overnight and had cast it off at the goods station, which lay somewhat to the east of the point at which the surfacemen were working, had to return towards the engine-shed, to the west of that point. In order to do this, it had to proceed along the part of the siding at which the sleepers were being packed, and as the turning-tables were at the engine-shed and not at the goods station, it had to proceed backwards, having the tender in which the coals were heaped up in front. The engine-driver whistled before leaving the goods-shed at the main line, but owing to the frequency of whistling at the place, or to some other cause, his whistle did not attract the attention of the surfacemen. The engine-driver was engaged leaning over the side of the engine watching whether a certain signal dropped, and whether the points were clear, when he suddenly observed the surfacemen. At that time the engine was about fifty yards from them, and travelling at the rate of about twelve miles an hour. He at once whistled, and did all he could to bring the engine to a stand. The men did not, however, observe him in time for them all to escape, and the engine was only brought to a stand just as the tender struck the deceased. One of the wheels of it ran over him, and he was mortally injured.

The above facts were admitted or proved.

The pursuer further averred that it was the duty and custom of the defenders to have a flagman or other person to watch the sidings and lines in order to warn the surfacemen of danger, and to warn the drivers of approaching engines. It was not, however, proved that it was the custom to provide a man to perform this duty, and the defenders led evidence to shew that there was no such custom where men were working in such a place as that in question. No. 111.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Cairns v. Calderonian Railway Co.

On 8th August 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on or about 8th July 1887 the pursuer's late husband, while working on the defenders' line of railway, was struck down by a tender driven in front of an engine, and sustained injuries from which he died in a few hours: Finds that his death occurred through the fault of the defenders, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer: Therefore finds the defenders liable in damages; assesses the same at £40 sterling, for which decerns in favour of the pursuer."*

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Thomson), who on 6th October 1888 recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, sustained the defences, and assolizied the defenders.†

* "NOTE.— . . . Several very slight and inexpensive precautions might have prevented the loss of this man's life. I do not know enough of railway matters to be able so much as to guess at them all; but I feel perfectly certain that it would not have required much intelligence and inventive skill, applied by anticipation, to have prevented this man's death; and I am of opinion that it is the duty of railway companies to devise special precautions for special localities—such as this crowded, noisy locality, in order to avoid the sacrifice of human life, even to the extent of trying to preserve men and women against their own negligence. Now, the death in question could have been prevented had there been a man or boy or even a woman watching for the safety of the squad (and many a maimed victim of previous accidents would be glad to watch at a small remuneration); it could have been prevented by the use of a red flag, or rather of two red flags; it could have been prevented by placing fog-signals at a moderate distance from the squad, or a spring gun that the engine would fire, or a bell that it would ring in passing, and in many other ways. . . ."

† "NOTE.— . . . The only fault alleged by her on record is the failure to place 'a flagman or other person to watch the said sidings and lines, in order to warn the drivers of any approaching train or engines, and also to warn the deceased of any approaching danger.'

"The whole circumstances of the unfortunate occurrence, and also the practice of the defenders, and of other railway companies, have been fully gone into in the proof, and if it had been established that the defenders had been guilty of neglect which led to the death of the pursuer's husband, other than that specially averred on record, I should not have hesitated to make them answerable.

"But I am of opinion that no fault or neglect on the part of the defenders has been proved.

"On the one hand the deceased accepted an employment attended with a considerable amount of hazard, and which imposed upon him the duty while at work of keeping a sharp look-out for his own safety. On the other hand the defenders were bound to adopt all usual and reasonable precautions to insure his safety. 'Reasonable' is not an absolute or intrinsic but a relative term, and I understand the law on the subject to be that those precautions will be deemed reasonable which a man of ordinary prudence and experience could, with due regard to the circumstances and nature of the business, be expected to adopt.

"Now, it appears that no such precaution as that desiderated by the pursuer on record, nor any of those suggested by the Sheriff-substitute are considered necessary, or have ever been adopted, or are in the view of practical men desirable. If that be so, it seems to me that the defenders are not to blame for their non-adoption."

No. 111. The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.
At advising,—

Mar. 19, 1889.
Cairns v. Caledonian Railway Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer is the widow of a surfaceman who was at the time of his death employed by the Caledonian Railway Company on their line between Dundee and Perth. The circumstances in which he met his death are simple, and I do not think that there is much doubt as to the particulars. The deceased was one of a gang of surfacemen who were making some repairs on the line at a place where there were numerous sidings by which goods trains are taken into or out from the loading-sheds. The place of the accident is not on, but it is near the place where the siding joins, the main line. The accident occurred thus. A goods train which had come by night from Carlisle, was on the morning of 8th July 1887 run into one of these sidings. The practice was for the engine to be shunted on to another line by which it ran back towards the main line, so as to reach the engine-shed, and so get on to a turn-table to be turned. To accomplish this, the engine had to be run out tender first. The platelayers were working at this line, by which it had to approach the main line. The tender, heaped up to some extent with coals, being in front, the driver was not able to see directly ahead of him. He was engaged in looking to see if a particular point was in its proper position for his engine, when at the last moment he observed the platelayers. He did all he could to avoid the accident which was then imminent, but the deceased was struck by the tender. One of its wheels passed over him, and he suffered fatal injuries. There is no reason to suppose that the driver had not whistled before he backed his engine, and so far as he was concerned, I do not think blame can be attached to him. Some argument was offered as to the rate of speed at which the engine was going. The speed seems to have been about ten or twelve miles an hour. If anything turned on that matter, I think I could not have held it to be an excessive speed, but the case does not in my opinion depend on that question at all.

These being the circumstances, the question is whether the defenders are liable for the accident by reason of their not having taken proper precautions for the safety of their men. The circumstances, it will be observed, are somewhat different from those in which the surfacemen and the engine-driver find themselves when work is being done upon a main line. In that case the surfacemen have a view of the line for some distance, and know on what line the train must come, while the engine-driver has also a view of the line for a considerable distance, and can see the surfacemen and give them warning of his approach by whistling. An accident of the kind on the main line is therefore of somewhat rare occurrence. But in such a case as the present the defenders must have known that an engine could only proceed in circumstances which made it difficult, indeed impossible, for the engine-driver to keep a proper look-out, and also that the place is one in which whistling must be very frequent, and in which, therefore, the ordinary modes taken for giving the alarm to those who may be in the way, and conveying the information to them that an engine is approaching, are inapplicable. After much consideration and frequent consultation with your Lordships, I have reached the conclusion that the defenders were not justified in having taken no special precautions to meet the necessities of the case, the ordinary precautions used to indicate and avoid danger not being available. In this case we have the concurrence of the circumstances that the engine must go backwards, that the driver can get no proper view in front of him, that the place, as the Sheriff-substitute mentions, No. 111. was one in which the many signals which were being given made ordinary whistling unavailable as a precaution for surfacemen on the line. I agree with a remark of the Sheriff that "the deceased accepted an employment attended with a considerable amount of hazard, and which imposed upon him the duty, while at work, of keeping a sharp look-out for his safety." But at the same time that circumstance does not absolve the defenders from the duty of taking precautions adapted to the particular circumstances of the place. As to the question what precautions were necessary, it appears to me that a very simple precaution would have been to have forbidden any driver to pass the place until intimation was made to him by hand or flag signal that the line was clear. The deceased could not have been expected when engaged at his work to observe the approaching engine himself. An engine approaching at a slow speed would make but a slight noise, which he would be unlikely to observe. But there could have been no accident if the driver had been debarred from passing over the place until he was signalled to come forward.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Cairns v. Caledonian Railway Co.

I am, on these grounds, of opinion that the defenders were in fault, and that the pursuer is entitled to damages.

On the question of the amount of damages which ought to be awarded, I think that a sum of £100 would be a proper award.

LORD YOUNG and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that on the occasion libelled the deceased Francis Cairns, husband of the pursuer, while engaged with other surfacemen in ballasting a siding of the defenders' railway leading from the main line from Dundee to Perth to their engine-sheds was knocked down and mortally injured by the tender of an engine belonging to the defenders which was being shunted from the goods siding tender first, and that it could not be brought out of the goods siding in any other way; that the driver of the engine was prevented from seeing him by the tender with its load of coals which was being backed in front of the engine, and it was only when stretching out to see a point on the line that he caught sight of the workmen, and instantly pulled up the engine, but not in time to avoid them; that the place at which the deceased was working was one at which there was much noise and whistling from railway engines; that the accident was due to the fault of the defenders in failing to take precautions for securing that the line should be cleared before engines, moving tender first, were allowed to pass at such a place as that in which deceased was working, and that they are liable in damages to the pursuer accordingly: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against: Affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute in so far as said interlocutor pronounces findings on fact and in law: Recall said interlocutor in so far as it assesses damages at £40: Ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £100 in name of damages."

ALEXANDER NICHOLSON, S.S.C.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 112. CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Balfour—

R. Johnstone—C. J. Guthrie.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Chisholm.

JOHN CHISHOLM, Defender (Respondent).—*Sir Charles Pearson—
C. S. Dickson.*

Expenses—Incidental procedure in cause—Reservation followed by general decree for expenses.—Held that where the expenses of any incidental procedure in a cause are reserved, they fall to be dealt with by the Court which disposes of the general question of expenses, and that a general finding for expenses covers the expenses so reserved.

1st DIVISION. M. IN an action at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company against John Chisholm, sack-contractor, Perth, for payment of an account in respect of the carriage of the defender's sacks over the company's lines of railway, the pursuers lodged with the summons an account as the basis of their claim.

After a considerable amount of procedure the pursuers lodged another account in process which they proposed to substitute for that originally lodged.

On 30th October 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) refused to allow the substitution.

On a reclaiming note the First Division, on 10th December 1886, recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and allowed the record to be amended, by substituting one account for the other, "reserving all questions of expenses."

On 13th March 1888 the Lord Ordinary assolized the defender, and found "the defender entitled to expenses."

On 8th February 1889 the First Division on a reclaiming note adhered, and found "the defender entitled to additional expenses," and remitted his account to the Auditor to be taxed.

The Auditor, on 15th March 1889, taxed the expenses:—"Reserving for the determination of the Court the question of the liability of the pursuers for the Inner-House expenses claimed by the defender in connection with the reclaiming note for the pursuers against Lord M'Laren's interlocutor of 30th October 1886, amounting, as taxed by me, and noted on the margin of the account, to the sum of twenty-four pounds fourteen shillings (£24, 14s.), included in the taxed amount now reported."*

When the report came before the Court for approval the defender, inter alia, submitted that the expenses in question ought to be allowed.<sup>1</sup>

* In a note to his report the Auditor stated:—"It humbly appears to me that this portion of the account should be disallowed; the substitution of the one account for the other did not in any way affect the conclusions of the summons or even the amount sued for. The pursuers, by reclaiming, obtained what they sought from the Lord Ordinary, and while I think it only reasonable that they should pay the expenses incurred by the defender in the Outer-House discussion, I consider it too great a penalty that, after succeeding in obtaining a recall of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, they should have to pay, in addition to their own Inner-House expenses, the expenses incurred by the defender in opposing them unsuccessfully. The reservation attached to the Inner-House interlocutor might, I assume, have been obtained from the Lord Ordinary. Of course all previous expenses properly incurred by the defender, in connection with the account No. 6, and rendered of no avail by the substitution of No. 34, must be allowed, and in the audit I have endeavoured to give effect to this view. In regard to this point, I have only to add, that while in the great majority of cases 'reserved expenses' follow the issue of the cause, it has been held by the Court that there is no absolute rule withdrawing such expenses from the consideration of the Auditor."

<sup>1</sup> Authorities cited.—Macfie v. Blair, Dec. 12, 1884, 22 S. L. R. 224; Gardiners v. Victoria Estates Co., Limited, Oct. 27, 1885, 13 R. 80.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As regards the question of expenses reserved by the Auditor, I am of opinion that where expenses are reserved in some incidental procedure, such as a reclaiming note on a point of form, or where expenses are incurred at such a stage in the course of an action that the Court does not think itself in such a position that it would be convenient or reasonable then to dispose of the question, the reservation means that the expenses shall fall under the general account of the winning party. There may be reasons for suggesting to the Court or to the Lord Ordinary that they ought not so to be dealt with, but if it is intended to raise that question the unsuccessful party should bring it under the view of the Judge when deciding as to the general expenses in the cause, and if he does not do so then, the general finding must be held to include the reserved expenses.

No. 112.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Caledonian
Railway Co. v.
Chisholm.

Here Lord M'Laren, on 13th March 1888, assolizied the defender, and found him entitled to expenses, and that finding, I think, included the expenses reserved in our interlocutor of 10th December 1886. If it did not include those expenses, then the case might have been in a curious position, for the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 13th March 1888 might have been acquiesced in, and in that case these expenses must have remained reserved till the end of time, and never could have been disposed of.

I am fortified in my view in this case by the case of Gardiner, and I see that in the case of Macfie v. Blair there is a judgment of Lord Kinnear to the same effect as my opinion in Gardiner's case. That judgment was not brought under review, but there is a very valuable note to the same effect as I have already stated on the question of reserved expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I entirely concur. It has always been my idea that where any expenses are reserved for the consideration of the Court the question as to them must be disposed of by the Court which decides the general question of expenses, whether that Court be the Lord Ordinary or the Inner-House, and therefore I think that, when Lord M'Laren found the defender entitled to expenses generally, these reserved expenses were included in the finding.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. In my opinion, where any question of expenses is reserved, the meaning is that it is reserved for the Lord Ordinary, or for the Court, as the case may be, to decide when the general question of expenses is dealt with. If any special ground is stateable by the unsuccessful party why the reserved expenses should not fall under the general finding, he should bring that before the Lord Ordinary or the Court when the general expenses are being disposed of. That was not done here, and therefore I think these reserved expenses fall under the general finding.

I know no ground for saying that the Auditor is in such circumstances to come into the position of the Court, and to apply his mind to the question whether the reserved expenses should be allowed or not. That is the position he seems to take up here, but I think it is quite unwarranted.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT allowed the defender the expenses in question.

HOPK, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 113. SCOTTISH UNION AND NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—
Jameson.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Scottish Union
and National
Insurance Co.
v. Surveyor of Taxes.

JAMES S. SMILES (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Expenses—Case under Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19), sec. 59—Expenses of preparation and adjustment.—Held that the expenses of preparation and adjustment of a case stated under sec. 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, incurred before the case is sent to the roll, are not proper charges against the unsuccessful party in the case.

1ST DIVISION.
M. (SEE ante, p. 461.)

In this case, stated by the Commissioners of Income-Tax, the appellants were found entitled to expenses.

In taxing their account the Auditor disallowed, inter alia, all charges in connection with the preparation and adjusting of the case before it appeared on the rolls of Court.

When the Auditor's report came before the Court for approval the appellants objected to those charges being disallowed, and argued;—By the Act under which this case was stated the Court had power to pronounce such order as they saw fit with regard to expenses.* This case was very complicated, and there had been much difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory case stating the facts and determination as required by the statute. A great part of the case was prepared by the appellants at the request of the Commissioners.

Counsel for the Surveyor of Taxes was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court knows nothing about such a case as this till it is presented to them for consideration, and we are instructed by the statute that such cases are to be prepared by the Commissioners of Income-Tax. When the case is presented we have nothing to do but to hear parties on it, and therefore the expenses we have to award are, I think, just what would be called in ordinary cases "expenses of process," and such expenses do not include the expense of wranglings with the Commissioners as to the statement of the case. I think the Auditor was right in disallowing these expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT approved the Auditor's report.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—DAVID CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

---

* Sec. 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, provides,—(1) That anyone, if dissatisfied with the Commissioners' determination as being erroneous in point of law, may "require the Commissioners, by notice in writing addressed to their clerk, to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court thereon. The case shall set forth the facts and the determination. . . . (2) The High Court shall hear and determine the questions of law arising on a case transmitted under this Act, . . . and may make such order as to costs as to the High Court may seem fit."

WILLIAM AITON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—Murray. No. 114.

JOHN DUGUID MILNE AND ANOTHER (Russell's Executors), Defenders
(Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Begg. Mar. 19, 1889.

Aiton v.
Russell's
Executors.

Superior and Vassal—Personal obligation in feu-contract—Obligation on vassal, "his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever."—A feu-contract bore that the vassal "binds and obliges himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever" to make payment of a certain sum in name of feu-duty. The vassal having died, his heir declined to take up the feu. In an action against the vassal's executors for payment of the feu-duties which had become due since his death, and for damages for breach of contract, in failing to take up the feu on the heir declining to do so, held (1) that there was no obligation upon the executors to pay feu-duties accruing after the date of the vassal's death, and (2) that they were not liable in damages for breach of contract.

By feu-contract, dated 17th and 26th September 1879, and recorded 6th November following, William Aiton, of Boddam, Aberdeenshire, disposed to James G. F. Russell of Aden, "and his heirs and assignees as after mentioned," certain portions of ground, amounting to over nine acres, being part of the lands of Boddam adjoining Mr Russell's property of Buchanness. It was expressly provided that the portions of ground so disposed should remain attached to Buchanness, and that they should "in all time coming descend to and be acquired by the heirs and successors" of Mr Russell in Buchanness Lodge and grounds.

The clause dealing with the payment of feu-duty was as follows:—"For which causes, and on the other part, the said James George Ferguson Russell binds and obliges himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever to make payment to the said William Aiton, and his heirs and assignees, of the sum of £117, 15s. sterling yearly, being at the rate of £12 per imperial acre, in name of feu-duty for the said pieces of ground and others hereby disposed, and that at the term of Martinmas yearly, beginning the first term's payment thereof at the term of Martinmas next, 1879, for the year ending at that date, and so forth yearly in all time thereafter."

Mr James G. F. Russell died on 15th April 1887 and was succeeded in the entailed estates of Aden and others, including Buchanness Lodge, by his brother Colonel F. S. Russell. By Mr Russell's will he bequeathed his whole personal estate to his wife, and appointed Mr J. D. Milne of Melgum, Aberdeenshire, and another, his executors.

The feu-duty above mentioned was paid down to Martinmas 1886.

Colonel Russell on succeeding to the estates refused to take up the feu.

On 12th March 1888 Mr Aiton brought an action against the executors for payment of £117, 15s., the feu-duty due at Martinmas 1887, and for damages for breach of contract.

The pursuer averred that on the declinature of the heir to take up the feu the pursuer had called upon the executors to pay the feu-duties, and also either to take up the feu or to pay damages, but that they had refused to do so.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders, as executors foresaid, are due and resting owing to the pursuer the feu-duty payable for year ending at Martinmas last to the superior under the said feu-contract, or, at least, the proportion thereof to the date of Mr Russell's death. (2) The defenders, as executors foresaid, are liable to the pursuer in implement of the obligations in his favour contained in the foresaid contract of feu. (3) In consequence of the breach of said contract as condescended upon, the said defenders are liable to the pursuer in damages as concluded for.

No. 114.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Aiton v.
Russell's
Executors.

The defenders tendered £50 of the feu-duty so far as accrued up to the day of the deceased's death.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant. (2) On a sound construction of the feu-contract libelled, the present defenders are not liable for any feu-duties after the death of the vassal, the late Mr Russell. (4) No damages are due, in respect that there has been no breach of contract or fault on the part of the late vassal or the present defenders, and, separatim, that the pursuer has suffered no damage.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 12th June 1888, gave decree for the £50; quoad ultra sustained the first and second pleas for the defenders, and in respect thereof assoilzied the defenders.*

---

* "OPINION.—This action is founded upon a feu-contract between the pursuer and the late Mr James Russell of Aden, in Aberdeenshire, by virtue of which Mr Russell held certain lands under the pursuer from 1879 till his death on 15th April 1887. The pursuer avers that the heir of line of the deceased vassal has refused to take up the feu, or to perform the obligations incumbent on the vassal; and, in consequence of this declinature, he claims a right to recover from the defenders, as the late Mr Russell's executors, the feu-duty which fell due at Martinmas 1887, the term following their author's death, and £2000 as damages for breach of contract.

"I do not think it doubtful that the vassal's executors are liable for the feu-duties accruing due during his lifetime; and I shall accordingly give decree for £50, which is admitted to be the proportion of the feu-duty payable at Martinmas 1879 corresponding to the period of Mr Russell's survivance of the last term. But I think it equally clear in law that no action lies against the executors, either for feu-duties accruing due since the last vassal's death, or for damages in respect of the heir's failure to enter.

"The obligation for payment of the feu-duty is in the usual terms. The feuar binds himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever; and there can be no question as to the construction of such an obligation in a feu-contract. It must be read, as the Lord President explains in The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, 11 R. 590, as an obligation on the original feuar himself, 'so long as he remains vassal and lives, and, after his death, on his heirs and executors for payment of arrears, and on his successors in the feu, for payment of the feu-duty in the future.' It is possible for the feuar to bind his heirs, executors, and successors, so as to make them all liable, jointly and severally, to fulfil the whole obligations of the feu; and the case just cited is a good instance of such a contract. But in the present case there is no room for a construction which would make the several successors of the original feuar liable singuli in solidum. The feuar binds himself, so long as he lives and continues to be the vassal in the feu, in the whole prestations of the contract; he binds his successor in the feu in like manner in the whole obligations of the contract after his death; and he binds his heirs and executors for the arrears, which may be due at his death, and for nothing more. The pursuer's counsel accordingly did not maintain in argument that the executors would continue liable along with the successor in the feu-right, if the latter had completed a title, and entered with the superior. But if they are not liable jointly with the heir of the investiture, there appears to me to be no ground in law upon which they can be made liable for future prestations at all. The several liabilities of the successor in the feu on the one hand and the personal representatives of the deceased vassal on the other are perfectly clear and distinct; and if there be no joint liability, I am unable to see any reasonable ground for subjecting representatives, who cannot succeed to the feu, to the liabilities attaching only to the vassal.

"But it is said that there is no successor in the feu, because the heir of the investiture declines to take up the estate; and therefore that the representatives of the first vassal must be liable for the feu-duties, because his liability can only be extinguished delegatione, by the substitution of a new vassal in his room.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—1. In a feu-contract there was a double liability (1) on tenure; and (2) on contract. Each liability might be extinguished delegatione. Where there was no extinction delegatione, there was a continuing liability on the part of the executors of a deceased vassal for payment of feu-duties until the executry estate was exhausted. This had not yet been decided in a case of feu, but it had been so decided by Lords Gifford and Shand in a case of lease.<sup>1</sup> In a lease there was a personal contract on the part of the tenant and his representatives to pay the tack-duty, which, when the lease was assignable, could be got rid of by assignation.<sup>2</sup> The defenders here left the contractual relation which existed between superior and vassal out of sight. The existence of the double relation was supported by the authority of the case of Shaw,<sup>3</sup> where the opinions of the majority of the Judges proceeded upon that footing. The view stated by Bankton<sup>4</sup> that there was no such contractual relation in the constitution of a feu-right had since been held to be wrong; and the results which he said would flow from the existence of such a relation must therefore follow, viz., that there would then be a personal action for payment of feu-duties. The case of the Police Commissioners of Dundee,<sup>5</sup> founded on by the Lord Ordinary, applied only where there was a successor in the feu. The case of Burns,<sup>6</sup> in which the decision in the Dundee case was approved, did not advance the matter further. The dicta of the consulted Judges in Stewart's

No. 114.

Mar. 19, 1889.

Aiton v.

Russell's

Executors.

I know of no authority for this proposition. It is not, in my opinion, supported by the case of Hyslop v. Shaw, on which the pursuer's counsel relied. It was held, in that case, that an entered vassal continues liable for feu-duties, even after he has sold the lands, until a new vassal shall have entered with the superior. But the ground of judgment was that the disponent continues vassal until the entry of the disponent, and therefore cannot escape from the liabilities attaching to that character. This is perfectly consistent with the doctrine laid down by the Lord President in the case of Straton, that the original feuar remains liable 'so long as he lives, and continues vassal'; but he ceases to be vassal when he dies. His death vacates the feu, and the whole rights and liabilities of the feu-contract or feu-charter, if he has not disposed the estates during his life, thereupon pass to the heir of the investiture. No one else can take the place of the deceased vassal, or be affected by liabilities which are inseparable from the tenure. If the heir does not choose to enter, the superior had his remedy by declarator of non-entry under the old law, and he has an analogous remedy under the Statute of 1874. But there is no authority in principle or precedent for sustaining a personal action against representatives who have no right to the character of vassal, and no title to take up the feu. The only ground on which such an action could be maintained is that of personal obligation imposed upon the deceased vassal's representatives by a special stipulation for that purpose. Whether there is such an obligation in any particular feu-contract, is a question of construction, and in the present case the construction of the contract does not appear to me to be doubtful.

"I am unable to follow the reasoning upon which it is proposed to subject the defenders in damages. If they are liable for the feu-duties, their liability must be limited to the amount actually due. If they are not liable they have committed no breach of contract."

<sup>1</sup> Bethune v. Morgan, Dec. 16, 1874, 2 R. 186.

<sup>2</sup> Skene v. Greenhill, May 20, 1825, 4 S. 25.

<sup>3</sup> Hyslop v. Shaw, &c., March 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 535, Lord Deas, p. 581; cf. also Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch, June 26, 1817, F. C.; Hunter v. Boog, Dec. 16, 1834, 13 S. 205, vide p. 208; Prudential Assurance Co., Limited, v. Cheyne, June 4, 1884, 11 R. 871.

<sup>4</sup> Bankton, ii. 144.

<sup>5</sup> Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, Feb. 22, 1884, 11 R. 586.

<sup>6</sup> Burns v. Martin, Feb. 14, 1887, 14 R. (H. L.) 20.

No. 114. case<sup>1</sup> relating to the extinction of such obligations delegation in a feu-contract supported the reclaimer's argument as strongly as those in the Dundee case supported the respondents'. None of the cases cited on the other side touched the case of the death of the vassal. The death operated a divestiture of the person of the vassal merely; the contractual liability still remained an obligation against his estate. 2. The pursuer was further entitled to damages for breach of contract.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Aiton v.
Russell's
Executors.

Argued for the respondents;—1. The case turned upon the construction of the words "binds and obliges himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever." These were the ordinary words of style by which a vassal bound himself to pay feu-duty, and they did not impose any different liability from that imposed by the reddendo clause in a feu-charter.<sup>2</sup> In the feu-charter the obligation to pay feu-duty arose out of the principle of the tenure, and ceased with the tenure. There was no difference between a feu-contract and a feu-charter in regard to the obligation. The only difference was in the enforcement of it, the registration clause in the contract providing for the use of summary diligence. In either case divestiture put an end to the vassal's liability. Divestiture took place either (1) by death; or (2) by delegation. It had never been suggested that the personal representatives of the vassal were liable for more than the arrears due at his death, or that there was a continuing liability imported by the ordinary words of style.<sup>3</sup> It was different with a ground-annual, but the law relating to ground-annuals and leases had no bearing on the present question.<sup>4</sup> The case of the Police Commissioners of Dundee was differentiated from the present, as was clear from the opinions in that case, by the use of the words "conjunctly and severally." The Lord Ordinary was therefore right. 2. As to the conclusion for damages, it could not be said that there was default on the part of the deceased, still less was there on the part of the defenders. The pursuer's only remedy in the circumstances was a declarator of non-entry.<sup>5</sup>

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr Russell of Aden died on 15th April 1887. He had been for some years a vassal of the pursuer under a feu-contract, dated in 1879. The heir of investiture is not inclined to take up the succession to the feu, and will not enter, and the consequence is that the pursuer as superior has brought this action against Mr Russell's executors for the purpose of compelling them to pay the feu-duty for the feu in question for the year ending Martinmas 1887, and he also concludes for £2000 in name of damages for breach of contract.

<sup>1</sup> Stewart v. M'Callum, Feb. 14, 1868, 6 Macph. 382, at p. 390-91; cf. also The King's College of Aberdeen v. Lady James Hay, March 11, 1852, 14 D. 675, 24 Scot. Jur. 342, H. L., August 11, 1854, 1 Macq. 526; Stair, ii. 3, 34.

<sup>2</sup> Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 133; Juridical Styles, 3d ed., vol. i., p. 32.

<sup>3</sup> Peddle v. Gibson, Feb. 27, 1846, 8 D. 560 (Lord Wood, p. 567), 18 Scot. Jur. 578; King's College of Aberdeen v. Lady Hay, March 11, 1852, 14 D. 675, Lord Colonsay, p. 701-2.

<sup>4</sup> Bell's Conveyancing, ii. 1067; Stewart v. M'Callum, 6 Macph. 382, affd. H. L. 8 Macph. 1; Bethune v. Morgan, 2 R. 186; Scott's Executors v. Hepburn, June 14, 1876, 3 R. 816; King's College of Aberdeen v. Lady James Hay, supra; Small v. Miller, Feb. 3, 1849, 11 D. 495, 21 Scot. Jur. 143; Gardyne v. Royal Bank, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, 23 Scot. Jur. 410, H. L., May 13, 1853, 1 Macq. 358.

<sup>5</sup> Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 477.

I think the case is a very clear one, and I entirely agree with the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken. The relation of superior and vassal may be constituted either by a feu-charter or by a feu-contract; the difference between the two is very slight, and indeed is immaterial. Under a feu-charter the vassal, by acceptance of the feu, puts himself under a personal obligation to pay the reddendo, and subjects his representatives to pay whatever feu-duties may become due during his possession of the feu. That obligation becomes on his death a personal debt. On the other hand, his heir, if he takes up the succession, in like manner becomes liable for future feu-duties; and if the feu be sold by the original or by any subsequent vassal, then the successor in the feu, after he is infeft, becomes liable for the feu-duty, and the seller is discharged. Such is the ordinary effect of a feu-charter. In that way the feuar binds himself and his executors to a certain extent, and his successors in the feu to a further extent. All that is implied in a feu-charter, although it is not expressed. In the present case it is expressed and not implied, because the writ is in the form of a feu-contract and not of a feu-charter. The feuar in words binds "himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever"; that is, he binds them in such a way as they would be bound in a feu-charter. Nothing more is done than is effected by the mere acceptance of a feu by the feuar in a feu-charter. There is a variety of obligations which may be introduced into a feu-contract which do not affect the present question. If it be desired by the parties, any kind of obligation may be so introduced, but I cannot conceive that the representatives of a deceased feuar are, apart from special stipulation, subject to more than the limited liability to which I have referred.

No. 114.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Aiton v.
Russell's
Executors.

No doubt the wording of the contract might be varied so as to imply a permanent personal obligation against the representatives of the feuar. Such cases have occurred, and there cannot be a better illustration of them than the case of the Police Commissioners of Dundee, to which the Lord Ordinary has referred. In that case, as in the present, the vassal bound himself, "his heirs, executors, and successors" whomsoever, but there were added the words "conjunctly and severally," and it is impossible to construe these words otherwise than as importing that each obligant was bound conjunctly with the others. Each one of the persons obliged was bound to the full extent, and the obligations were not separate. In that case the Court were all of opinion that but for these words the result would have been the opposite of what was the finding of the Court. I am reported to have said,—“If the clause had stood precisely as it does, but without the words ‘conjunctly and severally,’ it could not have been contended that any party was bound but those who would generally be bound under such clauses in an ordinary feu-contract. The imposition of the obligations on the vassal, his heirs, executors, and successors, would have been read according to inveterate practice as an obligation on himself so long as he remained vassal and lived, and after his death on his heirs and executors for payment of arrears, and on his successors in the feu for payment of the feu-duty in the future.” That is the very case we have to determine here, and the case of the Dundee Police Commissioners therefore becomes indirectly an express authority on the point.

LORD ADAM.—I also think that this is a clear case, and I concur with your Lordship.

The case turns upon the construction of what we should call the reddendo

No. 114.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Aiton v.
Russell's
Executors.

clause in a charter, and the construction to be put upon that clause is, I think, rightly explained by your Lordship in the case of the Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton. Mr Russell bound himself for payment of the feu-duty so long as he remained vassal in the feu, and after his death his heirs and executors for payment of arrears, and he bound his successors in the feu for payment of the feu-duty in the future. That is the only sound reading of the clause, and if so the only persons bound to pay the feu-duties becoming due after Mr Russell's death are his successors in the feu. If the defenders are not his successors in the feu there is no obligation upon them. The answer is irresistible, that they are not his successors.

But there is another ground on which it is sought to enforce liability against the defenders. It is said that Mr Russell bound himself by the contract that there should be a successor to him in the feu in all time coming, and upon that ground a claim of damages is supported. But no such obligation was undertaken. What was undertaken was that if his successors took up the feu they should pay a certain amount of feu-duty—there was nothing more.

LORD FRASER was present at the advising, but not having heard the argument gave no opinion.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD MURE, who was absent from illness, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT adhered.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 115.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Scott v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

JOHN SCOTT, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Ure.
SCOTTISH ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Crole.

Insurance—Construction—Liability defined by notice on policy.—A policy of insurance with an accident insurance company set forth that “if the insured shall sustain any bodily injury . . . which shall occasion permanent partial disablement (as defined on the back hereof), then the company shall be liable to pay to him the sum of £200,” and in the event of permanent partial disablement not being suffered £3 a-week for a period not exceeding twenty-six weeks was allowed. On the back of the policy there was the following:—“Notice.— . . . Permanent partial disablement implies the loss of one hand, the loss of one foot, or the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight.” In an action on this policy for £200 the pursuer averred that he had met with an accident whereby he had suffered permanent partial disablement, but he admitted that he had lost neither a hand, nor a foot, nor his sight. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the action was relevant.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

ON 27th October 1887 John Scott, timber merchant, Glasgow, brought an action for £200 against the Scottish Accident Insurance Company, Limited.

The pursuer founded on a policy effected with the defenders on his life, the material portions of which are quoted below,* and averred that he had met with an accident, and had sustained injuries to his spine, which he detailed, involving permanent partial disablement, but he admitted that he had not lost a hand or a foot, and that he had not suffered complete and irrecoverable loss of sight. No. 115.

* The policy contained the following clause:—“If the insured shall sustain any bodily injury caused as aforesaid (viz., by violent accidental means) which shall occasion permanent partial disablement (as defined on the back hereof), then the company shall be liable to pay to him the sum of £200 within one calendar month after satisfactory proof of such disablement shall have been furnished to the directors, and if such injury does not entitle the insured to

Mar. 19, 1889.
Scott v.

Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having, in consequence of the accident in question, suffered permanent partial bodily disablement, is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer's averments are not relevant. (2) The pursuer not having suffered permanent partial bodily disablement as defined by the policy, the defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

Upon 14th November 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, dismissed the action, and decerned.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The "notice" on the back of the policy did not bear to be, and was not, a definition of permanent partial disablement. It merely mentioned one or two cases about which there might be some doubt, and said that these were to be taken as cases of permanent partial disablement. To say that no other injuries, however severe, were to be regarded as cases of permanent partial disablement compensation for permanent total or permanent partial disablement, as above provided, but shall independently of all other causes immediately and totally disable and prevent him from attending to business of any kind, then compensation shall be paid to him at the rate of £3 per week for the period of such continuous total disablement as shall immediately follow the said accident and injury, or at the rate of 15s. so long as he shall be thereby rendered partially unable to attend to business. But the period during which compensation for total or partial temporary disablement, or both, is to be paid shall not for any single accident exceed twenty-six consecutive weeks from the date thereof."

On the back of the policy was the following :—"Notice.—Permanent total disablement implies the loss of both hands or of both feet, or the loss of a hand and a foot. Permanent partial disablement implies the loss of one hand, the loss of one foot, or the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight."

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this action claims payment from the defenders of a sum of £200, which he says is due to him in respect of an insurance effected by him with the defenders. The defenders deny liability on the ground that the injuries suffered by the pursuer, as alleged, are not covered by the policy.

"By the policy issued by the defenders they undertake to pay the pursuer the sum of £200 in the event of his sustaining any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means, 'which shall occasion permanent partial disablement (as defined on the back hereof).' On the back of the policy is printed this notice,—'Permanent partial disablement implies the loss of one hand, the loss of one foot, or the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight.' If this is regarded as an exhaustive definition of the 'permanent partial disablement' of the policy, then this action cannot be maintained, for the injuries sustained by the pursuer do not fall within the definition. But the pursuer contends that what is called a definition is only illustrative ; and that while permanent partial disablement implies the specific injuries enumerated, it does not exclude other injuries having the effect of permanent partial disablement. If the word 'implies' on the back of the policy is to be regarded etymologically, and apart from the language of the policy itself, I agree with the pursuer. But I cannot so regard it here. The parties, by issuing and accepting the policy respectively, have agreed to regard the 'notice' on the back of it as a definition ; and as a definition covers the whole limits or signification of the thing defined, I must hold that permanent partial disablement in the sense of the policy means, and means only, the special forms of injury enumerated in the so-called definition. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has not set forth relevant grounds to sustain an action on the policy in question."

No. 115. was absurd as matter of fact, and was not the legal inference from this policy. If the defenders proposed to carry on business on that footing, they must make their meaning unequivocally clear, which they had here failed to do.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Scott v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

The respondents argued;—This notice was a definition. It was so described in the policy, for it was the only writing on the back. "Implies" not only meant "involves," but also "signifies," "imports," "denotes," "means." The pursuer was not deprived of redress. There were really two contracts in this policy—one for certain payments down, and the other for weekly payments in cases not embraced under the definition.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The policy here provides that "if the insured shall sustain any bodily injury caused as aforesaid, which shall occasion permanent partial disablement (as defined on the back hereof), then the company shall be liable to pay to him the sum of £200." The pursuer claims £200 for permanent partial disablement through an accident which he describes on record. The defenders maintain that under the terms of the notice on the back of the policy they are not liable as for permanent partial disablement. The policy refers to what is in the notice by the words "as defined on the back hereof," and what is to be found on the back is in these terms:—"Notice.—Permanent total disablement implies the loss of both hands or of both feet, or the loss of a hand and a foot. Permanent partial disablement implies the loss of one hand, the loss of one foot, or the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight."

Now, this notice does not bear on the face of it to be a definition, and can only be taken as such because so referred to in the policy. Whatever it is to be called, however, its terms are most ambiguous, and no better test of their ambiguity can be given than the fact that the counsel for the defenders read to us fifteen different synonyms for the only verb used. All depends on the meaning to be attached to the word "implies." If the notice is to be regarded as a notice to the insured, it must be held to mean whatever the insured could reasonably regard it as meaning. The ambiguity is not to be interpreted in favour of the party who draws up the policy, but is to be interpreted in the most favourable sense for the insured.

So regarding it, I cannot read the policy as the Lord Ordinary has done. He thinks that in no case of injury can a person recover as for permanent partial disablement unless he has lost one hand or one foot, or both his eyes. That would be to give the policy an extraordinary meaning. There is nothing to lead anyone to read it in that way. Such an interpretation would be contrary to the common sense of mankind. A policy may conceivably be limited to the case of the loss of a hand or of a foot, but such a limitation must be expressed in the most absolutely unambiguous language, and I suspect that very little business would be done by the defenders if people thought those policies were only to be read as they suggest.

It was said that there are here two contracts, and that the pursuer has a claim under the second one, although not under the first. But under the former the most he can receive is £78, or £3 for twenty-six weeks, which is very different from £200 down, and the defenders' contention would make a man who has met with an injury to his spine or to his head entitled only to so much a-week. If that was the intention of the defenders they should have made it impossible to read their policy in any other way. Here I think the policy is to be read in the way most favourable to the pursuer. I am, therefore, for sustaining the appeal, No. 115. and repelling the first plea in law for the defenders.

LORD YOUNG and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Scott v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, found the action relevant, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

REID & GUILD, W.S.—J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM HENDERSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sym.
THE CARRON COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—
C. J. Guthrie.

No. 116.

Mar. 19, 1889.*
Henderson v.
Carron Co.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Master's duty to take proper precautions for servant's safety.—A workman engaged in charging an iron smelting furnace was fatally injured by a sudden outburst of flame, caused by the fall of incrustations in the furnace (known as "scaffolds"). The furnace had for about nine months been in a dangerous state from scaffolding, during which period the employer had made various ineffectual attempts to remove the defect. The only remaining remedy was to blow out and clear the furnace, which would have removed, for a time at least, the cause of danger, but would have been expensive. Held that the employer was liable in damages for the workman's death, in respect that there had been fault in allowing the furnace to be worked for so long a period in a dangerous condition.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by William Henderson against the Carron Company, to recover damages for the death of the pursuer's son, Alexander Henderson, who had received fatal injuries while in the defenders' employment at one of their smelting furnaces. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

The accident occurred on 10th November 1887 while the deceased was opening the door of No. 9 furnace to allow another workman to throw into it a barrow-load of coal and ironstone. The deceased was injured by a sudden outburst of flame when he opened the door, caused by the fall of a mass of incrustations ("scaffolds") from the sides of the furnace.

The pursuer averred that the accident happened through the fault of the defenders in not providing suitable apparatus to ensure that the work of charging the furnace could be safely accomplished, and in having their furnace in a defective and unsafe condition at the time of the accident.

The defenders stated that scaffolding was a common and unavoidable incident in blast furnaces, and that an accident from that cause formed one of the risks of the deceased's employment.

They also stated that the deceased "was well aware of the risks of his work, and that he and all the workmen employed about the furnace knew that it was scaffolding, and liable to 'slip.'"

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The injuries libelled having been due to inevitable accident, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The accident libelled having been one of the risks of the deceased's employment, the defenders are not liable in damages, and should be assoilzied, with expenses. (5) The injuries to the deceased not having been caused by any fault of the defenders, they should be assoilzied. (6) The deceased having worked in face of a known possible danger, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The following were the material facts disclosed at the proof: The

No. 116. deceased, who was about seventeen years of age, had been for some time in the employment of the defenders. For about a month before the day of the accident he had not been working at No. 9 furnace. Prior to that, however, he had worked for eight or ten weeks at that furnace. No. 9 furnace differed from the other Carron furnaces in the way in which it was charged. It was charged by the workman opening a door near the top of the furnace and tipping the contents of his barrow of coal or coke and ironstone into the furnace. There was no means of protection for the workman if, when he was so engaged, a fall of scaffolding sent up tongues of flame through the door. The furnace, however, was proved to be constructed on much the same principle as furnaces at other large iron-works, such as Gartsherrie, and the evidence of experts was to the effect that it was impossible to devise for such a furnace a shelter for the men at the time of filling. The other furnaces at Carron were, however, of a kind also quite common, and known as "bell-topped furnaces," which did not expose workmen to the same danger, as they could be protected by a metal screen. John Colquhoun, a furnaceman, one of the pursuer's witnesses, deponed in cross,—“We were paid 3s. 9d. shift wages and 4s. on No. 9, because it was hotter than any of the rest, and we got 3d. a shift more to fill it. That was 3s. 9d. to 4s. a-day for seven days a-week. They pay the fillers higher on No. 9. (Q.) Is that because it is more dangerous? (A.) Yes, dangerous, hot and all.”

“Scaffolding” was proved to be a common occurrence in close-top furnaces, as all the Carron furnaces were, and to be injurious to the quality of iron, and dangerous owing to the consequent tendency to slipping. It existed to some extent in the old open-top furnaces. The precise cause of it was not ascertained. The scaffolding in No. 9 furnace was proved to have existed for a number of months before the accident on 10th November. It had begun at least some weeks before 1st May 1887, when a new manager named Love came to the works, and it had never been cured. Frequent slips had taken place. Measures were taken to remove it in June by altering the blast, but these were ineffectual. In July, September, and October, Love, with the view of curing the scaffolding, blew the furnace down very low by not putting in new fuel while continuing the blast, and then charged it up again, so as it possible to burn away the scaffolding. The skilled evidence was to the effect that this was the course usually followed in other iron-works, at all events until the scaffolding proved to be too obstinate to be so removed. It was not effectual in this instance; while certain temporary benefit was done it was evident that the scaffolding remained uncured. On that remedy failing, the only other known remedy was to blow out the furnace clear away the scaffolding, and start the furnace again. This remedy however, would have been somewhat expensive.*

---

* The manager, Love, deponed that to blow out a furnace generally involved reconstruction, on account of the effect produced on the brickwork by the removal of the scaffolding, which “is very costly. It costs hundreds of pounds. it might be from £1000 to £2000, assuming the furnace to be rebuilt.” He admitted, however, that when No. 9 was blown out in January 1888 it was not found necessary to renew it in a single brick. It then took about five weeks to cool and to be got in blast again. For the first five weeks after that it cast inferior iron as compared with the others. The manager calculated the expense of blowing out No. 9 at “something like £700,” in consequence of the production of inferior iron, loss of time, &c. He did not, however, allow in making this calculation for the fact that the furnace had not been turning out the best quality of iron before the accident.

There were upon the furnace certain valves and explosion doors, No. 116. intended to vent flame, smoke, and gas. The pursuer sought to shew on the proof that these were too small in capacity for their purpose, and that some of them were not working properly. The defenders, on the other hand, sought to shew that they were sufficient and in good order, and that in no view would they have prevented the accident, because on the slip occurring while the furnace was being charged, the flame would have rushed out by the open charging door as the point of least resistance.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Henderson v.
Carron Co.

After the accident on 10th November the working of the furnace was continued as before. On 31st December following, another workman, John Barriscell, was severely injured by an accident exactly similar at the same furnace, a slip having occurred while he had the charging door open.*

After that accident the furnace was blown out, cleared of the scaffolding, and again kindled.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) found that the pursuer had failed to prove fault on the part of the defenders, and assoilzied them.†

* Barriscell raised an action against the Carron Company for damages for his injuries, which was disposed of in both Courts at the same time and in the same way as the present case.

† "NOTE.—. . . The pursuer's main contention is, that the defenders were in fault in not adopting sooner the remedy of blowing out the furnaces entirely. On the whole the Sheriff-substitute is unable to agree with this contention. It was a matter of opinion which remedy was the better to adopt; and the Sheriff-substitute does not think that defenders were in fault in not adopting sooner the very exceptional and unusual course of blowing the furnace out, which it must be remembered would by no means necessarily ensure the future efficiency of the furnace. . . .

"A third ground of liability is, that whereas on some of the blast furnaces there is a shelter for the men, there was none on No. 9. This arises from the nature of the furnaces. Some of the close-topped furnaces are on the bell system. In furnaces on this system inside the top of the furnace there is a 'bell' or inverted funnel, which, when raised, touches with its sides the sides of the mouth of the furnace, so that all round it there is a circular cavity into which material, as it is technically called 'burden,' and coals are thrown; while this is being done there is no danger whatever, as there is no opening down to the furnace. But when the outsides of the bell are fully charged, the bellman, by machinery at a little distance, lets down the bell; of course all the material falls off into the furnace, and there being so much of it, there is necessarily an upward rush through the large opening of flame and gas. To shelter the men on the bell furnaces, at the moment of lowering the bell, a screen has been erected. But No. 9 is not charged by a bell, but by four doors. Only one door is opened at once, and thus a comparatively small charge is put in. But thus, while on the one hand there is not the reason as in the case of the bell furnaces to expect a fiery rush, there is on the other hand no possibility of sheltering the men; for they must bring the barrow to the door and empty it right into the open furnace. So a screen in the case of No. 9 would be useless.

"Again, the pursuers contend that there is a defect in the defenders' ways, &c., in their not providing sufficient valves or explosion doors, by means of which the force of the explosion would have expended itself otherwise, instead of rushing through the charging doors at which Henderson and Barriacell were burned.

"But the ordinary valves of No. 9, though not quite so large as those at Gartsherrie, seem large enough for all practical purposes. There are also explosion doors at the ends of the upper cross tube, with the view that, if such a heavy explosion were to take place that the gases could not readily enough escape by the valves, they might find a vent without blowing off the machinery. But whether or not the explosion doors had in this case got jammed intentionally or unintentionally is really a matter of little moment, for even had they been

No. 116.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Henderson v.
Carron Co.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—The scaffolding was of a dangerous and persistent kind, and this was known to the manager. He knew also that the efforts to remove it had been unsuccessful. It was conceded that he was justified in making a fair trial of other measures before blowing out the furnace, and probably had the accident happened in June or July there might have been no liability, but it inferred fault that he had gone on with the defect unremedied for about nine months between his coming to the work and the second accident. The proof did not shew that it would have been so expensive to blow out the furnace as the defenders suggested, but in any view they were not entitled to expose life to a danger which was capable of being remedied, merely because the remedy might be expensive. At anyrate, if they wished to avoid that expense they must take the responsibility of the accidents which were induced by their avoiding it. The Sheriff-substitute seemed to think, and the defenders had contended before him, that all the ordinary valves and explosion doors could not have been expected to avail the workmen if a slip occurred, because it was a scientific truth that the flame must rush through where the way was most open for it. But that was the very reason why it was reckless to continue over a long period to send men to expose themselves at the most dangerous place. Further, it shewed that there ought to have been a screen. It was said to be impossible to devise one. But the bell-mouthed furnace would have avoided this danger, and it was impossible for the defenders to maintain that it was a dangerous furnace, for most of their furnaces were of that kind.

Argued for the defenders ;—The accidents were not the result of fault either of master or servant. They arose from an unavoidable risk of the work, incident to it, and of which the workmen who accepted that kind of work could not be ignorant. It was impossible to provide such furnaces as No. 9 with a shelter at the charging-door. But No. 9 was a furnace of an ordinary kind, extensively used in similar works, and a master need not do more than provide such. The mere occurrence of an accident raised no presumption of fault. Again, "scaffolding" was a thing which no means yet discovered could prevent. The pursuer had received extra wages on account of the extra risk at No. 9. He therefore knew of the risk, and willingly incurred it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Without going into any detail, I think this case may be very shortly dealt with. The defenders have certain bell-topped furnaces and other furnaces fed by doors. The case for the defenders is that to feed these latter furnaces it is absolutely necessary that the material should be emptied into them by men. I accept that as a fact, and I also accept it as a fact that these furnaces are of the ordinary build and are fitted with all the modern appliances yet devised. But inside all furnaces—since the tops were closed—there is a tendency for the material to cake at the top of the "boshes," by which "scaffolds" of hanging material are formed at the sides.

These "scaffolds" are injurious to the satisfactory output of iron, and are dangerous to those employed in charging the furnaces, because if they "slip" in working order the gas would have preferred to rush out by the charging door, which was wide open, than to take the trouble of opening a door at all, as it always must follow the line of least resistance.

"On the whole, therefore, the Sheriff-substitute cannot see that the accidents either to Henderson or Barriscall were occasioned by any fault on the part of the defenders. There was no fault on the part of the men injured, so the fatality must be put down to misadventure."

there is a considerable rush of flame upwards, and that goes out at the doors, if they are open, as the easiest mode of escape. I accept the defenders' statements that science has not yet explained how that "scaffolding" occurs, and that no remedy has yet been devised to protect workmen against such risks. I accept also the statement that there is no means by which coals and ironstone can be admitted without the man feeding the furnace being burnt to death if there should be a rush of flame to the door. That such should be the case is incredible to my mind, but I accept it because it is according to the evidence. The question then is, whether the defenders were entitled to go on struggling with this "scaffolding" for nine months, or whether they were not bound to put an end to it before then by the admittedly competent method of blowing out the furnace? I think their action was not justifiable. Seeing that the danger was unavoidable except by one method, they were not entitled to go on for nine months without having recourse to that method. That the danger was considerable is shewn by the fact that two very serious accidents occurred within six weeks of each other. I am therefore for recalling both interlocutors and finding both pursuers entitled to damages. I propose that we allow £100 of damages to the workman who lost his son, and £50 to the workman Barriscell, who was himself injured.

No. 116.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Henderson v.
Carron Co.

LORD YOUNG and LORD LEE concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact (1) that on the occasion libelled the pursuer's son, Alexander Henderson, then in the employment of the defenders, was sent by their night superintendent to the top of their furnace No. 9, to open its doors for the men putting in charges of coal and ironstone; (2) that on his opening one of the doors a 'slip' or fall of material adhering to the interior of the furnace took place, causing an up-rush of flame, by which he was burnt severely, and in consequence of which he died; (3) that the said furnace had been in a dangerous state from the formation of 'scaffolding' therein, which had repeatedly caused such slips in the furnace during the previous nine months, and the death of the said Alexander Henderson is attributable to the fault of the defenders in allowing the furnace to be worked for so long a period in the state in which it was, notwithstanding the fact that all efforts to remove the 'scaffolding' had failed: Find in law that the defenders are liable in damages and solatium to the pursuer for the loss of his son: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Assess the damages and solatium at £100: Ordain the defenders to make payment of that sum to the pursuer: Find him entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court: Remit," &c.

W. COTTON, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

FRANCIS ERSKINE VINCENT AND GUARDIAN, Petitioners (Appellants).— No. 117.
Balfour—Murray.

EARL OF BUCHAN, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Domicile—Change of domicile—Proof—Onus.—A Scotswoman, the daughter of a Scottish peer, married the proprietor of an entailed estate in Scotland, on Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of
Buchan.

No. 117. which the spouses resided till the husband's death in 1883, when the estate passed to his nephew. The widow thereafter resided in London till her death in 1888.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

A petition by her nephew, her sole next of kin according to the law of Scotland, to be decerned her executor-dative was opposed by her brother consanguinean, who claimed to be one of the next of kin according to the law of England. He alleged that she died domiciled in England.

It was proved that the deceased for a few months after her husband's death continued to reside in his house in London, which, with the furniture, he had left to her; that she then sold this house and subsequently lived in furnished houses or in lodgings in London, sometimes leaving London for a few months to reside on the Continent. She frequently expressed her intention to have no permanent home anywhere, and stated that she had no intention of returning to live in Scotland, as the climate did not suit her. Her principal adviser in business matters was the factor on the entailed estate, and her late husband's law-agents in Edinburgh continued to manage two farms in Scotland left to her by her husband (which she desired to sell), and her investments generally. It appeared that she resided in London chiefly for the sake of being near her stepmother.

Held that the onus lay upon the respondent of proving that the deceased had animo et facto abandoned her domicile of origin, and that he had failed to prove her intention to abandon it.

1st Division.
Sheriff Commissary of Midlothian.
M.

LADY ELIZABETH LEE HARVEY, daughter of the twelfth Earl of Buchan, by his second marriage, was married to Henry Lee Harvey of Castlesemples, Renfrewshire, in 1855. She was born in Scotland, where her father had his domicile. After her marriage she resided principally at Castlesemples until her husband's death, which took place in May 1883, but for a portion of each year she and her husband occupied a house, No. 113 St George's Square, London, belonging to the latter.

Mr Lee Harvey's estate of Castlesemples was entailed, and passed at his death to the heir of entail. He left his wife two farms—the only unentailed heritable property which he possessed in Scotland—his house in London, and all his moveable property.

Lady Elizabeth survived her husband for five years. She lived for a few months after his death at 113 St George's Square, but as that house did not suit her she sold it, and she thereafter lived in furnished houses and lodgings in London, sometimes going abroad for several months at a time, until her death. She died intestate and without issue at 85 Cadogan Square, London, on 13th January 1888. Her investments and business matters were managed by the firm of Dundas & Wilson, C.S., Edinburgh, who had been her husband's law-agents.

Francis Erskine Vincent, son of the Reverend Sir William Vincent Bart., thereafter presented a petition to the Sheriff of the Lothians at Edinburgh, in which his father, as his curator, concurred, claiming to be decerned executor-dative qua next of kin of the deceased. He was the only child of Lady Margaret Erskine or Vincent, who was Lady Elizabeth's sister german.

He stated that Lady Elizabeth was a domiciled Scotswoman at the date of her death, and that although she had resided during the latter part of her life chiefly in London, she had never intended to change, and in point of fact never had changed, her Scotch domicile.

Answers to the petition were lodged for the Earl of Buchan, who was Lady Elizabeth's eldest brother consanguinean and one of her next of kin according to the law of England, by which brothers and sisters consanguinean were entitled in cases of intestacy to the office of executor equally with brothers and sisters german. He contended that Lady that her succession fell to be regulated by the law of England.

Elizabeth was a domiciled Englishwoman at the date of her death, and No. 117.

He stated, inter alia;—"After Mr Lee Harvey's death Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey only once visited Scotland for a very short time on business. She resolved to make London her home, and expressed her intention to that effect. Most of her friends were there, and she enjoyed better health in London than anywhere else. She had always found the Scotch climate too cold for her, and she stated her intention not to reside there again."

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

The petitioners pleaded;—The petitioner Francis Erskine Vincent being the next of kin of the said deceased Right Honourable Elizabeth Lee Harvey, is entitled to be decerned her executor-dative, and the said Reverend Sir William Vincent, Baronet, being his father and curator and guardian, and administrator-in-law, is entitled to be decerned along with him.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The deceased having died domiciled in England, and the respondent as one of her next of kin being in course of applying to the Courts of that country for a grant of letters of administration to her whole estates in the United Kingdom, the prayer of the petition ought to be refused, with expenses.

On 16th March 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) allowed a proof, the petitioners being appointed to lead, and on 31st March following the Sheriff (Crichton) adhered, objection having, inter alia, been taken before him to that part of his Substitute's interlocutor which appointed the petitioners to lead.

The above-stated facts were proved by the evidence which was led, and in regard to the intentions of the deceased a large number of witnesses were examined, the most important portions of whose testimony are given below.* A number of letters were also produced.

* For the petitioners there were examined, inter alios, the following witnesses:—

The Countess-Dowager of Buchan deponed,—“I think I met Lady Elizabeth after her husband's death at the house in St George's Square. She never intended to remain there from the beginning, but she went to make some disposition of the affairs and furniture, and she was then living in the two rooms below. . . . She was about four or five weeks in this house, but when she left me I think she went there. (Q.) And then she went to different houses—furnished houses—in Cadogan Place? (A.) I think it must have been four or five houses in succession. (Q.) You saw her from time to time at those different houses, did you not? (A.) Very frequently. (Q.) And did you know that she went abroad every summer? (A.) Yes, usually. (Q.) Did she tell you why she was in London from time to time? (A.) I suppose because she had to look after her furniture and affairs, but I think it was on my account. She was a kind good daughter; and she said so repeatedly—it was really only for me. (Q.) What did she say; do you remember what sort of expression she made use of when she said that? (A.) Well, I think you would get it from some people to whom she said it very distinctly more accurately than from me; but I know she always implied that to me, and she sometimes said it very distinctly—that she only came for me. Her first idea, I believe in the world, was that she never would have a home again after losing her husband and child. Then she came to London, and she always disliked London excessively, and came, I believe, only because she knew I was so much attached to her. (Q.) Did she ever speak to you about living abroad? (A.) No; she always said she never would live anywhere, but she meant to go abroad. I daresay it would have ended in her living chiefly abroad and only coming to England and Scotland occasionally. (Q.) As to Scotland, did she ever say anything about being in Scotland again? (A.) . . . She two or three times, I think, made a slight allusion to her intention of having

No. 117.

On 29th June 1888 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the deceased had died domiciled in England, sus-

Mar. 19, 1889.

Vincent v.

Earl of Buchan.

a room kept for her, or fitted up for her more properly, on one of her farms; she always spoke very much of going to see the monument to her husband's memory, that she had never seen yet—that she never did see. (Q.) She talked of having a room fitted up on one of the farms, is that what I understand? (A.) That is what I imagine she would have done if she had lived a little longer; of course she did not like the idea of going to stay at Castlesempole; that would have been very painful to her. (Q.) She had been the mistress at Castlesempole? (A.) Of course for many years, I forget how many. (Q.) Do you believe that she had any intention in her mind as to where she would live when she was in London? (A.) I am quite sure of her mind so far, that she was determined she never would, you might say, 'live' anywhere. One cannot tell what might have happened, but I am quite sure it would not have been London or England—any part of England; but I do not believe she ever would have settled, I do not believe so. . . . (Q.) Did she ever say anything to you as to why she sold the George Square furniture? (A.) Oh, she told me she sold the things because she did not want them any more, and never could want them again. I have heard her say that very often. (Q.) Did she say why she would not want them again? (A.) Because she said she never could be happy in this world, and she never would attempt to make a home for herself again; she said that to me in different words, but implying that. That was the only thing in fact, I think, that she had clear in her mind. . . . Cross.—(Q.) I believe that Lady Elizabeth and yourself lived upon very close terms of intimacy and affection? (A.) Oh, she was the kindest daughter possible to me! (Q.) And doubtless the fact that you lived in London was a great attraction to her to live here? (A.) Oh, she never would have come to London,—I am sure she would not,—but for me, because she disliked the place and the climate. (Q.) While you lived here, do you think she would have left London? (A.) If I had left London I think she would have left; certainly, she offered to me to go and live with me in the country. (Q.) And so long as you remained in London she would have remained too. (A.) Oh, yes; she would come the greater part of the year, I should think always. (Q.) Did she ever have any settled intention of living anywhere else except London? (A.) Oh, she had no settled intentions whatever so far as I know. (Q.) And what you said about her saying she never would have a home was in the sense of a happy home, like she had before her husband was dead? (A.) I think she never supposed herself capable of being again happy. I believe that was the meaning of it. (Q.) Now, do you remember when it was that she spoke about having a room fitted up at one of her farm houses? Was it when she was putting up a memorial to her husband at Lochwinnoch? (A.) I really cannot exactly say—I do not know. I did not give much attention to it, but really I remember it now, and I think more than once she spoke of it in that way when she was talking. (Q.) Had she a very strong desire to do everything in her power to keep her husband's memory fresh down at Lochwinnoch? (A.) Oh, I may say it was the one, the leading, idea of her life. In all her charities and gifts, and all her arrangements, she was always thinking of something or another to do that. He was very much beloved, and she was always wishing to keep that alive. (Q.) I think she used to go abroad in summer to some watering-place for her health? (A.) I think she was usually three or four months abroad. (Q.) She went to spas and watering-places, did she not, for her health? (A.) Yes; she went to several watering-places I think, chiefly because she liked careering about, she liked travelling in railways, which I thought a very odd taste."

Mrs Garrett Anderson, M.D., who had attended the deceased professionally, deponed,—“(Q.) What was the deceased's condition so far as you observed it as to being satisfied as to being in one place or moving about? (A.) She was rather restless, she was fond of little changes, fond of going abroad and so on, and very wanting in anything like mental energy of any kind. (Q.) Did she speak to you as to her intentions at any time? (A.) As to staying do you taining the first plea in law for the respondent, and dismissing the No. 117. petition.*

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

mean? (Q.) Yes. (A.) The only thing that I can remember bearing upon it at all was that once or twice I tried to interest her in different things in London, and she always said, Oh, it was not worth while taking up things in London. I tried to get her interested in various good works that, for her own sake, I thought would be good for her, but she always said, 'Oh, it is not worth while taking up things in London, I am here only passing, I am here as it were for the time.' I remember her saying that, and I think that is all. (Q.) Did she speak about Lady Buchan? (A.) Yes, I think it was in reference to that, she said she was here really on the Buchans' account. (Q.) You know, I think, that she did live in different houses at the time. (A.) Oh, yes, I saw her in four (I think) different houses in Cadogan Gardens. (Q.) Did she speak to you about her Scotch property at all, about her charities and things there? (A.) Yes, she several times said that all her interests were in Scotland, and that she had a great deal to do. I occasionally suggested to her being a little more active in London, and she would say, 'Well, I have a great deal of business in connection with Scotland.' I remember her saying that several times. (Q.) I think she was very fond of Lady Buchan? (A.) Oh, very. (Q.) And manifested it in every way? (A.) Oh, I think so. I think she was extremely attached to her. (Q.) What age person was she, do you know? (A.) I cannot be quite exact, but she was somewhere about fifty-seven or fifty-eight or thereabouts. Cross.—(Q.) I think you said that shewed itself in want of energy? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was it difficult to get her to move to go abroad for her health? (A.) It was difficult to get her to do anything, to stick to any plan from day to day or week to week. (Q.) When you tried to interest her in work in London, did she tell you that she had a great many calls upon her in connection with her old friends in Scotland? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And was that the chief reason why she did not take up your suggestion? (A.) Yes; I thought it was. She rather put it for one thing on the score of money that she had so many claims upon her in Scotland. (Q.) That is exactly what I wished to ask. (A.) That she was engrossed rather with her Scotch duties. (Q.) Was it then that she said she was in London on Lady Buchan's account? Was it in connection with your suggesting that she should interest herself in London work? (A.) Yes; I think it was. (Q.) Did she ever suggest going to live in a permanent way in any other place except London? (A.) She spoke occasionally that she would be very pleased to live abroad, that she would like living abroad; she liked the climate and the surroundings abroad very much. (Q.) But she never talked of any particular place where she had an idea of taking up her * "NOTE.—It is not disputed that the late Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey, who was the daughter of a Scotch Earl, and the wife of a Scotch landed proprietor, had her domicile in Scotland down to her husband's death in 1883. The question is whether she afterwards acquired a domicile in England, which she retained until her death in January last. After careful consideration the Sheriff-substitute has come to be of opinion that the question must be answered in the affirmative. Shortly stated, the import of the evidence seems to him to be:—That when Lady Elizabeth left Scotland after her husband's death she had no intention of returning, that she voluntarily fixed upon London as the place where she would live in future, and that the character and circumstances of her residence there, which lasted practically without interruption from the time of her leaving Scotland until her death, shewed a present intention to make London her home or permanent place of abode.

"The Sheriff-substitute, in dismissing the petition, is not to be held as deciding that the petitioner is not entitled to be decerned executor to the deceased. It is not denied that by the law of England he has right to a share of the estate, and he may have right also to a share in its administration, but this question will be better considered on a new application than on any amendment of the present petition."

No. 117. Francis Erskine Vincent and his guardian appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There could be no question that the deceased was

Mar. 19, 1889.

Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

residence? (A.) No; I do not think she did. (Q.) Did she ever talk of going back to Scotland to live there, or did she ever mention that? (A.) I do not remember her mentioning it."

Mr Ligertwood, the factor at Castlesemple, who was Lady Elizabeth's confidential adviser, and managed her affairs until her death, deponed,—“(Q.) Did Lady Elizabeth say anything when you saw her . . . as to where she was going to live? (A.) Not much; she thought it would end by her living abroad, as she thought the climate suited her better. (Q.) Did she ever make use of any expression that gave you to understand that she had any intention of residing permanently at any particular place? (A.) No, but I thought when she spoke about living abroad it would be Carlsbad, as she was very fond of it. (Q.) Did she use any expression to make you think that she thought of living in London or any other place? (A.) No; I don't think so.”

For the respondent there were examined, inter alios, the following witnesses:—

Edwin Reed, coachman to Lady Elizabeth, deponed,—“(Q.) Do you remember Lady Elizabeth engaging you to stay with her after her husband's death? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Where did she do that? (A.) She did it in Bath Street, Glasgow, at the hotel where she was staying. . . . (Q.) Can you tell us what she said to you when she engaged you? (A.) Yes, she said ‘Would you like to live with me in London, because I am going to stay in London altogether?’ and I said ‘Yes.’ She paid my wife's fare up to London, my furniture, and my own. (Q.) Did she use to treat you with considerable confidence? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And when she sent you upon your orders did she use to talk to you freely? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did she ever afterwards say anything to you as to her intentions as to where she would reside? (A.) In London . . . (Q.) Was it your impression from your conversations with her that she really wanted to take a house in London? (A.) Yes. (Q.) That was the place where she intended to make her principal residence? (A.) To reside—that is my agreement—when we came from Scotland. She told me we should live in London. She would travel abroad for three or four months in the year. (Q.) And she never went back upon that? (A.) No. (Q.) When she went abroad she left her servants in her house when she had the houses in Cadogan Place? (A.) Yes, well she used to give them a holiday, they were always on wages. (Q.) She kept them on? (A.) She kept them on.”

Mrs Reed, the wife of the last witness, deponed,—“(Q.) Do you remember, just after you came up to London with your husband in 1883, having a conversation with Lady Elizabeth at the St George Square house? (A.) Yes. She asked me if it was against my wish to come and live with her in London, and I said ‘No.’ She said that her residence would be in London now, and I should be all the year round in London, and she hoped that London would agree with me, as I had not been used with it. (Q.) Your own people, I suppose, are all in Scotland? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did she say anything about her reasons for living in London? (A.) She said all her friends were in London, and it was Mr Harvey's wish that she should reside at No. 113 St George's Square, but she thought she really could not do that. (Q.) Why? (A.) Because she did not care about the stairs, and it was rather too much, and the house was rather large for her; but she was going to sell the house, or going to try to. (Q.) Now in your subsequent conversations with her, in any talks you had with her after that, did she ever shew any change of mind as to her idea that she would live in London? (A.) No. (Q.) Was she looking for a house down to the last do you know? (A.) Yes. . . . (Q.) Did she use to talk to you about selling her farms in Scotland? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Had she quite made up her mind? (A.) Yes, she said she was going to keep them on no account. (Q.) Had she any idea of going back to Scotland? (A.) Never expressed such a wish to me. (Q.) Did she rather avoid anything that brought up old associations with her husband or child? (A.) No, latterly she talked very freely of them.”

a domiciled Scotswoman at the date of her husband's death in 1883. No. 117. Two questions then arose,—(1) Did she conceive and carry out an intention to cease to have a domicile in Scotland? and (2) Did she facto et animo carry out that intention? and on this latter point it was to be kept in view that a change of domicile involved a great deal more than a change of residence. But, in the first place, the Sheriffs had gone wrong in placing the onus upon the petitioner. The onus lay upon the respondent, who was attempting to set up an acquired domicile in place of the domicile of origin, and the domicile of origin must be displaced.<sup>1</sup> It was not enough to point to evidence that the deceased did not mean to go back to Scotland. Such evidence did not amount to proof of an animus to give up the Scottish domicile. The deceased might have moved about from place to place for years and never returned to Scotland, but that was not sufficient.<sup>2</sup> Upon the facts in the present case, no doubt the deceased had lived a good deal in London after her husband's death, but this merely supported the view that she had no fixed purpose of making a home anywhere. The evidence was thoroughly colourless as supporting the respondent's contention. The two witnesses who were chiefly relied upon on the other side were the coachman, Reid, and his wife, but it was to be remarked that they were influenced by their own wish that the deceased should take up her abode in London. There was this further observation to be made, that in the case of persons in the position of the deceased—left by the death of her husband without a home in Scotland, and previously accustomed to live part of the year in London—it was not unusual for them to take up their abode there. Accordingly, in a question of change of domicile, less weight was to be attached to the fact of a residence established in London (assuming there was such a residence, which there was not here) than to a residence established under similar circumstances in any other part of England or elsewhere out of Scotland.

Argued for the respondent;—It was admitted that there was a heavy onus on the respondent to shew that the domicile of origin had been lost, and that the change was established facto et animo. What had chiefly to be kept in view were the circumstances from which the animus was to be inferred. There was no need of a conscious animus, nor did it require to be expressed. All that was necessary was that the surroundings must be such as to involve it. If the consequences could be inferred from the act of change that was enough, although they were never present to the mind of the person making the change. In the first place, it was to be noticed that there was no family estate here, as there was in the case of Udny.<sup>3</sup> The two cases were therefore distinguishable in that very important respect. No doubt two farms—the only unentailed part of the property—had been left to Lady Elizabeth Harvey by her husband, but the evidence shewed that her wish always was to sell these. Further, upon the facts of the case, whatever was to be inferred as to Lady Elizabeth's animus in the matter, it was clear that de facto she had made up her mind never to have her home in Scotland again. And more than that, she had

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

<sup>1</sup> Steel v. Steel, July 12, 1888, 15 R. 896; Moorhouse v. Lord, March 1863, 10 Clark's H. of L. Reps. 272; Donaldson v. McClure, Dec. 18, 1857, 20 D. 307 (Lord Curriehill at p. 321), 30 Scot. Jur. 165, affd. March 7, 1860, 3 Macq. 852; Bell v. Kennedy, May 14, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 69, 40 Scot. Jur. 476; Arnott v. Groom, Nov. 24, 1846, 9 D. 142, 19 Scot. Jur. 43.

<sup>2</sup> Munro v. Munro, August 10, 1840, 1 Rob. Apps. 492; Fraser on Husband and Wife, 1265; Patience v. Main, March 7, 1885, L. R., 29 Chanc. Div. 976; Udny v. Udny, Dec. 14, 1866, 5 Macph. 164, 39 Scot. Jur. 163, June 3, 1869, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 89.

<sup>3</sup> Udny v. Udny, 5 Macph. 164, and 7 Macph. (H. L.) 89.

No. 117. made up her mind to have her home for the rest of her life in London. No doubt both these conditions must be present, for it was conceded that in order to the retention of a domicile of origin a home in the country of the domicile was not necessary. But it was submitted that both conditions were satisfied on the facts of this case. Besides, this was the case of a widow whose home was broken up by the death of her husband. That was all in favour of the respondent's contention, and differentiated the case from that, for instance, of a young Scotsman who might be absent from Scotland in London or in foreign parts for a period of years upon business. Here this lady's domestic life was wrecked by her husband's death. She had no jointure house, and all the remaining ties she had were in London. She was in bad health and under medical care, and when, accordingly, she settled in London, it was to be presumed that she chose, and chose finally, to take up her abode there. The evidence of Reed, the coachman, and his wife was very explicit as to her intentions. Any relations that she had with Scotland after her husband's death were due to the devotion which she paid to her husband's memory. The only two short visits she paid to Scotland arose from this desire. The real evidence was thus all the one way, and was sufficient to put the onus upon the appellants to shew that the deceased had not acquired an English domicile. The length of the residence was not of so much importance as its character, and the inferences which were to be deduced from the merely casual recollections of the most of the witnesses who had been examined were of no weight.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey died intestate and without issue on the 13th January 1888.

Thereafter the petitioner, Francis Erskine Vincent, who is a minor, presented a petition to the Commissary of Edinburgh praying to be decerned executorial qua next of kin to her along with his father as his curator.

The petition is presented on the footing that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey was at the time of her death domiciled in Scotland.

It is not disputed that the petitioner is the only child of Lady Margaret Erskine or Vincent, and that she and Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey were the only children of the second marriage of the Earl of Buchan, and that, therefore, the petitioner is the deceased's sole next of kin by the law of Scotland.

The petition, however, is opposed by the Earl of Buchan, who is the eldest brother consanguinean of Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey. He alleges that he is one of her next of kin according to the law of England, and that by that law brothers and sisters consanguinean are entitled, in cases of intestacy, to participate in the division of the deceased's estate equally with the brothers and sisters german; and he farther alleges that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey was at the time of her death domiciled in England.

The question at issue between the parties, and the only one that was argued to us, is whether Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey was at the time of her death domiciled in Scotland or in England.

The Sheriff-commissary, on considering the proof, pronounced, on 29th June 1888, an interlocutor by which he found that the deceased died domiciled in England, and dismissed the petition.

It is against this interlocutor that the present appeal is brought.

Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey was the daughter of the Earl of Buchan, who was a Scotch Peer and a domiciled Scotman. She was born in Edinburgh, and was married in 1855 to Mr Lee Harvey of Castlesemple, who was also a domiciled Scotsman and the proprietor of that estate in Scotland, where she principally resided with him until his death in May 1883.

There can be no doubt or question, therefore, that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey was from her birth down to this date a domiciled Scotchwoman.

It is at this date, accordingly, that the respondent alleges that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey changed her domicile.

That being so, the onus undoubtedly lies upon him of proving the change, and I may remark in passing, although it is not perhaps very material now, that the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff, of dates 16th and 31st March 1888 respectively, were erroneous, in respect that by ordering the petitioner to lead in the proof they failed to recognise the onus thus lying on the respondent.

What that onus is, and what the respondent must prove in order to establish a change in the domicile of origin, is, I think, quite settled in law, and I need only refer to the recent case of Steel v. Steel, 15 R. 896, and to the authorities there cited.

These cases settle that the respondent must prove not only that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey intended to abandon her Scotch domicile after the death of her husband, but also that she had actually acquired, animo et facto, a domicile in England. The domicile of origin cannot be lost until another is acquired. Merely to prove, therefore, that Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey when she went to England did not intend to return to Scotland to reside there, would, per se, avail the respondent nothing.

I think that it is equally well settled in law and in reason that an intention to abandon the domicile of origin is not easily to be presumed. It is not easily to be presumed that a person intends to abandon those civil rights which he has hitherto enjoyed, and which have hitherto regulated his life, and to subject himself to foreign laws. But this no doubt is a question of degree, and it may more easily be presumed, for example, that a Scotchman may have intended to subject himself to the laws of England than to those of a purely foreign country.

From a careful consideration of the evidence I am satisfied that when Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey upon the death of her husband in 1883, having no longer a residence in Scotland, went to reside in London, she had no intention of abandoning her Scotch domicile. I think she had no settled intention of residing in London or elsewhere in England. I think the state of her mind was that she had resolved to have no permanent home anywhere, but to reside either in England or abroad from time to time as best suited her health and convenience at the time; and I think that this continued to be the condition of her mind until her death.

If this be the right view of the evidence, then the respondent's case must fail, because, in that case, Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey never had the animus necessary for the acquisition of a new domicile.

That Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey should not have desired to form a permanent residence at any particular place was, I think, in her circumstances, very natural. There had been only one child of the marriage between her and her husband—a daughter, but she had died, and Lady Elizabeth, after her husband's death, was left very much alone in the world. She seems to have had few ties left, and no particular reason for selecting one place rather than another for a permanent residence. As regards Scotland, Castlesemple was entailed, and had passed into the hands of comparative strangers, so that she had no

No. 117.

Mar. 19, 1889.
 Vincent v.
 Earl of
 Buchan.

No. 117. longer any residence there. She seems to have had few or no friends in England, except her Scotch relatives, and of these she seems to have been most attached to her stepmother, Lady Buchan, who had brought her up; but Lady Buchan was an aged lady.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of Buchan.

There is, however, evidence as to what Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey's intentions were as regards her future life.

Lady Buchan, who I think is more likely than anyone else to have known her intentions in this respect, says,—“Her first idea I believe in the world was that she never would have a home again after losing her husband and child. Then she came to London, and she always disliked London excessively, and came, I believe, only because she knew I was so much attached to her. (Q.) Did she ever speak to you about living abroad? (A.) No. She always said she never would live anywhere, but she meant to go abroad. I daresay it would have ended in her living chiefly abroad, and only coming to England and Scotland occasionally.” And again Lady Buchan says, in answer to the question,—“Do you believe that she had any intention in her mind as to where she would live when she was in London? (A.) I am quite sure of her mind so far that she was determined she never would, you might say, ‘live’ anywhere. One cannot tell what might have happened, but I am quite sure it would not have been London or England—any part of England. But I do not believe she ever would have settled—I do not believe so.” Then again Lady Buchan says, with reference to Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey having sold her furniture,—“Oh, she” (Lady Elizabeth Lee Harvey) “told me she sold the things because she did not want them any more and never could want them again. I have heard her say that very often. (Q.) Did she say why she would not want them again? (A.) Because she said she never could be happy in this world, and she never would attempt to make a home for herself again. She said that to me in different words, but implying that. That was the only thing in fact, I think, that she had clear in her mind.”

Mrs Doctor Garret Anderson, who attended Lady Elizabeth professionally for a number of years, says on this subject, in answer to the question,—“Did she speak to you as to her intentions at any time? (A.) As to staying do you mean? (Q.) Yes. (A.) The only thing that I can remember bearing upon it at all was, that once or twice I tried to interest her in different things in London, and she always said,—‘ . . . Oh, it is not worth while taking up things in London. I am here only passing, I am here as it were for the time.’ I remember her saying that, and I think that is all.”

Mr Ligertwood, who is a very reliable witness, speaking to a conversation which took place in 1886, is asked,—“Did she say anything on that occasion as to where she was going to live? (A.) Not much; she thought it would end by her living abroad, as she thought the climate suited her better. (Q.) Did she ever make use of any expression that gave you to understand that she had any intention of residing permanently at any particular place? (A.) No; but I thought, when she spoke of living abroad, it would be Carlsbad, as she was very fond of it. (Q.) Did she use any expression to make you think that she thought of living in London or any other place? (A.) No, I don't think so.” And Dr Campbell, who is a witness for the respondent, and who had been her medical attendant for several years, says on this subject,—“(Q.) In the course of your conversations with her, did she ever say anything which shewed her intention as to the place of her residence? (A.) Not the slightest.

med to have no wish at all. She seemed to be absolutely indifferent as No. 117.

re she was."

is also a voluminous correspondence produced containing many of Lady Vincent v. Mar. 19, 1889.
th's letters, principally upon business matters, but it does not throw Earl of of any, light on her intentions in this respect. I may, however, refer to Buchan.

date 25th August 1883, addressed to Mr Ligertwood, in which she —"Of course I shall be more in London now than anywhere else." That ly what she was during the few future years of her life; but that is a ifferent thing from being settled permanently there.

regards the evidence of the servants, I do not think it is of any weight.
Elizabeth seems to have said to them one thing to-day and another to-—that she was going to live in London, in Germany, or in Paris, just as pened to be pleased with her surroundings at the time.

do the circumstances of her residence in London, after her husband's afford any presumption that she intended to reside there permanently.

husband had left her by disposition and settlement everything in his —and among other subjects a house in George Square, London, in which d resided for a part of the year, and in which she was residing when he
But she broke up her establishment there—sold the most part of the e, and ultimately the house also. Too much weight must not, however, hed to the sale of the house, because she thought it too large for her, not like the situation. After breaking up her establishment in George she lived for some time in lodgings, and then successively in three d houses in Cadogan Place, which situation she liked, and she ultimately ere in lodgings, or furnished apartments. Every year, except one when elled in England, she resided for some months abroad.

mode of life does not appear to me to suggest any element of permanency ence, but rather a desire on her ladyship's part to be able to move about d where she pleased.

he other hand, as regards Scotland, it is true that she had no residence ad only visited it twice after her husband's death. She had two farms rewshire, which her husband had left her, and although, when bad times d she had trouble with her tenants, she wished to sell these farms, they been sold at the time of her death. Her husband had also left her be-£14,000 and £15,000 of moveable property. This was all invested in d, and her whole business matters were managed by her agents in Scot-d she continued to contribute, through the instrumentality of Mr Ligert-o numerous local charities there.

facts might have been of little avail, if the question had been whether re sufficient to maintain a domicile of choice, but they are sufficient to at Lady Elizabeth had never severed her connection with Scotland.

nk the error into which the learned Sheriff-substitute has fallen lies in at he has failed to appreciate the difference between a domicile of origin omicile of choice, and on the whole matter I am of opinion that the rent has failed to prove that Lady Elizabeth took up her residence in d with the intention of permanently residing there, that consequently she ost her Scottish domicile, and that the interlocutor appealed against o be reversed.

D. PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the case is so very

No. 117. clear that the Sheriff-substitute could not have reached the conclusion he did if it had not been for the mistake he made in placing the onus upon the petitioner. Because the deceased happened to have been resident in London, he seems to have thought that the onus lay upon the petitioner to prove that the Scotch domicile was retained. But that is not the question which arises. The question is whether the Scotch domicile was lost, and it cannot be lost without the acquisition of a new one. There is a very heavy onus upon the person who undertakes to shew that a domicile was lost, where that domicile is the domicile of origin.

Mar. 19, 1889.
Vincent v.
Earl of
Buchan.

LORD FRASER delivered no opinion, as he had not been present when the case was argued.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD MURE, who was absent from illness, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 29th June 1888, repelled the pleas in law for the respondent, and sustained the pleas in law for the appellants, and remitted to the Sheriff-commissary to proceed accordingly.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 118. JAMES BEEDIE, Petitioner.—Balfour—M'Lennan.
MRS BARBARA BEEDIE, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—G. R. Gillespie.
Mar. 20, 1889.
Beedie v.
Beedie.

Parent and Child—Custody—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 86), sec. 9—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), sec. 5.—The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5, enacts that the Court may on the application of the mother of a pupil make an order regarding its custody, "having regard to the welfare of the infant and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent."

Held that where in an action of separation a father has been deprived of the custody of his child, it is competent for him to present a petition under this section.

In an action raised by a wife against her husband, concluding for separation and aliment and for the custody of children, the husband did not lodge defences, and after proof the Lord Ordinary gave decree of separation and found the pursuer entitled to the custody of a child of the marriage. Soon after the interlocutor had become final the husband presented a petition to the Court, founding upon the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, praying to have the order relating to its custody varied. Held that the interlocutor could not be altered, but that the question of the custody of the child was always open to the Court, and that the petition was competent in so far as it raised this question.

Observed that in a petition under sec. 5 the Court could give effect to considerations which could not be regarded in determining an action of separation and aliment.

1ST DIVISION.
C.

IN June 1888 Mrs Barbara Beedie raised an action against her husband, James Beedie, for separation and aliment on the ground of cruelty. The summons also concluded for the custody of two pupil children born of the marriage, viz., Ann Bartlet Beedie and Alexander Bartlet Beedie, the latter of whom was four years old.

At the date of the action the marriage had subsisted during sixteen years, and there were six children of the marriage living.

The husband did not lodge defences in the action, and was not represented at the proof which was subsequently led. No. 118.

On 10th November 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced an interlocutor granting decree of separation, awarding aliment for the pursuer and for the youngest child Alexander Bartlet Beedie, and finding the pursuer entitled to the custody of that child. He further interdicted the defender "from interfering with the said child, or the pursuer as his custodier." Mar. 20, 1889.
Beedie v. Beedie.

That interlocutor was not reclaimed against, and therefore became final.

On 11th January 1889 the Lord Ordinary issued an order on the defender to deliver up the child to his mother within fourteen days.

On 23d January 1889 James Beedie presented a petition to the First Division, in which he prayed the Court "to discharge the order pronounced by the Honourable Lord Trayner on 10th November 1888, finding the said Mrs Barbara Paterson or Beedie entitled to the custody and keeping of the said pupil child, Alexander Bartlet Beedie, and interdicting, prohibiting, and discharging the petitioner from interfering with the said child or the said Mrs Barbara Paterson or Beedie as his custodier; to find the petitioner entitled to the custody and keeping of the said child; and, if need be, to order the said Mrs Barbara Paterson or Beedie to deliver to the petitioner the person of the said child, to remain with him, subject to the further orders of your Lordships; or otherwise to alter and vary the said order of the said Lord Trayner, to the effect of giving the petitioner access to his said child at all reasonable times, and of providing that the said child shall during stated periods be in the petitioner's custody; and meanwhile to discharge the said order ad interim, and to direct that the said child shall remain in the petitioner's custody, pending the proceedings to follow hereon."

The petitioner founded on sec. 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886,* and averred that he had instructed agents to defend the action, but that they had not lodged defences, and had resigned the agency a few days before the proof; that the defender was unable timeously to make other arrangements; and that he did not hear the result of the action until 30th December 1888, when the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had become final. "The petitioner therefore feels much aggrieved by the said judgment, and particularly in so far as it deprives him of the custody of his pupil son.

While prepared to raise an action of reduction, he has been advised that, so far as regards the Lord Ordinary's order as to custody and aliment, he can obtain from your Lordships under the present petition the redress to which he humbly submits that he is entitled without resorting to such an action. This petition is accordingly presented."

Mrs Beedie lodged answers, in which she averred, inter alia,—"The respondent submits, in the first place, that this petition is incompetent, and should not be entertained by your Lordships, in respect that it is an attempt to bring under review or set aside a judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which can only be reviewed by way of reclaiming note, or set aside in a process of reduction. The section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49

* The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5, provides,—“The Court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent.”

No. 118. and 50 Vict. cap. 27), referred to is not applicable to the case of a regular action of separation and aliment, and there has been no application to the Court in virtue of that Act under which the prayer of the present petition could competently be granted.”

Mar. 20, 1889.
Beedie v.
Beedie.

She further averred that there had been no change of circumstances since the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was pronounced.

Argued for the petitioner;—Though the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary might be final on the question of separation and aliment, it did not affect the petitioner as guardian of his child. The Court was always open to a parent on such questions, and in the exercise of its nobile officium would at any time pronounce such an order as it thought fit with regard to that matter. What the Lord Ordinary had done under the 9th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, was equivalent to an order in an application under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. If not, then the discretion which was vested in the Court in a matter of this kind would fall to be exercised on different principles according as the case came before the Lord Ordinary or before the Division. The two Acts must be looked at together. If, then, the terms of the Act of 1886 could not be left out of sight by the Lord Ordinary in making an order of the kind, then the order was one of a kind which the Inner-House might have made under that Act. It was impossible now to go back to the Lord Ordinary, because his interlocutor was final, and the only way of attacking his judgment was by a reduction. But a petition to the Inner-House was quite competent—the matter being one in which under the statutes there was no finality. Further, the petition was quite competently brought at the father's instance. In many cases of this kind the Court had taken the view that although a man might make a bad husband he was not necessarily a bad father. Further, the Court were always anxious, if possible, not to break up a family, which would be the result of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor regarding the custody.<sup>1</sup> In a petition of this kind, in order to justify the Court in interfering, it was not necessary to aver a change of circumstances.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the respondent;—This question was really res judicata. The pursuer had been duly cited in a competent action, and he did not lodge defences. The Lord Ordinary's judgment might have been open to reduction, but no reduction had been brought. Further, no change of circumstances was alleged to have taken place since the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. All that was said was that a decree in absence did not constitute res judicata. The Lord Ordinary had not proceeded, and had not professed to proceed, in any sense upon the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, and in making the order regarding the custody of the child he had not paid any regard to the interests of the mother. It was to the interests of the child only that he was entitled to look under the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, and unless he saw that the child's moral welfare was to be interfered with if allowed to remain with its father, he would not take away the custody. Under that Act he could have no regard to the wishes of the mother. The Lord Ordinary's judgment must stand until it was competently reviewed, or a reduction was brought. The present petition was therefore incompetent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The prayer of this petition is, I think, somewhat un-

<sup>1</sup> Lang v. Lang, Jan. 30, 1869, 7 Macph. 445, 41 Scot. Jur. 159; Stuart v. Stuart, June 3, 1870, 8 Macph. 821, 42 Scot. Jur. 480; Lilley v. Lilley, Jan. 31, 1877, 4 R. 397; Bloo v. Bloo, June 6, 1882, 9 R. 894; Beattie v. Beattie, Nov. 10, 1883, 11 R. 85.

<sup>2</sup> Macdonald v. Macdonald, July 19, 1881, 8 R. 985; MacLachlan v. Campbell, May 25, 1809, F. C.; Stewart v. Stewart, Dec. 3, 1887, 15 R. 113.

happily expressed, as it asks us to discharge or to vary the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. That is language which would be perfectly applicable if the petitioner were entitled to bring the judgment in question under review, but I hold that he cannot do so, as the interlocutor is final, and cannot now be reviewed.

No. 118.
Mar. 20, 1889.
Beedie v. Beedie.

I am not, however, disposed to stand on the mere language of the prayer as raising a plea of incompetency, for what the petitioner in substance asks is that we should consider the question of the custody of his pupil child.

Whether it is competent to do that, without any change of circumstances having supervened, it is needless to determine, for one thing, I think, is clear, that it is competent for any parent in the position of the petitioner to come at any time and ask the Court to interfere with a view to regulating the custody of his child. This Court is always open to applications of that kind, notwithstanding any proceedings that have taken place in the Outer-House.

The question then comes to be, what can we do in this petition? We cannot alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, or find, in effect, that it should never have been pronounced; on the contrary, we must take it as having been properly pronounced. It is, however, open to our consideration whether the present condition of the custody of this child is the most beneficial in itself, and most in accordance with the equitable rules, or the statutory declaration of those rules, which must regulate the proceedings of this Court.

If the judgment had been the other way, and the custody had been given to the father of the child, I cannot imagine it being contended that the mother could not have presented a petition under the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, for then she could have asked the Court to consider things which would have been altogether irrelevant before the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and which he had no power to take into consideration. That section provides,—“The Court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent.”

Now, by that section this Court is authorised, in such cases as the present, to take into consideration and have regard to several things which it could not competently have regarded before the passing of that Act. I do not think that it makes any difference that here the father is the petitioner, and not the mother, for if we entertain the petition as competent at all, it occurs to me that it would be our duty in determining on the merits of the question to have regard to all the considerations mentioned in the section I have quoted. That section contemplates an application at the instance of the mother, and though this petition is not presented at her instance, it would, in my opinion, be anomalous if, in all such cases between a father and a mother, we did not have regard to the same considerations, whether the petition is presented by the one or the other; in short, I think, we are called on to exercise precisely the same discretion whether the petition is at the instance of the father or of the mother.

Now, that circumstance—that we are entitled to have regard to all the considerations mentioned in section 5—puts this petitioner in a different position from that which he would have occupied before the passing of the statute. Then it might have been contended with great plausibility, and possibly with

No. 118.
 Mar. 20, 1889.
 Beedie v.
 Beedie.

success, that there being no change of circumstances since the judgment of the Lord Ordinary (except that the child is two or three months older), there was no sufficient ground to entitle us to alter it. But, as I have said, the recent Act puts us in a wholly different position from that of the Lord Ordinary; he has no jurisdiction to give any weight to these new considerations; his jurisdiction is derived solely from the Conjugal Rights Act; but we have jurisdiction under the Act of 1886, and on a consideration of those circumstances which the Court is ordered to entertain by that Act we may arrive at a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary. I therefore think that this petition is competent.

There remains, however, the question on the merits, and I must say that nothing that I have heard leads me to think that the present arrangement is in any way improper; on the contrary, I see enough in the petition and answers to satisfy me that it is more expedient for the child, and altogether most reasonable and proper, that for the present it should remain in the custody of its mother.

LORD ADAM.—I have no doubt that it is always competent for a parent to petition this Court with a view to the regulation of the custody of his child, and as this petition has been presented to us, we must look at the grounds on which it proceeds. It is said that there has been no change of circumstances since the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but that is not the question before us. No doubt if a petition were presented to us to-day, and another next week, without any change of circumstances, we should know how to deal with it. Still I do not think that the second petition would be in any way incompetent.

Here we have to consider what is to be done with regard to the custody of this child, and in doing so we must remember that the mother is entitled to defend the custody which she has now got by reference to all relevant considerations, including the considerations suggested in section 5 of the Act of 1886. It may be that the Lord Ordinary could not take those things into consideration, but could only proceed upon the law as it stood before the Act, but if we, in a petition at the instance of the father, were not entitled to do so, there would be this anomalous result, that we should have to go upon the rules of the old law and grant the prayer of the petition, while the next day the mother might present a petition under the Act, when we might take those matters into consideration, and possibly arrive at a different conclusion. I think it is impossible to say that our jurisdiction is so restricted, and therefore, in my opinion, when such a petition as this is presented by a father, the mother may defend the custody by every means, including those given to her by the statute.

Taking that view of the case, I agree that in this case the mother ought to be allowed to retain the custody of this child.

LORD LEE concurred.

The case was heard and advised on 9th March, but no interlocutor was pronounced until 20th March. The arrangement as to access embodied in the following interlocutor was made by the parties extrajudicially. The following was the interlocutor:—

“SUSTAIN the competency of the petition in so far as regards the custody of Alexander Bartlet Beedie, the youngest child of the petitioner and respondent: Refuse the prayer, but subject to the following provisions in regard to access by the petitioner to his

said youngest child being carried out and given effect to, viz. :— No. 118.
 That the petitioner shall have access to the said Alexander Bartlet Beedie on the first Saturday of every month for an hour on each occasion, between 9 A.M. and 6 P.M., as the petitioner shall fix, and that within the Fife Arms Hotel, Banff, so long as the respondent shall reside in Banff, and in such other place as shall be convenient in the event of the respondent changing her residence; and also that the respondent shall, if desired, send the said Alexander Bartlet Beedie to live with the petitioner during the month of August of each year, the petitioner to be at the expenses of such visits: Find the respondent entitled to expenses," &c. Mar. 20, 1889.
Beedie v. Beedie.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

AUGUSTUS WILLIAM RIXON, Pursuer (Reclaimor).—H. Johnston—G. W. Burnet. No. 119.

EDINBURGH NORTHERN TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—Sir Ludovic Grant. Mar. 20, 1889.

Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.

Company—Title to sue—Reduction—Shareholder.—A shareholder in a public company brought an action against the company concluding for reduction of an agreement between the company and certain other parties thereto, on the allegation that the agreement which had been concluded by the directors without consulting the company was to the prejudice of himself and the other independent shareholders, that it was entered into "fraudulently and collusively," and that it would have the effect of seriously and unjustly depreciating the company's shares. There were further allegations that the agreement was ultra vires of the company. The Court (reversing judgment of Lord Kinnear) held that a plea of no title to sue fell to be repelled as an objection to satisfying the production, but that the pursuer was bound to call as defenders the whole parties to the agreement, and sisted the cause to allow of that being done.

THE EDINBURGH NORTHERN TRAMWAYS COMPANY was incorporated by the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, which authorised the construction of certain tramways in Edinburgh and Leith. By agreements between the Town-councils of Edinburgh and Leith and the promoters of the Act it was provided that all the works to be executed by the company should form the subject of competition and contract. 1st Division.
Lord Kinnear.
M.

After advertisement, a tender from the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited, for the construction of certain specified tramways was accepted by the Tramways Company, and the terms were embodied in an agreement between the parties, dated 24th October 1884. Objections having been taken by the shareholders of the Cable Corporation to the conditions of this agreement, a second and amended agreement was concluded between the parties on 22d July 1886, and the work of construction of one of the lines contemplated by the Act of 1884 was then proceeded with. This work was executed on behalf of the contractors by their sub-contractors, Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, but in consequence of delays, through litigation and otherwise, the tramway line so begun was not opened for traffic until January 1888.

In July 1886 the Cable Corporation had mortgaged their whole undertaking to the Debenture Corporation, Limited, in security of certain debentures for £40,000 issued to them by the corporation. This security was subsequently assigned by the Debenture Corporation to the Assets Realisation Company, Limited.

In payment of the work of construction of the tramway line, the Tramways Company issued shares of their company and mortgages to certain

No. 119. nominees of the Cable Corporation (who were the contractors), and at their request, so that out of 4500 £10 shares and £10,170 mortgages of the Tramways Company, 3190 shares and £6270 mortgages were held by certain persons, including the directors of the Tramways Company, for behoof of the Assets Realisation Company.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Rixon v.
Edinburgh
Northern
Tramways Co.

On 14th January 1888 the Cable Corporation was appointed to be wound-up under the Companies Acts, and Mr John Annan was appointed official liquidator.

Subsequently in February 1888 the Assets Realisation Company, on the representation that they held a majority of the shares and debentures of the Tramways Company, called upon the directors of that company to resign, and persons nominated by the Assets Company, and qualified by the transfer of shares belonging to the latter company, were thereupon appointed to be directors in their stead.

On 15th June 1888 an agreement was entered into between the Cable Corporation of the first part, Mr Annan (their liquidator) of the second part, the Tramways Company of the third part, and Dick, Kerr, & Company of the fourth part, whereby it was, inter alia, agreed that Dick, Kerr, & Company should proceed to construct certain other lines of tramway, which were authorised by the Act of Parliament; that they should advance certain sums of money to satisfy certain creditors of the Tramways Company; and that the contract price to be paid to Dick, Kerr, & Company for these new lines should be £75,000.

Mr Augustus William Rixon, a debenture and shareholder of the Tramways Company, now brought an action against the Tramways Company in which he concluded for reduction of the agreement of 15th June 1888.

He averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 17) "The said agreement of the 15th June 1888 has been entered into between the said parties wholly irrespective of the interests of the company, and to the prejudice of the pursuer and the other independent holders of shares and debentures. It was entered into by the defenders fraudulently and collusively, with the design of obtaining for Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company a contract on exorbitant terms free from competition, and such contract, should it be carried out, would have the effect of seriously and unjustly depreciating the shares and debentures held by the other independent mortgagees and shareholders of the company. The directors of the defenders were in fact acting in the transaction only as the agents of Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company, and of the Assets Realisation Company, as mortgagees of the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited, and not solely, as should have been the case, as the representatives of the defenders' company, which was not independently advised or represented in the preparation or execution of the said agreement. The sum proposed to be paid for the work, even if satisfied by shares and debentures of the company, is wholly disproportionate to the value of the work to be done, that value amounting to no more than the sum of £22,000 . . .

(Cond. 18) "The said agreement of 15th June 1888 is ultra vires of the defenders' company, the works thereby contracted for not having been made the subject of competition, as provided by the company's Act of incorporation. Further, it is not, as it represents itself to be, a supplemental agreement or contract to the previous agreements, but is in fact a new contract between new parties on entirely different terms from, and of a far more onerous character, so far as the defenders are concerned, than the previous agreements entered into between them and the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited. It constitutes in fact an entirely new and different contract for the construction of separate portions of the company's undertaking, and as such is ultra vires of the company, not having been made the subject of competition and contract, as provided by the company's Act of incorporation." (Cond. 19) "The said agreement of the 15th of June 1888 has not been submitted to the shareholders of the defenders, nor have any accounts been submitted to them for the half year to 30th June 1888. By section 69 of the Companies Clauses Act of 1845, incorporated with the company's Act of incorporation, it is provided that where no period is prescribed by the special Act, as is the case here, general meetings of the shareholders shall be held in the months of February and August in each year. No meeting was held in August 1888, and it is believed that the meeting of shareholders was not called with the object of concealing from the shareholders the excellent earnings of the company and its certainty of success in the future, and with the design of preventing objection being taken to the extravagant and unnecessary outlays for salaries and defective cables, and specially with a view to get the existence of the said pretended agreement of 15th June 1888 kept from the knowledge of the independent shareholders of the company, and thus prevent them timeously calling it in question."

No. 119.
Mar. 20, 1889.
Rixon v.
Edinburgh
Northern
Tramways Co.

The defenders denied these averments.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The agreement libelled having been entered into in contravention of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company's Act of 1884, is illegal and reducible at the pursuer's instance. (2) The said agreement not having been entered into in conformity with the said Act of Parliament, was ultra vires of the company, and ought to be reduced, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The said agreement having been entered into fraudulently and collusively, as condescended on, and being to the prejudice of the pursuer, decree should be pronounced in his favour, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) All parties not called. The other parties to the agreement sought to be reduced ought to be called.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 10th January 1889, sustained the defenders' first plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer is a shareholder of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, and he brings this action for the purpose of reducing an agreement between the company and certain contractors for the construction and maintenance of a line of tramway. It is not disputed that the line which it is proposed to construct is within the limits of the company's undertaking, but it is said to be ultra vires in other respects.

"It is well-settled law that a single shareholder can have no title to sue such an action, except on the ground that the contract which he challenges is ultra vires not of the directors only, but of the company as such, or on the ground of fraud upon himself. But the only ground on which it is alleged that the contract in question is ultra vires is that it is inconsistent with the terms of two previous contracts between the promoters and the Town-councils of Edinburgh and Leith, which have been confirmed by the incorporating Act so as to make them binding upon the company. By these contracts it was agreed, inter alia, that the works to be executed by the company should 'form the subject of competition and contract,' and the pursuer's ground of reduction is that the works which are contemplated by the contract which he challenges have not been made the subject of a previous competition. I do not think it necessary or proper to inquire whether, in the circumstances set forth on record, this would be a valid objection at the instance of the town-council, because it is an objection which the parties to the contracts confirmed by the Act of Parliament are clearly entitled to waive if they think fit. If the parties to these contracts should be of opinion that the stipulation in question has been substantially observed, or that in certain circumstances it would be prejudicial to the interests

No. 119.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Rixon v.
Edinburgh
Northern
Tramways Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The action was quite competently brought at the instance of a single shareholder. It was averred that the contract had been entered into through fraudulent and collusive dealing on the part of the defenders, and upon exorbitant terms. Where the majority of a company proposed to benefit themselves at the expense of the minority, the Court would interfere to protect the minority, and a single shareholder was entitled to come forward to vindicate the rights of the minority.<sup>1</sup> It was admitted by the Lord Ordinary that in a case with which they are charged to enforce it, or that it is undesirable or unnecessary to litigate on the subject, they are at liberty to sanction or acquiesce in an agreement to which they might otherwise have objected. It follows that a failure to comply with the stipulation involves no inherent invalidity in the agreement, and therefore that if it is open to any objection on the ground alleged, it is an objection which no one can have a title to enforce excepting the persons who are entitled to sue upon the contracts which are alleged to have been violated.

“A second ground of reduction is that the terms of the agreement are prejudicial to the company, and that the directors have acted in breach of their duty, against the interests of their shareholders, and in the interest of the other contracting parties. If this be so, it is a wrong done to the company, and not to the pursuer as an individual. If the pursuer thinks the agreement objectionable on the ground alleged, his proper course is to bring the matter before his fellow-shareholders. He cannot appeal to the Court to set it aside until the views of the shareholders have been ascertained, because if it is not in itself illegal, it may be supported by the majority. The case of Orr v. The Glasgow and Monklands Railway Company, 3 Macq. 799, is directly in point. The ground of action in that case was that the directors were also directors of a rival company, and that they had acted in the interests of this latter company to the prejudice of the shareholders of the first. The action was dismissed on the ground that although the transaction complained of was beyond the powers of the directors, it was competent for the shareholders to sanction it, and therefore that a single shareholder, or a minority, had no title to sue. Again, it is said that the agreement has not been submitted to the shareholders, and that certain of the directors are disqualified. Neither of these grounds will support an action of reduction. They are not objections to the legality of the agreement in itself, but to the manner in which it has been concluded. I do not inquire whether the directors ought to have laid the agreement before the company, or whether it was not in their power to make contracts for the execution of works without consulting the shareholders, because I think it clear that the company may sanction and adopt what has been done, assuming that they would not be bound by the action of the managing body alone. The rule is fixed that the Court will not interfere in such circumstances at the instance of a single shareholder. The principle is stated by Lord Justice Mellish in M'Dougall v. Gairdner, L. R., 1 C. D. 13,—‘If something has been done irregularly which the majority could do regularly, or if something has been done illegally which the majority could do legally, the majority are the only persons who can complain.’ There are many cases to the same effect. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plea to title must be sustained, and that renders it unnecessary to consider the other pleas stated in defence. But I must add that even if the pursuer had had a good title to sue, the action could not have been entertained in the absence of the contractors. They have a material interest in the agreement challenged, and it is manifestly impossible to set aside a contract made by the directors on behalf of the company without calling into Court the persons with whom they have contracted.”

<sup>1</sup> Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works, Feb. 24, 1874, L. R., 9 Chanc. App. 350; Mason v. Harris, March 1879, L. R., 11 Chanc. Div. 97; Atwood v. Merryweather, reported in a note to Clerich v. Financial Corporation, 1868, L. R., 5 Equity, 464.

of fraud the pursuer would have had a good title. His Lordship must have overlooked the averments, which quite came up to such a case. The defenders' plea should be repelled as an objection to satisfying the production. No. 119.
Mar. 20, 1889.
Rixon v.
Edinburgh
Northern
Tramways Co.

The reclaimers asked to be allowed to raise a supplementary action, calling the other parties to the agreement sought to be reduced.

Argued for the respondents;—The question of the pursuer's title to sue must be considered in the view of the ground of action, which was that the directors had exceeded their powers. But the meaning of a plea of ultra vires in this connection was that the company having been constituted for a particular object its directors had appropriated its funds to another and a different purpose, and that they were engaged in doing something which they were impliedly forbidden to do.<sup>1</sup> There was no such case here. There was no real case of fraud averred, although the language of the averments might be said to amount to an apparent case of that kind. The Lord Ordinary had done right in treating the case as one of ultra vires. In any view, that ground of action was insufficient, unless all the parties to the agreement sought to be reduced were called.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two preliminary defences to this action, “no title to sue,” and “all parties not called.” The Lord Ordinary has sustained the first of these, but to that course I am not prepared to assent. There is a distinct and intelligible ground of reduction stated here, namely, fraud, in respect of which it cannot be said that one or more of the shareholders cannot sue though the company can do so. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary is wrong. It is probably the fact that the pursuer relied too much on the ground of ultra vires in the discussion before the Lord Ordinary, and did not sufficiently attend to the question of fraud.

But, on the other hand, there are other parties to the agreement under reduction who must be called. The pursuer is prepared to call these persons, and the best form of order for us to pronounce would be to repel the first preliminary defence, reserving its effect on the merits, and in respect that the pursuer undertakes to call the other parties to the agreement, to repel the second preliminary defence. I think it premature to go into any examination in detail of the averments, or as to what their effect will be when the case comes to be tried on the merits, particularly if the pursuer amends his record, as he says he intends doing.

LORD ADAM and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor on 2d March:—“Recall in hoc statu the interlocutor reclaimed against, and sist the process till 12th March current to enable the pursuer to call as defenders the other parties to the agreement of 15th June 1888 sought to be reduced, viz., the Patent Cable Corporation and the liquidator of that company, and Messrs Dick, Kerr, & Company.”

On 20th March they pronounced this further interlocutor:—“Having resumed consideration of the cause, in respect a supplementary action has now been raised calling the Patent Cable Corporation and its liquidator, and Dick, Kerr, & Company, repel the second plea in law for the defenders; repel also the first plea in law for <sup>1</sup> Ott and Others v. Glasgow, Airdrie, and Monklands Junction Railway Co., Dec. 18, 1857, 20 D. 327, affd. April 24, 1860, 3 Macq. 799, Paters. App. 959.

No. 119.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Rixon v.
Edinburgh
Northern
Tramways Co.

the defenders as an objection to satisfy the production, reserving its effects on its merits, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause . . . .”

A. & G. V. MANN, S.S.C.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

No. 120.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Crindell,
& Co.

FREDERICK CROMBIE GARDINER AND OTHERS (Owners of a “Lismore”), Pursuers (Respondents).—Asher—C. S. Dickson.
MACFARLANE, M'CRINDELL, & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—
Balfour—Ure.

Ship—Charter-party—Cesser and lien clauses—Demurrage.—A charter-party provided “charterers’ responsibility to cease on cargo being loaded, provided the cargo is worth the freight at port of discharge. Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage. To be loaded as customary at Sydney. To be discharged as customary at . . . and at the rate of not less than 100 tons of coals per working-day, . . . and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days, at 4d. per register ton per day.”

In an action brought by the owners against the charterers for damages for detention at the port of loading, the defenders founded on the cesser and lien clauses as freeing them from responsibility. Held that the word “demurrage” in the lien clause did not cover undue detention at the port of loading, and therefore that the charterers were not exempted by the cesser clause from liability for damages for such detention.

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
C.

ON 15th November 1888 Frederick Crombie Gardiner and others, Glasgow, owners of the ship “Lismore,” raised an action against Messrs Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Company, merchants, Liverpool, charterers of the vessel, concluding for payment of £5000 for undue detention of the ship at Sydney, New South Wales. It was noted on the margin of the charter-party that the charterers were agents for J. D. Spreckels and Brothers, San Francisco.

By charter-party entered into between the parties on 12th March 1888 it was agreed that the “Lismore,” then at Hull, should proceed to Sydney, and there receive “from the factors or agents of the said charterers a full and complete cargo of coals, . . . and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to San Diego and deliver the same as directed by consignees, being paid freight at the rate of twenty-six shillings and ninepence . . . per ton of 20 cwts. . . . The act of God, . . . strikes, lock-outs, or accidents at the colliery directed, . . . always excepted. . . . Payment of freight to be made as follows:—On right and true delivery of cargo in gold coin at the exchange of $4.80 per £ sterling, charterers’ responsibility to cease on cargo being loaded, provided the cargo is worth the freight at port of discharge. Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage. . . . To be loaded as customary at Sydney, N.S.W. To be discharged as customary, in such customary berth or place as consignees shall direct, ship being always afloat, and at the rate of not less than 100 tons of coals per working-day, to commence when the ship is in berth and ready to discharge, and notice thereof has been given by the master in writing, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days, at 4d. per register ton per day.”

The “Lismore” arrived at Sydney on 15th August 1888, and on 27th August was ready to take in coal as stiffening.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) “According to the customary rate of loading at Sydney the defenders ought to have loaded the cargo of the ‘Lismore’ within twenty working-days after the stiffening was completed, or at latest, by the 4th October 1888; but they failed to furnish any cargo whatever to the vessel, except the stiffening, until the end of November, after this summons was served, and kept her lying at Sydney waiting for cargo until the 2d December 1888. The whole of the delay in loading a cargo after 4th October 1888 could easily have been saved by the defenders if they had so pleased, and was caused by their fault and negligence. With reference to the statement in answer, it is admitted that the vessel sailed from Sydney on 2d December 1888 with a cargo worth the amount of the freight at the port of discharge."

The defenders averred that the delay had arisen primarily from a strike at the collieries from which the cargo was to be supplied, and that subsequent negotiations between the parties caused further delay. In answer to cond. 4 they averred;—"The 'Lismore' was loaded in regular colliery turn, as customary at Sydney. On 2d December 1888 she sailed from Sydney with a full cargo of coals, worth much more than the amount of the freight at the port of discharge. Any delay that took place in loading the ship at Sydney was due entirely to causes for which in terms of the charter-party the charterers are not responsible."

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 5) "In consequence of her lengthened detention at Sydney, waiting to load a cargo under said charter, the bottom of the vessel has become foul, and the pursuers have been obliged to place her in dock to be cleaned. If the defenders had loaded the vessel with reasonable and customary despatch, in terms of said charter-party, it would not have been necessary to have the vessel docked, and this expense has been caused entirely through their fault."

The defenders denied that averment.

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 6) "By the defenders' failure to provide cargo, in terms of the said charter-party, and the consequent detention of the vessel, the pursuers have suffered, and will suffer, loss and damage to the extent, including the cost of docking, of at least £3000, for which the defenders are liable, and to which sum the conclusions of the summons are hereby restricted."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having failed to supply a cargo, in terms of said charter-party, they are liable for the extra cost and loss thereby incurred and sustained by the pursuers. (2) The pursuers having, through the defenders' breach of contract, et separatim, by the defender's fault or negligence, suffered loss and damage to the extent of £3000, they are entitled to decree for that amount. (3) The terms of the charter-party not being such as to free the defenders from liability for detention at the port of loading, the defences should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support their pleas. (2) The ship having loaded a cargo worth the freight at the port of discharge, the defenders are, in terms of the charter-party, freed from all responsibility to the pursuers for the damages claimed. (3) The ship having been loaded as customary, in terms of charter, the defenders ought to be assoilzied. (4) Separatim, The alleged detention of the ship having been due to causes excepted in the charter-party, the defenders are not responsible therefor.

On 28th February 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause and heard parties, repels the first and second pleas in law for the defenders: Allows the parties a proof of their averments respectively, to be held on a day to be afterwards fixed."*

* "OPINION.—The charter-party founded on in this case provides that the 'Lismore' shall proceed to Sydney and there load a complete cargo of coals,

No. 120.
Mar. 20, 1889.
Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Grindell,
& Co.

No. 120. The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The cesser and lien clauses in the charter-party freed them from liability for damages for detention at

Mar. 20, 1889.

Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Crindell,
& Co.

with which she shall proceed to San Diego. The 'Lismore' arrived at Sydney about the 15th August last, but she was not loaded with her cargo, and did not sail for San Diego until the 2d December. The present action is brought to recover damages from the charterers, on the ground that the 'Lismore' had been unduly detained by them at Sydney ; and the defence urged in limine (and the only defence I have now to consider) is that, in respect of the cesser and lien clauses in the charter-party, the defenders are not liable in the damages claimed. These clauses are expressed thus : 'Charterers' responsibility to cease on cargo being loaded, provided the cargo is worth the freight at port of discharge. Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage.'

"Clauses of similar import have already been the subject of judicial consideration in one or two cases in Scotland, and in a considerable number of cases in England. I cannot say that the decisions in the cases I have referred to are conflicting, but there are dicta in one or two of the later cases in England which are of a tendency to throw doubt upon the decisions formerly given. It is not necessary for me to go over all the cases to which reference was made in the argument, but I may refer to a very useful digest of them given by Mr Scrutton in his work on Charter-Parties and Bills of Lading, page 103 et seq. One rule or principle recognised in all the cases is this, that the cesser and lien clauses must be co-extensive, and that any particular liability enforceable against the charterer will not be held extinguished by the cesser clause unless the lien clause enables the shipowner to enforce that liability against the cargo or its owners or consignees. In short, the personal liability of the charterer is not extinguished unless a lien over the cargo is substituted for it. The application of this principle seems to me to afford a solution of the question now raised.

"The charter-party in this case confers a right of lien in favour of the ship-owners over cargo for 'demurrage'; and if the pursuers' claim was for demurrage, incurred either at the port of loading or the port of discharge, I think it must be taken to be settled by authority that the defenders would be entitled to absolver in respect of the cesser clause. But the claim now made is not for demurrage, but for damages for undue detention at the port of loading. Does the lien for demurrage cover such a claim? The defenders say that it does, because the word demurrage is popularly used among mercantile men to mean not only demurrage proper, but also detention beyond the demurrage days, as well as detention where no demurrage has been stipulated for. There can be no doubt that the word is popularly used as the defenders represent ; and that popular use and meaning has been recognised by some of the English Judges in their opinions. In Scotland, however, so far as I know, the two things—demurrage and improper detention—have always been kept distinct, and in my opinion properly so. They are quite distinct in character and in origin. A claim for demurrage arises from contract ; it is a payment fixed and determined by the contracting parties, in respect of which the charterer may detain the ship for a period longer or shorter beyond the lay-days. The claim for undue detention arises from fault—not contract, and the liability of the charterer is for the whole damage which his fault may have occasioned to the shipowner, whether greater or less than the sum which would in ordinary circumstances be stipulated for as demurrage for the same vessel.

"This distinction is as well known to merchants as to lawyers ; and the disregard of that distinction appears to me to have led to the differences of opinion which are to be found in some of the cases on demurrage questions. Regarding the two things as entirely distinct, I am of opinion that the lien conferred in the present case for demurrage does not cover a claim for damages on account of undue detention ; and that the lien clause not being therefore co-extensive with the charterers' personal liability, the cesser clause does not absolve them from the claim now made.

"Assuming, however, that the word 'demurrage' in the lien clause would Sydney, assuming that damages were otherwise due. Under the lien clause the pursuers had a claim against the cargo for detention at Sydney, which

No. 120.

Mar. 20, 1889.

Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Cindell,
& Co.

cover not only demurrage proper but also damages for detention beyond the demurrage days stipulated for, I am of opinion that the cesser clause in question does not free the defenders from the present claim. If the charter-party stipulates for demurrage only at the port of discharge, the lien clause for 'demurrage' will only be enforceable for that, and will not cover undue detention at the port of loading. Accordingly, upon the principle I have already stated, the charterers' personal liability in such a case for undue detention at the port of loading will not be affected by the cesser clause. And that is the case here. The provision in this charter-party regarding the loading of the cargo is thus expressed,—'To be loaded as customary at Sydney.' This provides only for the mode of loading and has no reference whatever to the time in which it shall be done—(Lawson v. Burness, 1 H. & C. 400; Tapscott v. Balfour, L. R., 8 C. P. 52-3; Lamb v. Kasselack, &c., 9 R. 482). There being no time for loading stipulated, directly or indirectly,—that is, no lay-days,—there could be no stipulation for demurrage. With regard to the discharge, however, there is a stipulation. It is provided that the cargo shall be discharged 'at the rate of not less than 100 tons of coals per working day, to commence when the ship is in berth and ready to discharge . . . and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days, at 4d. per register ton per day.' The time allowed for discharging (that is, the lay-days) is thus fixed and limited; and the demurrage-days over and above the lay-days and the rate of demurrage are also fixed. For such demurrage, if incurred, the owners have a lien over the cargo. The lien clause, however, for 'demurrage' cannot be extended beyond the 'demurrage' stipulated for; the same word in the same charter must be held to refer to the same thing. In such a charter the lien for demurrage cannot, in my opinion, be extended to cover claims not stipulated for, although they may be of the same nature.

"The case of Lockhart v. Falk (L. R., 10 Exch. 132) is quite in point. In that case the charter-party provided that the charterer should load the cargo 'in the customary manner,' that the cargo should be discharged in ten working-days, with demurrage at '£2 per 100 tons register per day,' that the ship should have an absolute lien on cargo for freight and demurrage, 'the charterer's liability to any clauses in this charter ceasing when he has delivered the cargo alongside ship.' It was held that undue detention at the port of loading was not demurrage, and that the charterer was liable for such detention notwithstanding the cesser clause. That decision has never been overruled. But the defenders say that its authority has been doubted or questioned in later cases, where opinions have been delivered inconsistent with its ruling. Even if this had been so, I would have been prepared, for my own part, to maintain its authority. But I think its authority is not even questioned.

"The first case cited as impugning the authority of Lockhart's case was Kish v. Cory (L. R., 10 Q. B. 553). There the charter-party provided that the cargo was to be loaded 'in thirteen working-days,' and to be discharged at not less than thirty-five tons per working-day. 'Ten days' demurrage for all like days above the said days to be paid at the rate of 4d. per registered ton per day,' and 'charterer's liability to cease when the ship is loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage.'

"The vessel was detained in loading five days beyond the thirteen provided lay-days, and the charterer was held not liable, because the claim was for demurrage, and that therefore the cesser clause applied. The difference between the cases of Lockhart and Kish is obvious, and they are in no way conflicting. In Lockhart's case there were no lay-days for loading, and no demurrage or lien for demurrage stipulated in reference to the loading. In Kish's case there were lay-days for loading and a provision for demurrage in reference thereto. Consequently the lien clause for demurrage, which included demurrage at the port of loading, having been substituted for the charterer's liability, the cesser clause took effect. But in Kish's case it was not suggested that Lockhart's case (re-

No. 120. lien came in the place of the charterers' liability. The whole question at this stage turned on the construction of the word "demurrage" in that

Mar. 20, 1889.

Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Crindell,
& Co.

ferred to in argument) had not been rightly decided. On the contrary, the three Judges who decided Lockhart's case took part in the decision of Kish's case, and made no reference whatever to their former judgment. The essential difference between the cases, which I have pointed out, fully accounts for this.

"I was, however, specially referred to the following expression of opinion by Mr Justice Brett in Kish's case, as throwing doubt upon the authority of Lockhart's case. 'I feel certain that when the occasion arises it will be held upon a clause like this, containing a cesser of liability of the charterer and a lien for demurrage, that "demurrage" includes not only demurrage proper, but also that which is in the nature of demurrage—viz., detention at the port of loading.' I have some difficulty in understanding this observation, and certainly cannot read it as indicating any dissent from the decision in Lockhart's case. If Mr Justice Brett meant to say that in cases where lay-days had been stipulated in regard to loading, followed by a general clause as to demurrage, that 'demurrage' would be construed as including 'that which is in the nature of demurrage—viz., detention at the port of loading' (that is, detention after the demurrage-days had expired), then the observation has no application whatever to the case where lay-days are not stipulated with regard to loading, and consequently has no bearing upon Lockhart's case or the present case. But if the observation I have quoted meant that a stipulation as to demurrage at the port of discharge would be construed, when the occasion arose, so as to cover a claim for improper detention at the port of loading, I can only say that the occasion had arisen before the decision in Kish v. Cory, and that the demurrage clause was not so construed. The reverse was decided in Gray v. Carr (L. R., 6 Q. B. 522), Justice Brett concurring in the judgment, and (on page 537, while throwing doubt on the decision in Rannister v. Breslau, 1867, L. R., 2 C. P. 497) stating without objection the very proposition on which Lockhart's case was decided.

"I was also referred to the case of Sanguinetti (L. R., 2 Q. B. Div. 238). In that case the charter-party provided that the ship should be loaded and discharged at so many tons per day, 'demurrage to be paid for each day beyond the said days allowed for loading and discharging, at the rate of 3d. per registered ton per day.' The cesser and lien clauses were in the usual terms. The only peculiarity in the case is, that the number of demurrage days is not limited, but every day beyond the days allowed for loading and discharging is treated as a demurrage day. The ship was detained in loading beyond the lay-days, and was therefore on demurrage during the whole detention. The Court held that the charterer was not liable, because the claim was for demurrage, and a lien had been given over cargo for demurrage. No question was raised, nor could have been raised, as to the charterer's liability for damages for undue detention, as distinguished from demurrage. The case of Lockhart (although referred to in argument) was not referred to in the decision, much less questioned or doubted.

"Another case referred to is that of Harris v. Jacobs (L. R., 15 Q. B. Div. 247). In that case the ship was to be discharged 'as fast as steamer can deliver.' A day was lost by the consignee not having a ready berth for the vessel, and the claim made upon that account was held to be covered by the clause which gave a lien for demurrage. Some observations were made as to the term 'demurrage' being elastic, and sufficient to cover this claim, which it was said was not 'strictly demurrage.' It appears to me to have been demurrage and nothing else. 'The ship was to be discharged as fast as she could deliver,' and 'demurrage to be at the rate of £30 per running-day'—that is, £30 a-day for each day the cargo was not discharged as fast as the ship could deliver. The day the vessel was detained from want of a berth (which it was the consignee's duty to provide), was just a day on which cargo was not taken delivery of at all, and was the same (so far as demurrage was concerned) as if the ship being in a berth no cargo had been taken by the consignee. If the steamer had got into clause, which included damages for delay by undue detention at the port of loading. When the word demurrage was used in its strict sense it was necessary that the rate at which it was to be charged, and the number of days for which it was to run, should be fixed in the charter-party. It was true that here, as regarded the port of loading, there were no lay-days expressly stipulated, but the words "as customary" applied both to time and manner of loading, and therefore it was only necessary to prove the custom at Sydney, and the number of lay-days would be ascertained. When the number of lay-days was mentioned (as they practically were here), then at common law demurrage was held to be used in the sense of covering not only demurrage proper but detention at the port of loading.<sup>1</sup> That was the construction given to the word not only in England but in Scotland. Though the question was not actually argued in Salvesen & Company's case, the judgment gave effect to that con-

No. 120.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Crindell,
& Co.

her berth when she arrived, her discharge would have been completed a day sooner than it was. That day was a day beyond her lay-days, and was therefore a day on demurrage. However this may be, Harris v. Jacobs does not directly or by implication question the authority of Lockhart v. Falk.

"The last case to be noticed is that of Salvesen v. Guy (13 R. 85), in which the charter-party stipulated for twenty working-days in loading, and sixteen days for discharging, 'with ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days.' Twelve days beyond the lay-days were occupied in loading, and demurrage for these twelve days was claimed from the charterers. The charterers pleaded the cesser and lien clauses in defence, and their defence was sustained. Now, here undoubtedly the Court in effect held that the demurrage clause covered two days for which demurrage proper could not be claimed. But the distinction between demurrage and damages for detention does not appear to have been adverted to even in the argument. The point raised and decided was the general one, that where a lien is given over cargo for demurrage, the charterer is by the corresponding cesser clause freed from personal liability for demurrage, and that irrespective of whether the demurrage has been incurred at the port of loading or port of discharge. It is obvious that the question raised and decided in Lockhart v. Falk was not before the Court. The case does not appear to have been cited. Gray v. Carr seems to have been cited either to shew that Baron Bramwell doubted the decision in Bannister v. Breslau, or in support of the view that the cesser clause could not be pleaded because the cargo had not been 'shipped in terms of the charter-party.' The law laid down in Lockhart and Gray was not discussed, nor the decision in either case doubted.

"But even if the Court had intentionally decided (in agreement with the dictum of Mr Justice Brett in Sanguinetti's case) that a clause providing for demurrage at the port of loading should be construed so as to cover damages for detention at that port beyond the stipulated demurrage-days, that would in no way conflict with Lockhart v. Falk, or with the judgment I am now pronouncing. In Lockhart, as here, there is no demurrage stipulated for at the port of loading at all. The demurrage clause has reference to the lay-days, and the lay-days have only reference to the port of discharge. Whatever therefore the Court might consider covered by a demurrage clause actually existing and forming part of the charter, and however much they might extend the limits of such a clause, it is clear that they could neither construe, extend, or limit, a clause which did not exist.

"I agree with the view expressed by the Lord Chief Justice (Coleridge) in Kish v. Cory, and by Lord Kinnear in Salvesen v. Guy, that as mercantile contracts are expressed with reference to decided cases in which the language used in such contracts has been judicially construed 'it is important stare decisis.' I therefore follow the direct authority of Lockhart v. Falk, which I humbly think to be a sound decision, and the authority of which has not been impaired by any subsequent decision."

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Prin. sec. 431; Bell's Comm. p. 622, 7th edit.; Salvesen & Co. v. Guy & Co., Oct. 28, 1885, 13 R. 85.

No. 120.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Grindell,
& Co.

struction. The Lord Ordinary decided the case on the principle that to relieve the charterers the cesser and lien clauses must be exact counterparts, but the parties could not have intended to enter into such a contract here, as the cargo was to be worth the freight, but the lien was to be for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage. The case of Bannister v. Breslau<sup>1</sup> was precisely in point, and in the defenders' favour, the only distinction between that case and this being that in the present case demurrage was used in its strict sense in a later part of the contract. With regard to Lockhart v. Falk<sup>2</sup> the cesser clause was there very limited, being only applicable to "liability to any clauses in this charter," and altogether the case was very special. Further, there the ship was to be loaded "in customary manner"; here the word "manner" was left out, and therefore the element of time was included in the contract. With regard to Gray v. Carr,<sup>3</sup> it was to be observed that Justice Brett's views in that case, that such a lien as there was here could not cover an illiquid claim for damages, were not given effect to in later cases, and that question was decided adversely to Justice Brett's view in Maclean & Hope v. Fleming,<sup>4</sup> in the House of Lords. In the report of Maclean & Hope in the Law Reports it did not appear that the House of Lords had settled that question, and Justice Brett probably had the report from which the Law Reports were afterwards printed before him. From the opinions, however, as given in 9 Macph., it appeared that the question was decided. In Kish's case, and other subsequent cases,<sup>5</sup> there were judicial opinions in the clearest terms that "demurrage" included damages for delay at the port of loading. The case of Lockhart v. Falk, on which the Lord Ordinary mainly rested his judgment, could not stand beside these later authorities. The pursuers' case depended entirely on an inferential limitation of the cesser and lien clauses, founded on the latter part of the charter-party, where "demurrage" was admittedly used in its strict sense, but there was no authority for saying that where such was the case plain words in another part of the contract could not be read in a wider sense, if they could bear it.

Argued for the respondents;—The case of Gray v. Carr (6 Q. B. 522) was precisely in point, and this case ought to be decided in conformity with that decision and the case of Lamb v. Kaselack,<sup>6</sup> where it was held that such a lien as there was here did not cover an unliquidated claim of damages for detention. The argument that Gray v. Carr was overruled by Maclean & Hope v. Fleming could not stand, because that case was specially considered in Gray v. Carr, and what Gray v. Carr settled was that the lien there did not cover the case of damages for breach of contract, which was really the nature of a claim for demurrage when used in its wider sense. Maclean & Hope's case dealt with dead-freight, and not with demurrage. The distinction between the strict and the wider meaning of demurrage was well known to our law.<sup>7</sup> Detention could be

<sup>1</sup> Bannister v. Breslau, 1867, L. R., 2 C. P. 497.

<sup>2</sup> Lockhart v. Falk, 1875, L. R., 10 Exch. 132.

<sup>3</sup> Gray v. Carr, 1871, L. R., 6 Q. B. 522.

<sup>4</sup> Maclean & Hope v. Fleming, March 27, 1871, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 39, L. R., 2 H. L. Sc. 128.

<sup>5</sup> Kish v. Cory, 1875, L. R., 10 Q. B. 553; Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co., 1877, L. R., 2 Q. B. D. 238; Harris & Dixon v. Jacobs, 1885, L. R., 15 Q. B. D. 247; Scrutton on Charter-Parties, pp. 103-113; Christoffersen v. Hansen, 1872, L. R., 7 Q. B. 509.

<sup>6</sup> Lamb v. Kaselack, Alsen, & Co., Jan. 31, 1882, 9 R. 482, see Lord Craighill, p. 490.

<sup>7</sup> Bell's Comm. i. pp. 588-622, and ii. 95, 7th edit.

claimed for, not on the contract, but as damages, while demurrage in the strict sense was a contract that the ship might be hired for an extra number of days at a certain rate. The words "as customary" did not regulate the rate of delivery of the cargo (Lamb v. Kaselack, Alsen, & Co., 9 R. 482), and it was not necessary that the precise number of days should be fixed by the contract to enable the Court to read "demurrage" in its strict sense.<sup>1</sup> But, in point of fact, there was no "demurrage" proper stipulated for in this contract at the port of loading, and what was claimed by the pursuers was not "demurrage," but damages for undue detention. It was a fair consideration for the Court that in the latter part of this charter-party demurrage was clearly used in its strict sense, and the lien clause was intended to cover that part of the contract, and had nothing to do with detention at the port of loading.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This action is instituted by the owners of the "Lismore," and is directed against a firm who chartered the vessel for a voyage to Sydney, and thence to San Diego. The purpose of the action is to recover damages on the ground that the vessel was unduly detained at the port of loading, that is to say, at Sydney. The defenders maintain that the pursuers' claim is excluded by the terms of the charter-party. The Lord Ordinary has repelled that defence, and the question for us to determine is whether his interlocutor is well founded.

By the charter-party the vessel was to proceed to Sydney, and there to load a cargo to be carried to San Diego. It is stipulated that the vessel was to be loaded "as customary at Sydney," and with reference to the port of discharge, it is further stipulated that she was to be discharged at a certain rate "not less than 100 tons . . . per working-day, to commence when the ship is in berth and ready to discharge, and notice thereof has been given by the master in writing, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days, at 4d. per register ton per day."

I observe that with respect to the port of loading there is no stipulation as to lay-days or demurrage, the only stipulation with regard to the loading being that it shall be "as customary at Sydney." It is not, I think, material to inquire whether the words "as customary" refer to the manner of loading only, or whether they include time, because if they refer to time, the only difference would be that instead of stipulating for a reasonable time there would be a stipulation for usual time. That difference is not I think material, the important fact being that with reference to the port of loading there is no agreement that the ship shall remain there for any time on demurrage, whereas when she comes to the port of discharge there is a stipulation for a certain number of lay-days and ten days on demurrage.

The pursuers say that when the vessel was at Sydney she was unduly detained for a certain time, that is to say, she was detained so many days beyond a reasonable time, or it may be—there is no reason to decide that question—beyond the usual time in that port. In consequence of that delay, the pursuers say that they suffered damage.

The defenders, while assuming that such detention occurred, say that they <sup>1</sup> Holman & Sons v. Peruvian Nitrate Co., Feb. 8, 1878, 5 R. 657; Whites v. Steamship Winchester Co., Feb. 5, 1886, 13 R. 524, see Lord Shand, 535; Ford v. Cotesworth, 1868, L. R., 4 Q. B. 127.

No. 120.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Gardiner v.
Macfarlane,
M'Crindell,
& Co.

are discharged from liability on that account by reason of the following clause in the charter-party. "Charterers' responsibility to cease on cargo being loaded, provided the cargo is worth the freight at port of discharge. Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage." The defenders say that they did put on board a full cargo, or a cargo sufficient, at all events, to satisfy their obligation, and that when they did so all obligations or liabilities which they had incurred ceased, or were discharged by reason of the stipulation I have read.

We have one important case among the many which were cited to us, which decided an important point with respect to a clause of the kind we have to interpret here, and that case is all the more important because, I think, neither party has disputed its authority. I refer to the case of Christoffersen (L. R., 7 Q. B. 509). The decision in that case was that this clause, or one in very similar terms, applied only to liability arising after loading, unless the liability which had been previously incurred for illegal detention was transferred to cargo. I think that view was assumed to be just by all parties, and accordingly the defenders maintain that the pursuers are not entitled to recover from them the loss caused by due detention, in respect that that loss has been charged on cargo over which a lien has been given for it. We have, therefore, to construe the phrase, "Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage," and to determine what is included in the word "demurrage." Does it include what I have called loss for "undue detention," or in other words, damages for detention in breach of contract, or is it limited to demurrage proper? The question turns on the terms of the charter-party, and I do not know that we can gain any material aid from the cases which have been laid before us. We must determine what is the fair meaning of the word "demurrage" in this charter-party.

If the view of the defenders is right, it would mean that a lien has been constituted over the cargo for an entirely illiquid debt. I do not say that that cannot be done if the parties so contract, but I think it is reasonable to hold that if the parties intend that such lien shall be created, their intention must be expressed in very plain words.

In the case of Maclean & Hope (9 Macph. (H. L.) 39), it was decided by the House of Lords that such a lien was admissible if it was clearly contracted for, and in that case there was no doubt about the meaning of the charter-party. For the lien which was claimed was a lien for dead-freight, and that had been made a matter of express stipulation.

The present case is entirely different. There is no lien stipulated for except a lien for demurrage. But we are asked to hold that this lien covers an illiquid claim of damages arising from the undue detention of the ship. I cannot so hold. Demurrage in the proper sense of the word is stipulated for at the port of discharge, and if such demurrage had been incurred, it would no doubt have formed a lien over cargo. So far, therefore, the stipulation for a lien for demurrage is satisfied. If we were to sustain the argument of the defenders, we should be assigning two different meanings to the same word in the same contract. This, in my opinion, we cannot do. We must give the word demurrage the same meaning in the two places in which it occurs, and therefore we cannot hold that it includes damages for illegal detention. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

It is not necessary to examine the cases cited to us, for, as I have said, we have to examine the words of the contract before us, but at the same time, I No. 120.

 think the conclusion I have arrived at is strongly fortified by the decisions in the cases of Lockhart v. Falk (L. R., 10 Exch. 132), and Gray v. Carr (L. R., Mar. 20, 1889.
 6 Q. B. 522). Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Co.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. This is an action against the charterers of a vessel for damages in respect of undue detention at Sydney, the port of loading. The loading it is alleged ought to have been completed on 4th October, but the vessel was detained until 2d December.

If that be so, I do not understand that it is disputed that the charterers are liable unless they can shew that their liability was transferred to the cargo of the vessel in the shape of a lien constituted over it.

That question depends on the construction of a clause in the charter-party. If "demurrage" in that clause is used in its strict legal sense, then the lien over the cargo does not cover damages for the detention at Sydney, but if it is held to have the wider signification sought to be put upon it, so as to include damages for detention, then there would be such a lien over the cargo in this case.

The whole question therefore, I think, turns on the construction of the word "demurrage" in the clause "Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage." My opinion is that, apart from the fact that the word "demurrage" is used in its strict sense in another part of the contract, "demurrage" should be read in that strict sense unless there is something in the charter-party to shew that it is intended to have the wider signification. There is nothing to shew that here, and the very fact that in another part of the same contract it is used clearly in its strict sense goes far to shew that in the clause I have quoted it should be construed strictly.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The portion of the charter-party which requires construction may be represented as consisting either of one clause or of two. The Lord Ordinary has dealt with it as two separate clauses, which he terms the cesser and lien clauses respectively. If it is dealt with as two separate clauses, then the one may be taken as the counterpart of the other, in short, the one clause provides for a cesser of the charterers' liability in consideration of the lien over the cargo given in the other.

I have no doubt that the whole question turns on the use of the word "demurrage." Prima facie that word means a stipulation for payment in the contract of charter-party, but it is said that it may be used in another and wider sense, and that it is so used here.

Now, if no demurrage in the strict sense were stipulated for in this contract that might be a pretty strong reason for supposing that the word must be intended to mean detention at either port beyond the demurrage or lay-days, but we have here demurrage stipulated for as matter of contract at the port of discharge, and that is quite sufficient to account for the lien for demurrage over the cargo.

In construing a lien of that kind it is not out of course to consider what would be the natural effect of the one construction of the word demurrage and of the other. When we look at the claim which is said here to be transferred from the charterers to the cargo, we find a statement, in the first place, in article 4 of the condescendence, to this effect,—“According to the customary rate of loading at Sydney, the defenders ought to have loaded the cargo of the ‘Lia-

No. 120. more' within twenty working-days after the stiffening was completed, or, at latest, by the 4th October 1888; but they failed to furnish any cargo whatever to the vessel, except the stiffening, until the end of November, after this summons was served, and kept her lying at Sydney waiting for cargo until the 2d December 1888. The whole of the delay in loading a cargo after 4th October 1888 could easily have been saved by the defenders if they had so pleased, and was caused by their fault and negligence." Again, the following claim is set out in article 5:—"In consequence of her lengthened detention at Sydney, waiting to load a cargo under said charter, the bottom of the vessel has become foul, and the pursuers have been obliged to place her in dock to be cleaned. If the defenders had loaded the vessel with reasonable and customary despatch, in terms of said charter-party, it would not have been necessary to have the vessel docked, and this expense has been caused entirely through their fault." Now, that suggests what would be the nature of the settlement of the claim, supposing it to fall under the lien clause, on the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge. There would have to be an inquiry whether the vessel's bottom was fouled owing to the detention at Sydney, what was the extent of that fouling, and what was the expense incurred owing to the vessel having to be docked. All those questions would have had to have been tried while the cargo was lying undelivered, being subject to a lien. The inconvenience of that is very apparent, and that very inconvenience is, I think, an element to be taken into consideration in construing the word "demurrage," for it furnishes a strong argument against construing the word in any but its strict sense.

No doubt any inconvenience is to be disregarded if the words of the contract are perfectly clear and distinct; that was so decided in Maclean & Hope (9 Macph. (H. L.) 39), where it was held that inconvenience could not be taken into account, because the parties to the contract had contracted in simple and clear terms, and should have thought about any inconvenience that might arise before they entered into it.

But, here, if anything is clear, it is that "demurrage" does not comprehend what the defenders say it does, but, if there is any doubt in the matter, then the inconvenience which would arise from construing the word in the sense they contend for comes in strongly as an element in construing it.

I am therefore strongly of opinion that the use of the word here only covers demurrage in its ordinary sense, as embracing the demurrage-days actually stipulated for in the contract, the payment for which is also liquidated.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed
WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 121. THOMAS LEITCH AND OTHERS (Kippen's Trustees), First Parties.—
C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.
Mar. 20, 1889. THOMAS LEITCH AND ANOTHER (Mrs Kippen's Executors).—
Kippen's Trustees. C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.
JOHN WILSON (James M'Intosh's Factor), Third Party.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—A. J. Young.
PETER CRERAR AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.
Succession—Heritable or Moveable—Conversion.—A testator conveyed his heritable and moveable estates to trustees with directions to pay to his wife, in case she survived him, a liferent of the trust-estate, and "to pay" to her "for her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire." He further directed his trustees, at the first term which should happen six months after her death, "to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half" of the residue. The other half was to be divided into six shares and paid to certain relatives. For accomplishing the purposes of the trust he gave his trustees power to sell his whole estate, heritable and moveable.

The widow received the liferent, but never applied for or received any payment from the capital. She died, leaving a will conveying her "moveable estate."

In a question between her heir-at-law and the executors under her will as to whether her right to one-half of the price realised from heritage belonging to the trust-estate, and unsold at her death, was heritable or moveable, held that it was moveable, and was carried by her will.

DUNCAN KIPPEN, spirit-merchant, Edinburgh, died on 24th April 1879. 2D DIVISION.
M. He was survived by his wife. He had no child. He left a settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for certain purposes therein specified.

By the fifth purpose he directed the trustees to pay to his widow during her life, if she survived, the income of the residue of his estate. By the sixth purpose he directed the trustees "to pay to my said wife, in case she shall survive me, for her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire, but declaring that in case any such payments are made to her, the liferent above provided to her shall be restricted to the liferent of the remainder of the residue."

By the seventh purpose he provided,—“I hereby direct and appoint my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen six months after the death of my wife, in case she shall survive me, to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half of the free residue and remainder of the trust-estate, after reckoning the payments out of the capital which may have been made to her by my trustees under the sixth purpose of the trust, and which are to be imputed towards payment of said half; and further, in the event of my said wife predeceasing me, I hereby direct my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen six months after my death, to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the said one equal half of the free residue and remainder of the trust-estate.”

Lastly, with regard to the other half of the residue he directed his trustees at the first term after his death to divide it into six equal shares, and to pay and assign these among certain of his own relatives. The provisions to his wife were declared to be in full of her legal rights.

The deed contained the following power of sale:—"For accomplishing the purposes of this trust, I hereby specially authorise and empower my said trustees and their fofoes to sell and dispose of my whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, hereby conveyed, and to convert it into money, and that either by public sale or private bargain."

Mrs Kippen enjoyed the liferent of the residue till her death on 12th January 1888. She did not request, and did not receive, any payments out of the capital of the trust-estate as contemplated under the sixth purpose of the trust. She left a testament by which, on the narrative

No. 121.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Kippen's
Trustees.

No. 120. more' within twenty working-days after the stiffening was completed, or, at latest, by the 4th October 1888; but they failed to furnish any cargo whatever to the vessel, except the stiffening, until the end of November, after this summons was served, and kept her lying at Sydney waiting for cargo until the 2d December 1888. The whole of the delay in loading a cargo after 4th October 1888 could easily have been saved by the defenders if they had so pleased, and was caused by their fault and negligence." Again, the following claim is set out in article 5:—"In consequence of her lengthened detention at Sydney, waiting to load a cargo under said charter, the bottom of the vessel has become foul, and the pursuers have been obliged to place her in dock to be cleaned. If the defenders had loaded the vessel with reasonable and customary despatch, in terms of said charter-party, it would not have been necessary to have the vessel docked, and this expense has been caused entirely through their fault." Now, that suggests what would be the nature of the settlement of the claim, supposing it to fall under the lien clause, on the arrival of the vessel at the port of discharge. There would have to be an inquiry whether the vessel's bottom was fouled owing to the detention at Sydney, what was the extent of that fouling, and what was the expense incurred owing to the vessel having to be docked. All those questions would have had to have been tried while the cargo was lying undelivered, being subject to a lien. The inconvenience of that is very apparent, and that very inconvenience is, I think, an element to be taken into consideration in construing the word "demurrage," for it furnishes a strong argument against construing the word in any but its strict sense.

No doubt any inconvenience is to be disregarded if the words of the contract are perfectly clear and distinct; that was so decided in Maclean & Hope (9 Macph. (H. L.) 39), where it was held that inconvenience could not be taken into account, because the parties to the contract had contracted in simple and clear terms, and should have thought about any inconvenience that might arise before they entered into it.

But, here, if anything is clear, it is that "demurrage" does not comprehend what the defenders say it does, but, if there is any doubt in the matter, then the inconvenience which would arise from construing the word in the sense they contend for comes in strongly as an element in construing it.

I am therefore strongly of opinion that the use of the word here only covers demurrage in its ordinary sense, as embracing the demurrage-days actually stipulated for in the contract, the payment for which is also liquidated.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.
WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—HAMILTON, KINNAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 121. THOMAS LEITCH AND OTHERS (Kippen's Trustees), First Parties.—
C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.
Mar. 20, 1889. THOMAS LEITCH AND ANOTHER (Mrs Kippen's Executors).—
Kippen's Trustees. C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.
JOHN WILSON (James M'Intosh's Factor), Third Party.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—A. J. Young.
PETER CRERAR AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—C. J. Guthrie—Gunn.

Succession—Heritable or Moveable—Conversion.—A testator conveyed his heritable and moveable estates to trustees with directions to pay to his wife, in case she survived him, a liferent of the trust-estate, and "to pay" to her "for No. 121.

her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire." He further directed his trustees, at the first term which should happen six months after her death, "to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half" of the residue. The other half was to be divided into six shares and paid to certain relatives. For accomplishing the purposes of the trust he gave his trustees power to sell his whole estate, heritable and moveable. Mar. 20, 1889.
Kippen's
Trustees.

The widow received the liferent, but never applied for or received any payment from the capital. She died, leaving a will conveying her "moveable estate."

In a question between her heir-at-law and the executors under her will as to whether her right to one-half of the price realised from heritage belonging to the trust-estate, and unsold at her death, was heritable or moveable, held that it was moveable, and was carried by her will.

DUNCAN KIPPEN, spirit-merchant, Edinburgh, died on 24th April 1879. 2D DIVISION. He was survived by his wife. He had no child. He left a settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for certain purposes therein specified. M.

By the fifth purpose he directed the trustees to pay to his widow during her life, if she survived, the income of the residue of his estate. By the sixth purpose he directed the trustees "to pay to my said wife, in case she shall survive me, for her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire, but declaring that in case any such payments are made to her, the liferent above provided to her shall be restricted to the liferent of the remainder of the residue."

By the seventh purpose he provided,—“I hereby direct and appoint my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen six months after the death of my wife, in case she shall survive me, to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half of the free residue and remainder of the trust-estate, after reckoning the payments out of the capital which may have been made to her by my trustees under the sixth purpose of the trust, and which are to be imputed towards payment of said half; and further, in the event of my said wife predeceasing me, I hereby direct my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen six months after my death, to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the said one equal half of the free residue and remainder of the trust-estate.”

Lastly, with regard to the other half of the residue he directed his trustees at the first term after his death to divide it into six equal shares, and to pay and assign these among certain of his own relatives. The provisions to his wife were declared to be in full of her legal rights.

The deed contained the following power of sale:—“For accomplishing the purposes of this trust, I hereby specially authorise and empower my said trustees and their fofoes to sell and dispose of my whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, hereby conveyed, and to convert it into money, and that either by public sale or private bargain.”

Mrs Kippen enjoyed the liferent of the residue till her death on 12th January 1888. She did not request, and did not receive, any payments out of the capital of the trust-estate as contemplated under the sixth purpose of the trust. She left a testament by which, on the narrative

No. 121. that she desired to provide for the succession to her moveable estate, she appointed certain persons her executors, with power to intromit with her whole moveable estate and effects of every description.”

Mar. 20, 1889.
Kippen's
Trustees.

The residue of the trust-estate of Mr Kippen included about £2000 of moveable property, and also house property in Buccleuch Place and Gladstone Place, Edinburgh. These subjects remained unsold till February 1888, when the trustees sold them for £954. One half of this sum fell to be divided into six shares in terms of the last purpose of the trust.

A question arose as to whether the other half—£477—was “to be regarded as moveable or heritable,” and as to the person to whom it fell to be paid. A special case was adjusted in order to the decision of this question. Mr Kippen's trustees were first parties. The sum was claimed by Mrs Kippen's executors (second parties) on the ground that on a sound construction of the seventh purpose of Mr Kippen's settlement the subject of the bequest was moveable.

On the other hand the third party, John Wilson, factor for James M'Intosh, Mrs Kippen's heir-at-law, contended that the bequest conferred on her a heritable jus crediti, which passed to her heir-at-law.

On the suggestion of the Court, after hearing argument, a minute was lodged for the next of kin of Mrs Kippen, sisting them as fourth parties.

Argued for the second and fourth parties;—The question was one of intention, and intention to convert was to be gathered from the settlement as a whole. The direction “to pay and assign” imported an intention to convert, as these words were more applicable to moveable than to heritable succession. Again half the residue was to go in six shares, which as events proved would be divisible among twenty beneficiaries. Further, there was ample power of sale if the trustees had chosen to exercise it.<sup>1</sup> Lastly, the provisions for the widow in the sixth purpose implied conversion. She was given a right, if she had chosen to exercise it, to demand of the trustees money to the amount of half the residue. It was a power to draw a sum of money.

Argued for the third party;—There was no direction to convert. A mere power in the trustees to convert would not operate conversion. Conversion, if not directed by the testator, must not only be permissible under his will, but also indispensable to its execution before it could be held to be operated by implication. Here it was not necessary, and no better proof of that could be given than that the purpose of the trust had been fulfilled without recourse to it. The beneficiaries were not nearly so numerous as in the case of Duncan's Trustees, and pro indiviso conveyance of the heritage was the appropriate course.<sup>2</sup> No doubt the thing to be paid or conveyed at the winding up of the trust was a “balance,” which prima facie meant a balance of money. But there was no need to produce a “balance.” The widow never required the money, and it was therefore not necessary to alter the condition of the succession.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Duncan Kippen, who died on 24th April 1879, left a

<sup>1</sup> Authorities cited.—Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 Macq. 379; Advocate-General v. Blackburne's Trustees, Nov. 27, 1847, 10 D. 166; Advocate-General v. Williamson, Jan. 23, 1840, 13 D. 436, aff. March 16, 1843, 2 Bell's Appa. 89; Weir v. Lord Advocate, June 22, 1865, 3 Macph. 1011, 37 Scot. Jur. 522; Auld v. Anderson, Dec. 8, 1876, 4 R. 211; Duncan's Trustees v. Thomas, March 16, 1882, 9 R. 731; Baird v. Watson, Dec. 8, 1880, 8 R. 233.

<sup>2</sup> Auld v. Anderson, supra.

trust-disposition and settlement dealing with his whole estate. The only purposes of that settlement with which we are at present concerned are the sixth and seventh. By the sixth, he directs his trustees "to pay to my said wife, in case she shall survive me, for her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate, any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire. . . ."

No. 121.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Kippen's
Trustees.

By the seventh, he directed his trustees at the first term after his wife's death, if she survived him, to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees, the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half of the free residue and remainder of the trust-estate, after reckoning the payments out of capital which may have been made to her by my trustees under the sixth purpose of the trust.

The trustees were, "for accomplishing the purposes of this trust," empowered to sell and dispose of the truster's whole estate, heritable and moveable, and convert it into money.

Mrs Kippen survived her husband, and died in 1888, having never applied for or received payments out of the capital, as provided in the sixth purpose of the trust.

The residue of the trust-estate consisted, inter alia, of certain house property in Edinburgh, which has been sold since Mrs Kippen died. One half of the price is £477, and in this special case we are asked to decide whether it is heritable or moveable. On the one hand, her heir claims it as heritable, on the other, her executors under her will, which conveyed her whole moveable estate, claim it as carried thereby to them.

I have come to be of opinion that the contention of the heir cannot receive effect. The trustees were directed under the husband's trust to allow the widow to draw out of the capital sums to the extent of one half thereof, to find for her sums of money up to half that value. She did not indeed exercise the right, being satisfied with what the income of her husband's estate, given her under the fifth purpose of his settlement, afforded her, but she had such a right, to which the trustees had no answer. All they could ask was reasonable time to convert estate into money, and pay it to her. I think that shews that her right was moveable, and if it was moveable it fell within her testamentary conveyance of her whole moveable estate.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur.

LORD LEK.—The leading purposes of the testator's settlement are, first, to give his wife a liferent of the whole trust-estate, and second, to pay to her in case she survive him, "for her own use and disposal," any sum or sums not exceeding a half of the residue, it being provided that her liferent shall be restricted to the remainder, but that if she does not personally receive the half, the balance unpaid shall be paid to her heirs, executors, and successors. It was also provided thirdly, that if she predeceased the testator, "the said half of residue shall be paid to her heirs, executors, and assignees," and in the fourth place, that the trustees were to divide the other half of the residue at the first term after the death of the longest liver into six parts, which were to be given among the testator's own relatives.

If the wife had predeceased the testator, or if her share of residue did not vest

No. 121. in her, I think that conversion would not take place under the deed in the circumstances stated.

Mar. 20, 1889.
Kippen's
Trustees.

But my opinion is that a vested right to the extent of one half of the residue was conferred on the wife herself by the terms of the deed.

I think she had a power of disposal to that extent, either by assignation or testament, and that this is made clear by the terms of the first portion of the seventh purpose, which directs that in so far as she shall not have personally received the amount, it shall be paid—as unpaid balance belonging to her—to her heirs, executors, and assignees.

It appears to me that the case of Clark's Executors v. Paterson, 14 D. 141, which has always been regarded as authoritative, proceeds on a principle entirely applicable to the present case. That principle is stated by Lord Fullerton as follows (p. 145):—"There may be cases in which a destination to heirs and assignees and a power of testing are not conclusive in favour of vesting, but these must be cases in which the words of the deed cannot be reconciled to vesting. . . . But postponed payment is as consistent with vesting as with not vesting. I apprehend that when a legacy is so granted that the legatee has the power of testing upon it, or assigning it, to all intents and purposes that legacy vests unless there is the strongest evidence of intention that it shall not vest."

Accordingly that case has been treated by the writers on the law of testamentary succession as a leading authority for the proposition that a destination to heirs and assignees of the legatee implies that the legacy is to vest immediately. It in no way conflicts with the decision in Bell v. Cheape, May 21, 1845, 7 D. 614. For in Bell v. Cheape it was clear, and was conceded (as appears from the opinion of Lord Mackenzie), that there could be no vesting, the legatee having predeceased the period of vesting.

Such being my opinion on the effect of the deed, I think that the legacy stood vested in the person of Mrs Kippen as moveable estate belonging to her at the time of her death, being merely a claim to the sum which she might have demanded during her life. The amount and position of the estate, as explained to us, were such as permitted of the sum being paid without selling the heritable subjects, and I think that her right to it is carried by her testament as a part of her moveable estate.

I think it contrary to the meaning of the trust-settlement to recognise a right in her heir-at-law to dispute her power of testing upon the amount bequeathed to her under the description of "a sum or sums of money not exceeding one-half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate."

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . are of opinion that the sum of £477 mentioned in the question therein stated is moveable, and falls to the party of the second part, and find and declare accordingly, and decern."

WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—JOHN BAIRD, L.A.—Agents.

SUMMER SESSION.

ADAM DICKSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—*M<sup>r</sup> Lennan.*WILLIAM BRYAN, Defender (Respondent).—Crole.

No. 122.

May 14, 1889.

Dickson v.

Bryan.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Value of cause—Competency—Sheriff Court Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 80), sec. 22—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 30.—A Sheriff Court action concluded for warrant to commit the defender to prison “until he restore” certain pointed goods, “or until he pay to the pursuer the sum of £9, 8s. 8d. sterling, being double the appraised value of said articles, all as provided for in the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 30.” Held that as the prayer of the petition shewed that the value of the cause did not exceed £25, an appeal to the Court of Session against an interlocutor of the Sheriff dismissing the action was incompetent.

In January 1889 Adam Dickson, horse-dealer, Edinburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court there against William Bryan, 4 Lauriston Street, Edinburgh, in which he prayed the Court “to grant warrant to officers of Court to commit to prison the person of the said defender, therein to remain until he restore the following effects pointed on 27th August 1888 at 4 Lauriston Street, Edinburgh, in virtue of a Small-Debt decree dated the 8th day of August in said year, at the pursuer’s instance, viz.: . . . or until he pay to the pursuer the sum of £9, 8s. 8d. sterling, being double the appraised value of said articles, all as provided for in the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 30.”*

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians.
M.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford), on 19th February 1889, dismissed the action.

On appeal the Sheriff (Crichton) adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

The defender objected to the competency of the appeal. He maintained that the value of the action was less than £25, and that it was therefore not competent to bring any interlocutor therein under the review of the Court.† The value here was fixed by the pursuer at £9, 8s. 8d. The value of the cause therefore appeared on the face of the prayer of the petition, which was the proper test.<sup>1</sup> The pursuer could not go on with the action if the defender paid that sum.

The pursuer maintained that the prayer of the petition was really one ad factum præstandum, viz., for warrant of imprisonment. The appeal was against a refusal of that warrant, and was analogous to an appeal against a refusal of interdict where the value of the cause was less than £25.<sup>2</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case commenced with a petition presented in the * Section 30 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, enacts “that if any person shall unlawfully intromit with or carry off the pointed effects, he shall be liable, on summary complaint to the Sheriff of the county where the effects were pointed, or where he is domiciled, to be imprisoned until he restore the effects or pay double the appraised value.”

† Section 22 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1853, enacts,—“It shall not be competent . . . to remove from a Sheriff Court, or to bring under review of the Court of Session . . . any cause not exceeding the value of twenty-five pounds sterling, or any interlocutor, judgment, or decree pronounced or which shall be pronounced in such cause by the Sheriff.”

<sup>1</sup> Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Jessiman, May 14, 1881, 8 R. 695.

<sup>2</sup> Purves v. Brock, July 9, 1867, 5 Macph. 1003, 39 Scot. Jur. 558; Shotts Iron Co. v. Kerr, Dec. 6, 1871, 10 Macph. 195, 44 Scot. Jur. 117; Aberdeen v. Wilson, July 16, 1872, 10 Macph. 971, 44 Scot. Jur. 540; Henry v. Morrison, March 19, 1881, 8 R. 692.

No. 122. Sheriff Court under the Personal Diligence Act. The prayer of the petition is for a warrant to commit the defender to prison until certain poided goods should be restored, or otherwise until he should "pay to the pursuer the sum of £9, 8s. 8d. sterling, being double the appraised value of said articles." It is quite plain on the face of that petition that if the defender pays that sum of £9, 8s. 8d. he will be free of the warrant for imprisonment, and will completely implement the prayer of the petition. The prayer is not like the alternative prayer of a summons where the pursuer asks specific implement or damages in the event of failure, for in such a summons the option lies with the pursuer; here, on the other hand, the option is entirely in the hands of the defender; he can, if he chooses, pay the sum and put an end to the process.

May 14, 1889.
Dickson v.
Bryan.

Now, the objection to the competency of this appeal is that the value of the cause is distinctly ascertainable from the terms of the prayer of the petition, and that that value is less than £25. I do not very well see how that can be disputed, because double the appraised value of these articles is just £9, 8s. 8d. That being so, it is I think very difficult to dispute that the cause is one which falls within the rule of the 22d section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, which provides that it shall be incompetent to bring under review of this Court any decree in a cause the value of which is less than £25. No doubt the Sheriff has dismissed the whole action as incompetent, but he has pronounced a decree in a cause the value of which is under £25.

Some cases were cited to us. I do not think it necessary to go over them all, but the point is well brought out in the two cases cited to us from 8 R., viz., Henry v. Morrison and Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Jessiman. In the former of those cases the demand was for delivery of certain I O U's, and it was ascertained by inspection of the documents that the whole sum involved was just over £16. Now, that was not, I think, the proper way in which to arrive at the value of the cause; the only proper way of doing so is to look at the conclusions of the summons or the prayer of the petition, and the summons in that case did not disclose the value of the cause. If the total value of the I O U's had been stated in the summons as under £25, then the case would have been incompetent, but just because there was no such statement the Court refused to sustain the objection to the competency. The ground of judgment was well stated by the Judges, who pointed out that the I O U's might have been required by the pursuer, not for the sake of their pecuniary value only, but for some totally collateral purpose, e.g. to vindicate the character of the pursuer or to prove that they were forgeries.

In the case of the Singer Company, there were alternative conclusions either for an order for delivery of a machine, or failing that for payment of £6, 10s. as the value of the machine. There were means for ascertaining the value of the cause from the conclusions themselves, and as it appeared that the value was under £25 the Court sustained an objection to the competency. It appears to me that this is just such a case as Singer's was, the conclusions being either for imprisonment or for payment of a sum as the value of the poided articles, and that sum appearing on the face of the summons or petition to be under £25, I think we should dismiss the appeal as incompetent.

LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

ROBERT BROATCH, L.A.—E. NISH, Solicitor—Agents.

JOHN DUFF, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—J. C. Thomson—G. W. Burnet.
NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defendants (Respondents).—
Jameson—W. Campbell.

No. 123.

May 14, 1889.
Duff v.
National Telephone Co.,
Limited.

Reparation—Precautions for safety of public—Wheelbarrow left in lane—Child.—The owner of a two-wheeled barrow left it in a lane in a town. Two children began to play on the barrow, and while doing so brought it down on and fatally injured a child of three years who was playing with them. In an action of damages at the instance of the father of the child against the owner of the barrow the pursuer averred that the barrow had been left unguarded in the open lane, and that no precaution had been taken against such an accident as had occurred. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant.

IN November 1888 John Duff, Edinburgh, raised an action against the National Telephone Company, Limited, concluding for damages to the extent of £250 in respect of the death of his child, William Henry Duff.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
C.

The pursuer averred;—"On Sunday, the 26th August 1888, about twelve o'clock noon, a child of the pursuer, named William Henry Duff, three years of age, was playing with some other children in a lane leading from Gayfield Street to Broughton Court. Some of the said children were playing with a two-wheeled hurley belonging to the defenders, which had been left in the lane by the defenders' workmen. The hurley was entirely unprotected, and two of the children had got on to it and were swinging on it, when they slid to the back of it and brought it suddenly and violently down on the head of the said William Henry Duff. It struck the said William Henry Duff, causing a deep wound on the front part of the head. The pursuer's wife, hearing a cry, went out of the house, and found the child bleeding profusely from said wound. The child was at once taken to a druggist's shop, where the wound was dressed."

He further averred that the child died from the effects of the injury.

He further averred;—(Cond. 3) "The defenders have a small enclosure or other place in said lane into which the hurley could have been put, and had this been done the accident would not have occurred. The said hurley was left in the open lane, where it ought not to have been left, and where the defenders had no right to leave it. Neither of its wheels was locked, and no precaution whatever was taken against such an accident as has occurred. The pursuer had no reason to apprehend that his child would suffer any injury from such a cause through being allowed to play in the said lane. The pursuer has suffered greatly in his feelings through the death of the said child. In these circumstances the defenders are liable to the pursuer in damages and solatium."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer's said child having been deprived of life through the fault of the defenders, they are liable to make payment to the pursuer, in name of damages and as solatium, of the sum sued for, with interest and expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 27th February 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

The pursuer reclaimed.<sup>1</sup>

The cause was debated before the Lord Probationer (afterwards Lord Kyllachy).

<sup>1</sup> Authorities cited.—Macgregor v. Ross & Marshall, March 2, 1883, 10 R. 725; Campbell v. Ord & Maddison, Nov. 5, 1873, 1 R. 149; Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 312.

No. 123. LORD PROBATIONER.—In this case I take the same view as the Lord Ordinary, viz., that there is no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders, and that there is no good reason for sending the case to a jury. It can hardly be said that a hurley is a dangerous thing in itself, or that there was anything out of the way in leaving one unprotected in the lane in question. No doubt it supplied a means by which this child hurt itself, but I do not think that the defenders were bound to anticipate that a child three years old would be allowed to go about without being looked after to some extent, and therefore I think that the true cause of the accident was not fault on the part of the defenders but failure of duty on the part of the child's parents. I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed, and the defenders assoilzied.

May 14, 1889.
Duff v.
National Telephone Co.,
Limited.

Thereafter,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree in the view of this case which the Lord Probationer has taken. The pursuer avers that his child, William Henry Duff, along with some other children, were playing in a lane "with a two-wheeled hurley belonging to the defenders. The hurley was entirely unprotected, and two of the children had got on to it, and were swinging on it, when they slid to the back of it, and brought it suddenly and violently down on the head of the said William Henry Duff." It is then averred that the child was thereby fatally injured, and subsequently died, and that the accident occurred through the fault of the defenders, inasmuch as they had "left the hurley in the open lane, where it ought not to have been left, and where the defenders had no right to leave it." I do not intend to say that people are justified in leaving wheelbarrows in the public streets, but that was not the case here. The barrow was left in a narrow lane.

I am clearly of opinion that the averments of the pursuer here are quite irrelevant, and if I were to conjecture as to the real cause of the accident I should say that the fault was that of the parents in leaving a child of three to run about without anyone to take any charge of it. There is really nothing else in the case, and I think, therefore, that we ought to adhere.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with an observation made by Mr Campbell that if we were to sustain the relevancy of this action there would be no possibility of saying where responsibility in such matters would end. In all the cases which have previously occurred the complaint has been that an article dangerous in itself has been left unguarded in an exposed position. It is not perhaps easy to define what the word "dangerous" precisely means when used in cases of this kind, but I think that the cases we were referred to explain themselves, and define the term. In the cases of Macgregor and Campbell the articles so left were machines which would be dangerous if set in motion, which they might easily be. In Findlay's case the article was a heavy shutter, which was quite harmless if untouched, but which was so placed that a very slight movement of a pin would bring it down. Again, a horse left in the street without anyone to take care of it might be most dangerous, but I think it is extravagant to say that an ordinary wheelbarrow is a dangerous article in any sense, and I do not think that in leaving it in the lane the defenders did anything which can afford ground for an action of damages. The wheelbarrow might be an obstruction in the street or lane, but I think the statements made here on record are quite irrelevant to found a claim for damages on the ground of fault.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 123.

May 14, 1889.
Duff v.
National Telephone Co.,
Limited.

MRS JANE WRIGHT AND OTHERS (Wright's Trustees), First Parties.—
Wallace—Sym.

No. 124.

Rev. MAXWELL JAMES WRIGHT, Second Party.—Sir Charles Pearson—Guy.

ALICE WRIGHT AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson—Guy.

JAMES WRIGHT AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Wallace—Sym.

May 14, 1889.
Wright's
Trustees v.
Wright.

Succession—Legacy—Implied Revocation.—A testator by his settlement bequeathed to certain nephews, including A and B, legacies of £1000 each. Thereafter he executed a codicil to this effect,—“I recall the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B . . . and I give said sum to my nephew A . . . to be paid to him at the same time with the like legacy of £1000 already given to him.” Two days later he executed this other codicil:—“I . . . renew the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B, to be paid to him as at the time of the original legacy . . .” Held that the additional legacy of £1000 to A had not been revoked.

JOHN WRIGHT, Writer to the Signet, residing in Edinburgh, died on 2d November 1888. He left a trust-disposition and settlement prepared by himself, and to which were appended nine codicils, also written at various dates by himself. 2D DIVISION.
M.

By the settlement Mr Wright bequeathed a legacy of £1000 to each of his nephews and nieces by name. Among the nephews were the Rev. Maxwell James Wright and Mr Charles Ferney Tod.

The residue of the estate was left to the testator's brother in liferent, and his children in fee.

On 19th May 1888, Mr Wright executed a codicil in the following terms,—“I, John Wright, Writer to the Signet, recall the legacy of £1000 to my nephew Charles Ferney Tod, and I give said sum to my nephew the Rev. Maxwell J. Wright, now minister of Dornock, in the presbytery of Annan, to be paid to him at the same time with the like legacy of one thousand pounds already given to him.”

Two days later, 21st May 1888, he executed this codicil,—“I, John Wright, Writer to the Signet, renew the legacy of one thousand pounds to my nephew Charles Ferney Tod, to be paid to him as at the time of the original legacy.”

The personal estate of Mr Wright at his death amounted to £57,000. A question having arisen as to whether Rev. Maxwell James Wright was entitled to two legacies of £1000, a special case was presented to the Court by Mr Wright's trustees, first parties, by the Rev. Maxwell J. Wright, second party, and by the residuary legatees, fourth parties, for determination of the question,—“Is the second party entitled to the legacy of £1000 bequeathed to him by the codicil of 19th May 1888 in addition to the legacy of £1000 left to him by the settlement?”

The third parties were not interested in this question.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—By his trust-disposition and settlement dated 25th August 1883, the late Mr John Wright left certain legacies, and among them a legacy of £1000 to his nephew Maxwell James Wright, and another of the same amount to his nephew Charles Ferney Tod. On 19th May 1888, for some reason which we do not know, he wrote a codicil which runs as follows,

No. 124. May 14, 1889. Wright's Trustees v. Wright. "I recall the legacy of £1000 to my nephew Charles Ferney Tod, and I give said sum to my nephew the Rev. Maxwell J. Wright . . ." Two days afterwards, on 21st May, having repented of the recall of the legacy to Charles Ferney Tod, the testator executed another codicil, in which he says, "I renew the legacy of £1000 to my nephew Charles Ferney Tod . . ."

The question for decision is whether the renewal of the legacy to Tod implies, and necessarily implies, that the gift of the second thousand pounds to Maxwell Wright was recalled, for unless that is necessarily implied I think the gift to Mr Wright must stand. Now, it is not easy to decide this question, but there are, I think, two grounds for holding that that implication is not necessary, and if it be not necessary it cannot be made. In the first place, as Lord Lee suggested during the debate, if the object of the codicil of 21st May 1888 was to restore matters to the condition in which they had been two days previously, there was no necessity for giving it the form of a new codicil at all. All the testator had to do was to revoke the codicil of 19th May. In the second place, it by no means follows from the testator's repenting of the act by which he deprived Charles of £1000 that he repented also of giving to Maxwell £2000. He had for reasons satisfactory to himself given £2000 to Maxwell (instead of £1000) on 19th May, and there is nothing to indicate that in the following two days he had repented of that. The giving to Charles again his legacy of £1000 was quite consistent with the legacy to Maxwell of the £2000 remaining valid.

Therefore I think that the codicil of 19th May must receive effect in so far as it gives to Mr Maxwell Wright £2000.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

D. TURNBULL, W.S.—TRAQUAIR, DICKSON, & M'LAREN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 125. May 21, 1889. M'Murphy v. MacLulich. DONALD M'MURPHY, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Party. J. C. MACLULLICH, Defender (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—Forsyth.
Expenses—Amendment—Condition of payment of expenses in previous actions.
—In an action of damages for slander, the defender was assoltized from the conclusions of the summons on the ground that the record contained no relevant statement of malice, and the pursuer was found liable in expenses.
In a second action founded on the same alleged slander, but containing averments of malice, held that the pursuer could not be allowed to proceed until he had paid the expenses in the former action.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.
M.

(VIDE M'Murphy v. Campbell and MacLulich, May 21, 1887, 14 R. 725.)
On 12th January 1887, Donald M'Murphy, formerly a sergeant of police at Oban, raised an action of damages for alleged slander against Peter Campbell, formerly inspector of police there, and J. C. MacLulich, procurator-fiscal of Argyllshire at Inveraray.

On 25th March 1887, the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's allegations are not relevant and sufficient to support the action; therefore assoltizes the defenders from the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in the expenses of the process."

The pursuer having reclaimed, the Second Division adhered, with additional expenses. The ground of judgment was that an averment of malice was essential to the relevancy of the action, and that none had been made.

On 5th July 1888, M'Murphy raised a new action of damages in respect of the same alleged slander against Maclullich. The averments as to the alleged slander were substantially the same as those in the former action. The pursuer made certain additional averments setting forth the grounds on which malice might be inferred, and stated that these averments were not made in the former action owing to the fault of his agent, to whom he communicated them, but who neglected to set them out on record. The defender objected to the pursuer being allowed to proceed with the action until he paid the defender the expenses decerned for in the previous action.

No. 125.

May 21, 1889.
M'Murphy v.
Maclullich.

On 23d November 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor :—" In respect the pursuer has not paid the taxed expenses found due to the defenders in the action against them, the summons of which was signeted on 12th January 1887, refuses in hoc statu the pursuer's motion for issues, and continues the cause till the first sederunt-day in January next."

On 9th January 1889 his Lordship pronounced this interlocutor :—" In respect that the pursuer has not yet paid the taxed expenses found due to the defender, and referred to in the preceding interlocutor, dismisses the action, and decerns : Finds the defender entitled to expenses."

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer ;—In the former action his agent had failed to carry out his instructions, and had thus made up the record without stating specific allegations of malice. It was on that ground that the action had been dismissed. It would be oppressive to make him suffer for the omission on the part of his agent.

Argued for the defender ;—The pursuer, had he so chosen, might have moved the Court under the 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, for leave to amend his record in the previous action by the addition of those averments of malice the absence of which had been held fatal to him. Leave would undoubtedly have only been granted to him to do so on condition of his paying the expenses up to the date of the amendment. This was just an attempt to evade this penalty, and he ought to be made to pay the expenses found due by him in the previous action before being allowed to proceed with the new action.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case formerly brought an action against the same person who is defender here, and that action was dismissed owing apparently to the failure of the pursuer's agent to put in certain statements of malice, and the pursuer was found liable in expenses. The present action is of exactly the same kind, and is raised on the same grounds as the former action, and only differs from it in this, that it contains the averments as to malice which were wanting in the former action. The question which presents itself under these circumstances is whether, having brought a new action such as I have described, with a new averment, which he might have added to his previous record by amendment, he is to be allowed to pursue the new action, except on the condition of paying his opponent's expenses in the previous action. No case has been cited to us which is exactly on all-fours with the present, but I cannot distinguish this case from those in which when a pursuer has proposed to amend his record in order to make it relevant in a substantial part, he has almost invariably been found liable, as the condition precedent, to pay the previous expenses or part of them. In bringing this new action, the <sup>1</sup> Struthers v. Dykes, June 16, 1846, 8 D. 875, 18 Scot. Jur. 446 ; Irvine v. Kinloch, Nov. 7, 1885, 13 R. 172 ; Wallace v. Henderson, Dec. 22, 1876, 4 R. 264.

No. 125. pursuer is endeavouring to do what he might have done in the former case. If he had asked the Court in the Inner-House to allow him to make the amendment, he would only have been allowed to do so on condition of paying the expenses. The claim of the defender here to have his expenses paid in the former case is even stronger than if the request had been made on such an application, because it is very plain that he has been necessarily subjected to a much larger outlay than he would have been in the other case. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to adhere.

May 21, 1889.
M'Murphy v.
MacLulich.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot say that I regret the result, because I think it will be most beneficial to both parties. I ventured to point out in the course of the argument that, in my opinion, a party is not hindered from pursuing an action against another merely because he is in the latter's debt. A man may be debtor of the person against whom he has a claim of damages, for injury it may be, and he will not be precluded from suing an action to enforce the claim because of that debt. I do not think that it would in the least signify that the nature of the debt was a sum of expenses awarded against him in another and a different action.

The real question therefore on the merits of the point here argued is, whether those expenses in the former action ought not really to be regarded as expenses in the present action, as they were in Irvine v. Kinloch (13 R. 172). I think the solution of the question is in the conclusion suggested by your Lordship, that the record in the former action might have been converted into this action by amendment. The pursuer is seeking remedy for exactly the same grievance in this action as he did in the former one. In the former action, he did not represent the grievance relevantly to entitle him to the relief which he asked, because his record contained no averments of malice. But then, at any time before judgment was pronounced, he might have added these averments by way of amendment; and if the pursuer had stated facts which would have authorised him to make them, he might have moved the Court to allow him to so amend, and the Court would have been bound under the 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, to have granted his motion. It would probably have been the only mode by which the true matter in dispute might have been tried in the then existing action. Then, it is quite familiar that an amendment which tends to make all the difference between relevancy and irrelevancy in a record is only allowed on the condition of expenses being paid. That is the general rule. I shall venture to put the matter thus: I assume that Lord Lee was right in assoilzieing the defender, because there was no relevant ground of action stated against him on record, and that before judgment was pronounced in the Inner-House affirming Lord Lee's interlocutor, he proposed to amend his record by adopting the statements made in the present action. I am personally of opinion that we should have listened to that proposal, but only on the condition of his reimbursing the defender in all the preceding existing expenses which, in that view, had been thrown away. Supposing we had done so, and the pursuer then said, "I can't pay, but I will reach the result I want in another way which will not subject me to the condition imposed upon me by the Court. I will allow decree of absolvitor to go out, and I will bring an entirely new action with all my amendments in it." I think the Court would have frustrated such an attempt. It may be very true that the irrelevancy for which the first action was dismissed did not arise from his fault. He may have given his agent instructions which were not properly carried out, but his adversary must none the less be reimbursed in the expenses which have been thrown away in defending the action according to that view. I am therefore of opinion that the condition of being permitted to proceed with this amended action is, that the pursuer should pay the expenses of the former action, which he might have amended at the time and in the manner I have suggested.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I think that it is a nice question whether in an action for clearing character such as this is the Court would in its discretion have made payment of expenses a condition of the pursuer's amending his record. I concur, however, with Lord Young that, as the case now stands, the pursuer must pay the expenses of the former action before he proceeds further with this, and that even though the expenses in the former action were thrown away not through his own but through his agent's fault.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 9th January 1889, and adhered to the interlocutor of 23d November 1888.

The pursuer having thereafter paid the expenses in the previous action, the Court allowed him a proof before answer.

PARTY—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS YOUNG AND OTHERS (Lord Dalhousie's Trustees), First Parties.—C. K. Mackenzie. No. 126.

THOMAS YOUNG AND OTHERS (Lady Christian Maule's Trustees) AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—C. J. Guthrie.

THOMAS YOUNG AND OTHERS (Lady Christian Maule's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Balfour—G. R. Gillespie.

ARTHUR RAMSAY MACDONALD AND DUDLEY WARD MACDONALD, Fourth Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson—A. Stuart.

CHARLES ELLIOT AND ANOTHER, Fifth Parties.—Sir Charles Pearson—Begg.

Succession—Conditional institution—Vesting subject to defeasance.—A testator directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estate to his sister during her life, and at her death to pay £6000 to each of his nephews whom he named. The deed then provided that "if any of my said nephews . . . die before my sister" leaving issue, the issue should take the parent's share, "and if any of my said nephews, . . . other than my said nephew E. B. R., die without issue, the share of such decessor or decessors shall fall to their surviving brothers and sisters, equally among them, . . . the issue of any deceased brother or sister taking the share which would have fallen to their parent, . . . and with regard to the £6000" directed to be apportioned to E. B. R., "I desire that, in the event of his predeceasing me without issue, the same shall go" as directed in the deed. H. M., one of the nephews, predeceased the testator without issue, but survived by brothers and a sister. E. B. R. survived the testator, but died leaving no issue. The liferentrix survived both these nephews.

In a special case presented to the Court after the death of the liferentrix, held (1) that the surviving brothers and the issue of a predeceasing brother of H. M. were entitled as conditional institutes to equal shares of the £6000 bequeathed to him, (2) that the £6000 bequeathed to E. B. R. vested in him at the testator's death, subject to defeasance in the event of his predeceasing the liferentrix leaving issue, and that, as he left no issue, it fell to the executor under his will.

Observations (per Lord Shand) on Murray v. Gregory's Trustees, Jan. 21, 1887, 14 R. 368, reversed on appeal to the House of Lords, and Wannop and Others (Haldane's Trustees) v. Murphy, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269.

No. 125.
May 21, 1889.
M'Murphy v. Macdulloch.

May 24, 1889.
Earl of Dal-
housie's Trustees v. Young.

No. 126.

May 24, 1889.
Earl of Dal-
housie's Trustees v. Young.

1ST DIVISION.
C.

ON 6th July 1874 the Right Honourable Fox Earl of Dalhousie died, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 9th December 1872, whereby he conveyed his whole estate to Major Thomas Young of Lincluden and others in trust for purposes therein mentioned.

The trust-disposition contained, inter alia, the following clause:—
“Lastly, I direct that so soon as possible after my death the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, shall all be realised (with the exception of such investments as my trustees may deem it expedient to continue), and the whole free annual interest and proceeds of the whole of said residue and remainder shall be paid over as the same arises to my sister, the said Lady Christian Maule, during her life; and upon her decease the whole of such residue and remainder shall be realised and divided and apportioned by my said trustees as follows: that is to say, the same, to the extent after mentioned, shall be divided and apportioned among my nephews and nieces after named, children of my deceased brother and sisters (with the exception of my niece Miss Maule of Fearn, the eldest daughter of my late brother, the Honourable William Maule Maule, who is otherwise provided for), viz., Major Thomas Young, Captain George Young, Edward Bannerman Ramsay, George Dalhousie Ramsay, Captain Marmaduke Ramsay, Captain Henry Macdonald, John Crawford Macdonald, Arthur Ramsay Macdonald, and Dudley Ward Macdonald, my nine nephews, and Mary Maule, Clara Maule, Alice Maule, Patricia Ramsay or Agnew, Christina Ramsay or Elliot, Georgina Harvey Ramsay or Hay, and Mary Macdonald, my seven nieces, to the effect of paying as at the date of the decease of my said sister, Lady Christian Maule, the sum of £6000 to each of my said nine nephews and the sum of £4000 to each of said seven nieces: Provided always and declaring that if any of my said nephews or nieces die before my sister, the said Lady Christian, leaving a child or children, such child or children shall be entitled to their parent's share, and if any of my said nephews or nieces, other than my said nephew Edward Bannerman Ramsay or my said niece Patricia Ramsay, die without issue, the share of such deceiver or deceasers shall fall to their surviving brothers and sisters equally among them, if more than one, the issue of any deceased brother or sister taking the share which would have fallen to their parent if in life, or if there be no surviving brother or sister and no issue of a deceased brother or sister of such deceasing nephew or niece, then the share of such deceasing and childless nephew or niece shall on such decease go to such of my said nephews and nieces above named as may be then living, equally among them if more than one: And with regard to the £6000 hereinbefore directed to be apportioned to my said nephew Edward Bannerman Ramsay, I desire that in the event of his predeceasing me, without issue, the same shall go one half to the said Christina Ramsay or Elliot, whom failing, to her issue equally among them, and the other half to the said Georgina Harvey Ramsay or Hay, whom failing, her issue, equally among them.”

Lady Christian Maule was appointed residuary legatee.

The truster was survived by the nephews mentioned in the deed, with the exception of Captain Henry Macdonald, who died in 1873, without issue, survived by three brothers, John, Arthur, and Dudley, by a sister, Miss Mary Macdonald, who died unmarried on 31st December 1887, and by H. L. S. Macdonald, the only child of William Macdonald, a brother who predeceased.

Major-General Edward Bannerman Ramsay, one of the nephews mentioned in the deed, died on 25th December 1883, without issue, leaving a will, by which he appointed Colonel Charles Elliot his sole executor.

Lady Christian Maule, the sister of the truster, died on 21st March 1888. By her will she appointed her nephew, Major Thomas Young, and others her trustees, and provided that in the event of the legacy of £6000 bequeathed by Lord Dalhousie to Edward Bannerman Ramsay being held to have lapsed and to belong to her as her brother's residuary legatee, a legacy of £6000 should be divided between Edward Bannerman Ramsay's brothers and sisters.

No. 126.
May 24, 1889.
Earl of Dal-
housie's Trustees v. Young.

Questions having arisen with regard to the sums of £6000 bequeathed by Lord Dalhousie (1) to Captain Henry Macdonald, and (2) to Major-General Edward Bannerman Ramsay respectively, this special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court. The trustees of Lord Dalhousie were the first parties thereto.

With regard to the £6000 bequeathed to Captain Henry Macdonald, Major Thomas Young and others, Lady Christian Maule's trustees, and Major Young as her residuary legatee, who were the second parties to the case, maintained that the bequest had lapsed in consequence of Henry Macdonald having predeceased Lord Dalhousie, and that, therefore, the legacy fell to be paid to Lady Christian Maule as residuary legatee of her brother. Arthur Ramsay and Dudley Ward Macdonald, brothers of the deceased, and fourth parties to the case, maintained that they were entitled thereto, as conditional institutes, along with their brother, John C. Macdonald, and H. L. S. Macdonald, the only child of a deceased brother, in virtue of the survivorship clause in Lord Dalhousie's settlement.<sup>1</sup>

With regard to the legacy of £6000 to Major-General Edward Bannerman Ramsay, Lady Christian Maule's trustees and others, the conditional legatees under her will, the third parties to the case, maintained that in consequence of the legatee having predeceased Lady Christian Maule he never took any vested interest in the bequest; that it accordingly lapsed and fell to Lady Christian Maule as residuary legatee to her brother, and was now payable to her trustees and executors.<sup>2</sup> Colonel Charles Elliot, Edward Bannerman Ramsay's executor, and Miss Lily Elliot, his residuary legatee, who were fifth parties to the case, maintained that the legacy vested in Edward Bannerman Ramsay on the death of the testator, or, at all events, vested in him at that date subject to defeasance only in the event of his predeceasing Lady Christian Maule and leaving issue, and that it thus fell to be paid to Colonel Elliot, as executor under his will.<sup>3</sup>

The following questions were submitted to the Court:—“(1) Whether the bequest of £6000 by the Earl of Dalhousie to Captain Henry Macdonald falls to the fourth parties, and the said John Crawford Macdonald and H. L. S. Macdonald, equally among them, in virtue of the survivorship clause contained in the trust-disposition and settlement; or whether the said bequest lapsed in consequence of Captain <sup>1</sup> Authorities.—Ersk. Inst. iii. 9, 9; Findlay v. Mackenzie, July 9, 1875, 2 R. 909; Denholm, 1726, M. 6346; Dunlop v. Crawford, June 2, 1812, Fac. Coll.; Inglis v. Miller, 1760, M. 8084; Moray v. Stuart, 1782, M. 8103.

<sup>2</sup> Authorities.—Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314; Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, 3 Macph. 1143, 38 Scot. Jur. 95; Snell's Trustees v. Morrison, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 709; Waters' Trustees v. Waters, Dec. 6, 1884, 12 R. 253; Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269.

<sup>3</sup> Authorities.—Maxwell v. Wylie, May 25, 1835, 15 S. 1005, 9 Scot. Jur. 460; Taylor v. Gilbert's Trustees, July 12, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 217; Wilson's Trustees v. Quick, Feb. 28, 1878, 5 R. 697; Fraser v. Fraser's Trustee, Nov. 27, 1883, 11 R. 196; Ross' Trustees, Dec. 18, 1884, 12 R. 378; Finlay's Trustees v. Finlay, July 6, 1886, 13 R. 1052; Byar's Trustees v. Hay, July 19, 1887, 14 R. 1034.

No. 126. Macdonald predeceasing the testator? (2) Whether the bequest of £6000 by the Earl of Dalhousie to Major-General Edward Bannerman Ramsay vested in him a morte testatoris; or whether the said bequest lapsed in consequence of his predeceasing the liferentrix?"

May 24, 1889.
Earl of Dal-
housie's Trustees v. Young.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question stated for the opinion and judgment of the Court depends upon that part of Lord Dalhousie's settlement which deals with residue. There are some things in the case about which there can be no doubt, and amongst others there is this, that Lady Christian Maule was liferentrix of the entire residue of the estate, and that on her decease the estate was to be realised and divided and apportioned in the way directed by the will.

The testator had at the date of the settlement nine nephews and seven nieces. The residue to a certain extent was to be divided amongst them, each nephew was to have £6000 and each niece £4000.

The two nephews about whose shares the present dispute has arisen are Captain Henry Macdonald and General Edward Bannerman Ramsay, but their shares stand in different positions.

Captain Henry Macdonald predeceased the testator, and, of course, as Lady Christian survived her brother, the liferentrix also. In these circumstances the question has arisen whether Captain Macdonald's legacy lapsed, or whether the fourth parties are entitled as conditional institutes to his share of the residue. Now, the words of the settlement stand thus. After saying that each nephew shall take £6000, there follow certain provisions. The first part of the provision is as follows:—"Provided always and declaring that if any of my said nephews or nieces die before my sister, the said Lady Christian, leaving a child or children, such child or children shall be entitled to their parent's share." That provision simply comes to this that if a nephew or niece predecease Lady Christian leaving issue, the child or children shall come into the parent's place. But the next part goes on to say,—“And if any of my said nephews or nieces, other than my said nephew Edward Bannerman Ramsay or my said niece Patricia Ramsay, die without issue, the share of such deceiver or deceivers shall fall to their surviving brothers and sisters, equally among them if more than one, the issue of any deceased brother or sister taking the share which would have fallen to their parent if in life, or if there be no surviving brother or sister, and no issue of a deceased brother or sister of such deceasing nephew or niece, then the share of such deceasing and childless nephew or niece shall on such decease go to such of my said nephews and nieces above named as may be then living, equally among them if more than one.” The provision therefore is, that in the case of one of the nephews leaving children, and dying “before my sister,” the children shall take the parent's share, but should a nephew “die without issue,” his brothers and sisters shall take his share. In this latter case the words “before my sister” are left out.

Now, I think it cannot be doubted that those words must be supplied in the second part of the proviso. The whole clause has no meaning if that was not the intention of the testator. I have no doubt whatever that the condition is to be the same in the case of a nephew or niece dying without issue, and dying with issue, viz., that they shall predecease the liferentrix. This is the clause to be construed, and it is said on the one hand that a nephew who died before the testator necessarily fulfilled the conditions, because the liferentrix survived her brother, while, on the other hand, it is contended that we must read in the words "die after me and before my sister," or in other words, that it is necessary that the nephew should have died in the interval between the death of the testator and that of the liferentrix. I think that the latter is an unnatural construction to put on the clause, and therefore I am of opinion that it applies to the case of Henry Macdonald, who predeceased the testator, leaving no issue. I cannot doubt that there was a conditional institution of his surviving brothers and sisters, and that therefore they are entitled to take his share of the residue.

No. 126.

May 24, 1889.
Earl of Dal-
housie's Trustees v. Young.

The second question relates to the share of General Edward Bannerman Ramsay. Now, his share is in a different position. The second part of the provision does not apply to his case, because he is expressly excepted from its operation. In place of that there is the following provision,—“And with regard to the £6000 hereinbefore directed to be apportioned to my said nephew Edward Bannerman Ramsay, I desire that in the event of his predeceasing me without issue, the same shall go one half to the said Christina Ramsay or Elliot, whom failing, to her issue equally among them, and the other half to the said Georgina Harvey Ramsay or Hay, whom failing, her issue, equally among them.” That is not an event which happened, because what did occur was that he survived the testator, but predeceased the liferentrix without leaving issue. It appears to me that the condition of the residuary clause as affecting him is this. If he had survived the testator and died before the liferentrix leaving issue, his children would have taken his share. If, again, he had predeceased the testator and the liferentrix without leaving issue, then the provision in favour of Mrs Elliot and Mrs Hay would have come in, but in the event of his surviving the testator and predeceasing the liferentrix leaving no children, then there is no ulterior destination of his share. That is what actually happened, and the question is, what has become of his share, has it lapsed and fallen into residue, or did it vest in him a morte testatoris?

Now, the only possible reason why it should be held not so to have vested is that there is a provision that in the event of his leaving children they should take his share. That is the only thing which could prevent vesting; but my opinion is that that provision in favour of children is not sufficient to prevent vesting. The case is just one of vesting, subject to defeasance, which has several times been before us for judgment. If the class to be benefited by the provision in favour of children is quite unascertained and has no existence at all, as is the case here, nothing can interfere with vesting. If children had come into existence, no doubt they would have been entitled to succeed, but that would have been merely a case of defeasance. My opinion is therefore that this share vested in Edward Bannerman Ramsay, subject to defeasance by an event which never in point of fact occurred.

I think, therefore, we should answer the first branch of the first question in the affirmative, and the first branch of the second question also in the affirmative.

LORD SHAND.—I have no difficulty in concurring on both questions. I agree on the first question in holding that with regard to the share of Captain Henry Macdonald, who predeceased the testator without issue, we must hold that the fourth parties are entitled to it as conditional institutes under the will. The provision is that if a nephew “die before my sister” leaving a child, such child shall be entitled to the parent's share, but if any nephew shall “die without issue,” his brothers and sisters shall take his share. I agree that by implication

No. 126. we must read into the second part of the proviso the words "before my sister." May 24, 1889. The two parts of the clause must, I think, refer to the same period of distribution. We are, however, asked to read into that clause the words, "If any nephew shall survive me, but predecease my sister." I can see no ground whatever for doing so, and I see every ground for refusing to do so. I think it is impossible to read the clause except in the view that the testator meant the fund to go to the legatee himself if he survived him (the testator), but that if he predeceased that date it should go to his issue if he had any, and that if he had none it should go to his brothers and sisters. In other words, he preferred to his residuary legatee, first, the legatee, second, the legatee's children, and third, his brothers and sisters. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the first question should be answered as your Lordship has proposed.

As regards the case of Edward Bannerman Ramsay, the clause applicable is that "in the event of his predeceasing me without issue," his share shall go to Mrs Elliot and Mrs Hay. Now, this legatee did not predecease the testator, and that clause is therefore out of the deed. The question then is, as he predeceased the liferentrix without leaving issue, to whom does his legacy of £6000 go? I am clearly of opinion that it does not fall into residue and go to Lady Christian Maule or her representatives, but that it goes according to the directions in his will. The legacy vested in him a morte testatoris, but subject to defeasance in the event of his leaving issue, which he did not do. The case is, I think, indistinguishable from that of Snell's Trustees (4 R. 709), and from the recent and most authoritative judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Murray, &c. v. Gregory's Trustees (14 R. 368), in which the decision of this Court has been reversed. In that case the House of Lords have dealt with the case of Wannop (Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, 9 R. 269), and though their Lordships were not dealing with the case by way of appeal, they practically reversed the decision of this Court. The result of the reversal of the decision in Gregory's Trustees is that the House have upheld the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance. Here the vesting in General Ramsay was subject to defeasance by an event which, as matter of fact, never occurred, and therefore his share of residue falls to his executor.

LORD ADAM.—With regard to the first question I think that there is no doubt that if the literal meaning is to be given to the clause in question Captain Macdonald's brothers and sister must succeed. It is said that what the testator intended was that no nephew should take his legacy of £6000 unless he survived him. I cannot speculate as to what was in the mind of the testator, but can only say that there is nothing in the deed to lead me to suppose that any such thing was his intention. On the contrary, I think he intended that if any nephew predeceased Lady Christian Maule, the liferentrix, without leaving issue, his brothers and sister should take his share.

On the second question I also concur in thinking that his share vested in General Edward Bannerman Ramsay a morte testatoris, but subject to defeasance in the event of his leaving children, which he did not do.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT answered the first alternatives of the first and second questions respectively in the affirmative.

JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—
ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS MARGARET CUTHBERTSON OR WILLIAMS, Pursuer (Appellant).— Younger.

No. 127.

WATT & WILSON, Defenders (Respondents).—A. S. D. Thomson.

May 28, 1889.
Williams v.
Watt & Wilson.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 40—Act of Sederunt, 12th July 1828, sec. 5.—Held that an appeal for jury trial in a Sheriff Court action must, in terms of sec. 5 of A. S., 12th July 1828, be presented within fifteen days after the date of an interlocutor allowing a proof, although the diet for proof is only fixed by an interlocutor of later date.

Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386, and Duff v. Steuart, Oct. 20, 1881, 9 R. 17, followed.

Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1888, 16 R. 104, distinguished.

MRS MARGARET CUTHBERTSON OR WILLIAMS raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Renfrew and Bute against Messrs Watt & Wilson for damages as reparation due to her for the death of her son through the alleged fault of the defenders. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
1.

On 8th February 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) allowed a proof, and fixed a diet of proof.

On 11th February the defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Sir Charles Pearson), who, on 5th April, dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutor appealed against, and further, remitted the cause to the Sheriff-substitute of new to fix a diet of proof.

On 17th April the Sheriff-substitute, on the pursuer's motion, assigned the 9th May as a new diet of proof.

On 24th April the pursuer appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session with a view to jury trial, under section 40 of the Judicature Act, in terms of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, 12th July 1828.*

The defenders objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the pursuer had failed, in terms of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, to appeal within fifteen days of the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 5th April, which was the interlocutor affirming that of the Sheriff-substitute "allowing proof."<sup>1</sup> and contended that in any view, there was no such element of hardship here as existed in the recent case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Co.,<sup>2</sup> and which induced the Court to exercise its discretion in refusing to enforce the penal provisions of the Act of Sederunt.

Argued for the pursuer;—The fifteen days required by the Act of * Sec. 5,—“Whereas it is enacted by section 40 (of the Judicature Act) that in all cases originating in the inferior Courts in which the claim is in amount above £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing a proof shall be pronounced . . . it shall be competent to advocate such cause to the Court of Session, it is enacted and declared . . . that if . . . neither party, within fifteen days in the ordinary case, and in causes before the Courts of Orkney and Shetland within thirty days after the date of such interlocutor allowing a proof, shall intimate in the inferior Court the passing of a bill of advocacy, such proof may immediately thereafter effectually proceed in the inferior Court . . . and if within these periods respectively no intimation shall be made of any such bill of advocacy the proof shall then proceed, and the bill, if such have been presented, together with the passing thereof, shall be held to fall as if such bill had never been presented.”

<sup>1</sup> Duff v. Steuart, Oct. 20, 1881, 8 R. 17; Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, 8 R. 386.

<sup>2</sup> Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1888, 16 R. 104.

No. 127. Sederunt fell to be computed from the 17th April. The appeal was in this view timeously lodged. The Act of Sederunt did not contemplate an interlocutor which merely allowed proof, but rather an interlocutor fixing the diet of proof. The Sheriff's judgment of the 5th April was not operative until followed by the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of 17th April fixing a new diet of proof. At the motion to fix the diet of proof intimation was made to the respondents that this was done with a view to a subsequent appeal for jury trial.

May 28, 1889.
Williams v.
Watt & Wilson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In any case under the Act of Sederunt in which an omission is shewn to be to the prejudice of no one, and can be reasonably accounted for, one cannot but feel sympathy for the party who has made it, if the result of enforcing the Act of Sederunt is to shut him out altogether from proceeding further with his case. The Court looks narrowly to see that effect is not given to a merely technical objection. In the recent case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., in which the question arose through the failure of the appellants to lodge prints timeously in terms of sec. 3, subsec. 2, of the Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, we consulted with the Judges of the other Division, and although some of us entertained considerable doubts, we came ultimately to be of opinion that as the omission had caused no inconvenience, we were not bound to give such a strict construction to the Act of Sederunt as would shut the appellants out from proceeding further in the cause.

This, however, is a case of a very different kind. Here the pursuer, who seeks to have the appeal sustained, is not in the position of losing the cause if it should be held to be incompetent. She, no doubt, desires to have the case tried by a jury in this Court, and if the appeal is held incompetent, the case will have to be tried where she originally brought it. She cannot, however, say that she suffers any real prejudice, for her cause will be heard before the Sheriff-substitute, and then, if she chooses, by the Sheriff, and then, on appeal, by this Court. She is therefore in no sense shut out from having her case fairly disposed of. In this state of matters, then, it is not possible to view the case as one of hardship.

What is the state of the facts? The Sheriff-substitute, on 8th February 1889, allowed a proof. His interlocutor was appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 5th April, dismissed the appeal. From that date onwards the pursuer had fifteen days in which to lodge an appeal with a view to having her case tried by jury in this Court. This she did not do. But during the running of the fifteen days she went to the Sheriff-substitute and asked him to fix a diet of proof. I should hold, even if there were no authority upon the matter, that the real date was fifteen days from the interlocutor described in the very words of the Act of Sederunt itself as the one "allowing proof," because when such an interlocutor is pronounced the parties know what is before them, that unless they appeal their case will go to proof in the Sheriff Court.

The matter is however foreclosed by the authority of the two cases of Duff v. Stewart, 9 R. 17, and Kinnes v. Fleming, 8 R. 386, which are practically on all-fours with the present. In them it was expressly decided by the First Division that the time during which a party has a right to appeal after an allowance of proof in the Sheriff Court is fifteen days from the interlocutor allowing proof, failing which the interlocutor becomes final.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an interesting question, and that must be my excuse No. 127.
for adding anything to what your Lordship has said.

The meaning of the Act of Sederunt has been determined, and we cannot go back upon the cases which have settled it. It has been decided that the fifteen days are to run from the date of the interlocutor allowing proof.

May 28, 1889.
Williams v.
Watt & Wilson.

I am, as I have always been, of opinion, that wherever considerations of justice and of good sense require it, and no hardship is done, relief may be given by us for any failure to comply with the terms of the Act of Sederunt. That I consider quite settled by the case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. In that case there was a miscalculation as to the time for lodging prints in terms of sec. 3, subsec. 2, of the Act of Sederunt of March 10, 1870, and the consequence was that the judgment of the Sheriff, which was appealed against, became final. The case was a specimen one, selected from a number of others of a similar nature, in order to try an important question involving thousands of pounds. If that relief, which every consideration of good sense and justice required to be given, had not been given, the judgment of the Sheriff would have become final, with this result, that we who had passed the Act of Sederunt in question could not have given that relief which we considered was required by every consideration of justice and good sense. That would indeed have been to make Acts of Sederunt of ridiculous power. The only remedy would be by private Act of Parliament. I think that we have decided that we may grant relief against the terms of our own rules, made for our own guidance, wherever we think considerations of justice require it. We may then grant relief here, if we consider there are grounds for so doing.

I am, however, of opinion that there are none here. The Act of Sederunt, which is a rule to preserve the forms of process, and an important one, to be acted upon whenever there is no strong reason to grant indulgence, gives power to a pursuer in the Sheriff Court, on an interlocutor allowing proof, to come here and have the case tried by a jury or otherwise. The Act gives an indulgence, but it is limited to time. If the pursuer do not avail himself of it, the case proceeds in the Court of his own selection. In this case the interlocutor allowing proof was pronounced on the 8th February 1889. The defender then appealed to the Sheriff, but that is nothing to the purpose. If the pursuer had it in her mind to depart from the Sheriff Court and to come here, the opportunity was given her to do so on the 8th February, and then any question of relevancy would have been tried here. She, however, allowed the case to go on by her adversary's appeal to the Sheriff, and when the appeal was disposed of, she went back to the Sheriff-substitute for the purpose of having a diet of proof fixed, which was done on the 17th April. Then, within fifteen days after, she thinks it is better to have the proof here, and appeals accordingly. I do not think that this is a case in which we ought to grant her indulgence by departing from the Act of Sederunt, and therefore I am of opinion with your Lordship that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also am of opinion that this appeal is incompetent under the Act of Sederunt, and that we are bound to follow the authorities of Duff v. Stewart and Kinnes v. Fleming.

On the question whether we have the power to give the appellant relief from the consequence of her fault, I am not disposed to express any opinion. I

No. 127. should only like to say that I think it is doubtful whether we could do so.

May 28, 1889.
Williams v.
Watt & Wilson.

LORD LEE.—I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark.

I only desire to add that the case of Boyd, Gilmour, & Company, in which dispensing powers were sustained, was different from the present case, and the question as to whether we can here exercise such powers arises in different circumstances. In the present case we are dealing with lodging an appeal within the fifteen days, while in the other case we dealt with the lodging of prints.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the defenders' objection to the appeal find that it is incompetent; dismiss the same, and remit the case to the Sheriff," &c.

J. MURRAY LAWSON, S.S.C.—MILLER & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 128.

SIMON RAMSAY, Pursuer.—Rhind—Salvesen.

ROBIN, M'MILLAN, & COMPANY, Defenders.—Jameson—Shaw.

May 29, 1889.
Ramsay v.
Robin, M'Mil-
lan, & Co.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Storing beer—Proper appliances.—A brewer sent his men to deliver barrels of beer in a customer's cellar. In elevating one of the barrels into its position in an upper tier one of the men was injured.

In an action of damages brought by him against his employer on the ground that the defender had failed to supply the necessary appliances for elevating the barrel, it was proved that the defender had furnished the men with the ordinary appliances, but that the men, finding that these could not be used, owing to the narrowness of the cellar, had, without applying to their master, proceeded to lift the barrels into position. The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuer, the Court granted a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of fault.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that no ground of action had been set forth.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

THIS was an action raised by Simon Ramsay against Robin, M'Millan, & Company, brewers, Causewayside, Edinburgh, for damages for personal injuries sustained by him while storing some barrels of beer for the defenders as their cellarman.

The defenders were under contract to supply the fish bar at the Edinburgh International Exhibition during the summer of 1886 with beer. They were in the custom of storing the beer from their brewery in a cellar in the Exhibition buildings. On 28th July 1886 the pursuer, who was thirty-six years of age, and who had been in the defenders' employment as cellarman from February 1885, was sent by the defenders to assist three other men, who were experienced in the work, in storing a number of barrels of beer, each weighing six cwt., in tiers or rows above each other in the cellar. The men were provided with "skeggs," which were appliances forming an incline plane up which the barrels were rolled to the desired height. As the cellar was too small to admit of the use of these "skeggs," the men, without complaint to the defenders, adopted the mode of hoisting the barrels on to the tiers by their shoulders, and while the pursuer was engaged in this operation a barrel canted over and crushed his head, inflicting upon him serious injury.

The pursuer averred that the defenders were in fault in the following particulars :—"The cellar in question was of very small dimensions, and there was insufficient space for the pursuer and those he was assisting to store the barrels to move safely in lifting the barrels at the time of the accident in the manner the defenders had ordered and directed the work to be done. The floor of the cellar was uneven, and the workmen in raising the barrels as aforesaid, and the pursuer and those he was assisting, could not secure a firm footing while performing the work directed by the defenders to be done as aforesaid. There was no window in the cellar. The only light in it was from a small gas jet, which afforded insufficient light for the pursuer and those he was assisting seeing what they were doing in the place. The defenders were fully aware of these facts, and also that similar accidents had, shortly before that to the pursuer, happened to others of their men in the said cellar. It was the duty of the defenders to have had more gas-light in the cellar, as well as to have erected a small crane or hoist in it, or to have furnished what are called and known in the trade as 'skeggs,' which form an inclined plane up which the barrel can be rolled to the desired height. With a hoist or with skeggs the work of placing the barrel in position as ordered by the defenders could have been safely carried out. Skeggs are ordinarily used in the trade for raising barrels which have to be placed in tiers or rows above each other. The defenders, however, culpably and recklessly failed and neglected to have the cellar properly lighted, or to have therein the means by which it could have been sufficiently lighted for the purpose of carrying out their order and direction safely. They also culpably and recklessly failed and neglected to supply either a hoist or skeggs or ropes, or any other necessary appliances for having the work of storing the barrels performed safely at the time of the accident to the pursuer."

The defenders, in answer, stated the pursuer had been engaged in storing barrels in the same premises on previous occasions, and had never complained that the appliances were insufficient.

The pursuer obtained an issue.

The case was tried before Lord McLaren and a jury on 12th July 1888.

In addition to the facts stated in the above narrative it was proved that the cellar was small, and lighted only by a door and a single gas-jet. As regards the methods adopted of storing beer, it appeared that wherever practicable the simple appliance of "skeggs" was used. Where this was not possible, then it was the practice to raise the barrels as they were raised on the occasion in question, by hoisting on men's shoulders. There was some evidence to the effect that a block and tackle was occasionally used in exceptional circumstances. It further appeared that the defenders had put an extra roof on the premises to screen the beer from the heat of the sun. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer.

The defenders thereupon asked and obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

The pursuer, in shewing cause, argued;—Tiering without mechanical appliances was a highly dangerous operation. The defenders should have had a block and tackle erected. The cellar was, if not theirs, under their control, for they had put on a roof, which was an extensive alteration. They should have had the cellar better lighted.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The operation which was being performed here by the injured man and by those with him was the ordinary one of delivering hogsheads of beer from a master to his customer. It is not a case of a workman doing something for his employer in the latter's premises, when it would be a jury

No. 128.

May 29, 1889.
Ramsay v.
Robin, M'Millan, & Co.

<sup>1</sup> Fraser v. Fraser, June 6, 1882, 9 R. 896; Grant v. Drysdale, July 12, 1883, 10 R. 1159; Murdoch v. Mackinnon, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 810.

No. 128. question whether the employer had or had not provided sufficient appliances for the work. A brewer who sends out beer to a customer fulfils his duty if he sends with the beer men who are accustomed to the methods of storing it, and if he also sends such appliances as are usually sent for such a job. Here the brewer sent the beer in the usual way with experienced men, the pursuer being one of them, and with the "skeggs" which are usually sent out to aid in storing it. When the workmen arrived at the premises, they found that the beer could not be stored by means of these "skeggs," because it happened that the place was not large enough to hold them. Up to that point no fault can be imputed to the master. At that point if the experienced workmen were of opinion (and they were the sole judges) that without some further appliances they could not place the beer in the premises, it was their duty to have returned to the master and to have asked him either to supply sufficient appliances or to see for himself what was to be done. Instead of doing this they upon their own responsibility adopted the mode which is frequently used, but which is the more risky mode. They proceeded to hoist the barrels up, using their own strength for the purpose.

May 29, 1889.
Ramsay v.
Robin, M<sup>c</sup>Mil-
lan, & Co.

There is no question that it is conclusively proved by the evidence before the jury that such a mode, though not perhaps the best, is a mode perfectly well recognised when circumstances do not admit of the ordinary mode. Even if it had not been a mode of such a character, the men chose it of their own hand.

I am unable to see in the whole evidence anything to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that the accident was due to the fault of the defenders. The jury, I understand, stated to the Judge who tried the case that they were of opinion that the employer had not provided sufficient appliances. Their view, however, is entirely inconsistent with the evidence. It is suggested for the first time that the cellar was under the control of the defenders, and belonged to them. If that were the fact it would raise an entirely different case, in this view, that if they owned the premises for the purposes of their business, and were in a position to put up permanent appliances, it would be a question for a jury whether they had or had not provided sufficient appliances. It is said that in this cellar, which did not belong to them, they should have inserted a beam into the wall in order to the hoisting of the barrels. If this was the defenders' duty, then the same would apply to all other brewers, with the result that when they sent out beer to be stored in premises belonging to their customers which were inconvenient they would have to be at the expense of supplying permanent appliances, such as a block and tackle, in order to carry out the job of storing the beer.

On the whole matter I think the verdict a bad one, and that there is no evidence to justify it. We must then, I think, set aside the verdict.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and further, I think that no good case has been stated on record. I should like also to add that my opinion is formed totally irrespective of the fact as to the contract under which the beer was put into the cellar in question. I do not think the nature or terms of the contract can affect the case in any way. I suppose the pursuer and all the other men engaged in carrying the beer never dreamt of inquiring as to the nature of the contract. The case stands simply thus:—The pursuer, who had been engaged in storing beer from February 1885 to July 1886, and was perfectly qualified for the task, was engaged with others in placing the beer in a cellar which was a store for the convenience of the Exhibition, and into which beer had been frequently put by the defenders previously. He unfortunately met with the accident complained of. What is the fault imputed on record to the employer? Want of a window; that the room was inconveniently small; that the gas was not sufficiently bright; and that no machinery for the job was supplied. I am of opinion that the record discloses no common law culpa at all or ground of action, and my opinion is not altered by the finding of twelve jurymen who think there might be, and ought to have been, special appliances for the purpose of storing the beer. I do not think that the question of culpa here is a jury question at all. If it was a jury question, then we have nothing to interfere with, for the whole facts were stated to the jury; and if it was a jury question whether there ought to have been appliances or not, then it is determined, for the jury said there ought, and we are interfering on the ground that it is not a jury question.

No. 128.

May 29, 1889.
Ramsay v.
Robin, M'Mil-
lan, & Co.

I desire to say further that I distinguish cases of this class altogether from those of works provided with machinery or of mines. The operations carried on in these latter cases are to a large extent of such a character that the Legislature and the common law has interfered to protect the workmen by enlarging the duties of the masters. This is especially the case in mines, where there are dangers which people cannot judge of for themselves. But in the cases of men being put to store beer in a cellar, or to place a servant's chest on the roof of a cab, no fault can be imputed to the employer if he has employed suitable persons to perform these jobs. Therefore, I think this case is not in the same region as those to which I have referred.

I am, then, of opinion that there is no ground of action here, that none has been established by the evidence, and none alleged on record.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that there should be a new trial.

LORD LEE.—I concur. I desire to say that if it had been proved that the brewer had hired these premises for his own purposes, it would, in my opinion, have been a jury question whether there was or was not failure to provide reasonable appliances. I think that the general rule of law, that an employer is bound to use all reasonable and proper precautions for the safety of persons employed by him to do his work, applies even in the case of brewers and cellar-men.

As this is not proved, however, I am of opinion that the verdict cannot stand.

LORD M'LAREN.—I desire to speak first on the question whether there is any issuable matter, which, though it was not argued and is not strictly before us, has been made matter of observation from the bench. The record sets forth that in placing the barrels in the cellar certain mechanical appliances are usual and necessary, and that the employer failed to provide them.

As it happened, the Lord Ordinary was personally entirely ignorant, both theoretically and actually, as to what was the customary mode of placing beer in cellars. It seemed to me on reading the record that very possibly the operation of hoisting barrels on men's shoulders might be dangerous, and I thought that if it should appear that the employer had omitted the usual precautions adopted in storing the barrels, it might be a jury question whether he was

No. 128. responsible for the accident. I therefore do not concur in Lord Young's observation to the effect that the case was not one for a jury; and further, I have a strong impression that if I had held that there was no issuable matter, my judgment would on appeal have been reversed, and the case would have been sent back to me for trial.

May 29, 1889.
Ramsay v.
Robin, M'Millan, & Co.

Upon the question more particularly before us, if the beer had had to be stored in premises belonging to the brewer, I should entirely have concurred in the views of Lord Lee. In the general case, where operations are performed on the employer's own premises, he must provide the customary appliances for the safety of his workmen. If the operations are performed on premises which do not belong to him, I think it is a question of circumstances whether he shall be held bound to inform himself personally on the subject. If, for instance, the operation was the erecting of a bridge or the fitting of engines to a vessel, I do not think the employer could escape liability by staying at home, and saying that he had sent the men to the work supplied with the usual tools, and that if they were dissatisfied they should have come and lodged a complaint with him.

But these cases are entirely different from those of the delivery of such goods as beer in a cellar, and I concur in holding that if the employer here sent the ordinary appliances, it was the duty and business of the men to complain to him if they had any fault to find with the appliances. Further, it appears to me that the evidence is really to the same effect with regard to what is customary and necessary in delivering beer. Wherever practicable, the simple appliance of "skeggs" ought to be used. Where there is no room for "skeggs," then the hogsheads are usually lifted up to their tiers on the shoulders of four men. There is undoubtedly some evidence to the effect that a block and tackle is sometimes used, but that only in exceptional circumstances. It therefore appears to me, upon the weight of the evidence, that the jury were wrong in their view that other mechanical appliances ought to have been provided. I think we must order a new trial.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the pursuer, on the rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, make the rule absolute: Set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial."

D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 129. JESSIE HELEN EDWARDS (with consent of David Edwards), Pursuer (Respondent).—Gloag—Glegg.

May 31, 1889.
Edwards v.
Hutcheon.

WILLIAM HUTCHEON, Defender (Appellant).—M'Lennan.

Reparation—Defective and dangerous machinery—Threshing-mill without a guard over the drum.—The proprietor of a steam threshing-machine undertook to thresh the grain crop of a farmer, and as his own machines were engaged elsewhere, he sent a threshing-mill belonging to another person with the attendant in charge of it, the farmer providing the rest of the labour required for the threshing. At the top and at each side of the machine were shelves on which stood "loosers," who loosed the sheaves of corn in order to hand them to a man who stood in a feeding-box, and who in turn passed them into a funnel, at the bottom of which a drum revolved at high speed. There was no cover or guard over the drum. The engine was started at a moderate speed, and a daughter of the farmer ascended a ladder in order to take her place as a "looser." She stumbled at the top of the ladder and fell, and her leg was wrenched off by the drum of the machine. No. 129.

In an action of damages raised by the girl, with consent of her father, against the contractor, it was proved that it was customary, and was regarded as an adequate precaution against accidents, to have a guard over the drum of such threshing-machines, and that all the machines belonging to the contractor were provided with guards.

The Court awarded damages, holding that the machine was defective and dangerous in respect of the want of the guard, and that the injury to the girl was attributable thereto.

ON 1st February 1888, Jessie Edwards, aged nineteen, with consent and concurrence of her father David Edwards, farmer, Rothriehill, Aberdeenshire, raised this action of damages against William Hutcheon, traction-engine proprietor, Parkhill, in respect of personal injuries sustained by her under the following circumstances.

May 31, 1889.
Edwards v.
Hutcheon.

On 5th October 1887, David Edwards contracted with the defender, who had on several previous occasions done the threshing on his farm, to thresh out part of his grain crop. As the defender's two threshing-mills were engaged elsewhere at the time, the defender procured and sent to the farm a threshing-mill which belonged to three brothers named Taylor. At the top of the threshing-mill, and at the back end of it, was a box called the feeding-box, in which stood the "feeder." Right in front of this was a funnel, at the bottom of which revolved a "drum" sometimes at very high speed. At the sides of the feeding-box were shelves or benches on which stood the "loosers," who loosed the sheaves of corn and handed them to the "feeder," who put them into the funnel to be threshed. John Taylor was in charge of the engine of the mill, William Taylor was in charge of the feeding-box, while David Edwards took charge of the servants in the stack-yard.

John Taylor started the drum at a speed of 200 revolutions a minute, and William Taylor summoned the female pursuer to ascend on to the mill and begin her work as a "looser." As she was ascending by a ladder which had been placed over against the feeding-box she stumbled at the top of the ladder, and falling, was caught by William Taylor, who managed to push her clear of the drum. In endeavouring to raise herself, however, her foot got caught by the drum, and her leg was wrenched off below the knee.

The pursuers averred that the mill was defective in not having a cover over the drum to prevent accidents.

The defenders averred that it was not customary to have a guard over the drum, and that a guard would not have prevented the accident. They further averred that the nature of the contract with the male pursuer was that the machine owners supplied the mill, along with the three men in charge of it, and that the farmer had to supply and took the whole risk of the other hands required for the threshing.

This latter averment the pursuers denied, and they stated that the men in charge of the mill undertook the whole superintendence of and responsibility for the working of the mill, the farmer merely directing his servants at the building of the stacks.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been injured in manner above libelled through the insufficient and defective machinery in use belonging to the defender and under his charge, is entitled to compensation from the defender for said injuries. (2) The injury sustained by the pursuer, the said Jessie Helen Edwards, having been caused by the fault or negligence of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, she is entitled to reparation.

No. 129.

May 31, 1889.
 Edwards v.
 Hutcheon.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case against defender. (2) There being no fault or negligence on the part of the defender or of those for whom he is responsible, he should be assoltized. (3) The risk of the plant used and of the employment being with the injured girl's employer, the action should have been directed against him—the pursuer David Edwards. (4) The plant was not defective.

On 23d March the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) allowed a proof, from which the above facts appeared. It was further proved that the threshing-mills owned by the defender were provided with guards to the drums of the machines; that it was usual to have such guards, and that they were generally recognised as a precaution against accidents.

As regarded the nature of the contract it was proved that it was the usual custom for the person supplying the threshing-mill to send three men with it, who took sole charge of it, while the farmer supplied the rest of the labour. The defender deponed that where he was unable to send one of his own threshing-mills to perform a job which he had undertaken, he was in the habit of sending a mill belonging to another person, to whom he handed the money he received for the job.*

On 12th July the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—
 “Finds that the female pursuer was injured through the fault of the defender, or those for whom he was responsible, in placing her at work upon a dangerous and defective machine supplied by him for the purpose: Finds that the defender is liable in damages: Assesses the same at the sum of £150 sterling.”†

* “I am a proprietor of threshing-mills, and have two. I have occasionally threshed for Mr Edwards. A few days before we went to the threshing at Mr Edwards' he came to see about it. On that occasion I said to Mr Edwards that I would come soon. I found that I was so busy that I could not get soon. I accordingly saw him one night and I told him that I would send a mill. I said that the Taylors had got a mill out and that I would send them. . . . I had very often been in the same circumstances. When I cannot get to a place I try to get another mill to go. On such occasions I draw the money and I pay the man that I send the same money that I get.”

† “NOTE.— . . . I have considerable doubt whether the female pursuer would be entitled to found upon the negligence of those in charge of the machine. They were fellow-servants, engaged in the same employment, and it does not appear sufficiently that the female pursuer was at the time under their orders. She seems then to have been under the orders of her father. As against the defender, the inexperience of the female pursuer forms no ground of action. She was not employed by the defender, but by her own father, and although he was much to blame in putting a young and untried girl to such work, no ground of complaint upon this score can be made against the owner of the machine or the person answerable for it. Neither, however, does the girl's inexperience absolve the defender. If the accident was due partly to the girl's inexperience and partly to the defective nature of the machine, and if it would not have happened with a properly constructed machine, the defender will be responsible for his fault, if he committed one, in supplying the machine. Where more than one person has, through his fault, materially contributed to cause an accident, each is liable in law to the injured party in the whole consequences. This brings us to the questions whether the accident was caused, or materially contributed to, by a defect in the machine, and whether the defender was to blame in supplying it. Upon the first of these questions I entertain no doubt. The machine was one which was very dangerous to those who had to do such work in connection with it as was expected from the female pursuer. She had to stand upon an elevated platform close to a funnel at the bottom of which a drum revolved at a high speed. The least mistake or slip might cause her to fall upon the drum and to be mutilated. I think it clear that such a machine ought to have a guard. In

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 26th November, dismissed No. 129. the appeal, and affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.*

May 31, 1889.
Edwards v.
Hutcheon.

England a guard is requisite by statute, and I think that the common law makes so simple and obvious a precaution against a seen danger necessary in Scotland. The use of the guard is to cover the drum altogether while the machine is not threshing, and while it is threshing to contract the opening over the drum to the narrowest extent which will permit the supplying of the sheaves. As the machine was not threshing at the time of the accident the guard might have been closed and the female pursuer's accidental fall might have been attended with perfect safety. Even if the guard had been open the pursuer might have had a chance of escape, as the guard might have checked her fall before she reached the drum. It seems to me to be beyond doubt that a person who supplies such a machine is at fault if it be sent out to work without a guard. Had there been no previous experience of danger from such machines, a person might be allowed to plead that he could not be expected to think of it. But this is the third serious injury to girls from unguarded machines of this kind which has been made the subject of action in this Court within a comparatively short time. The danger, therefore, must have been notorious and patent to all persons supplying and using such machines. The last question is whether the defender is to be held responsible for supplying the defective machine. I think that he must be. The contract to supply the machine was made with him, as it was he who was to be paid for the work. For his own convenience he employed another person to do the work, and employed that other person's machine. As the contract with the defender was to supply a proper machine for the work, I think it follows that it was his duty, when he deputed the performance to another, to see that the other supplied the article which he was bound to supply. In regard to the amount of damages nothing requires to be said. I have simply followed the precedents set in former actions in this Court."

* "NOTE.—This is the third case which, within the last few years, has been heard before this Court of accidents resulting from unguarded threshing-machines, each of them most painful in its circumstances. In England the Act 41 Vict. cap. 12, provides that the drum and mouth of every threshing-machine shall at all times during the work be securely fenced 'so far as reasonably practicable and consistent with the due and efficient working thereof'; and although, for some reason not apparent, it has not been deemed necessary to extend to Scotland and Ireland the protection which has been given to the English agricultural labourer, I think that, without any such Act, the common law implies as much. I have no difficulty in again holding—along with the Sheriff-substitute—that any machine which is not furnished with a guard suffers from a serious defect. The evidence in this case proves conclusively that it was the want of a guard which cost the pursuer the loss of the leg. In going up a ladder to take her place among the 'loosers' she tripped and fell. As the machine had just been started and had not begun to thresh, the guard would have been closed if it had been in its place, and in all probability she would have escaped uninjured. That she tripped accidentally is not contributory negligence on her part; for, in requiring machinery to be safe and efficient, the law intends to provide against such chance mistakes or mishaps. If, again, there was any fault on the part of the men in charge—of which, however, I can find no evidence—that would not prevent her from recovering; for, while a co-servant's negligence is one of the risks assumed by a workman, this always implies that the tools and appliances furnished by the master are in all respects suitable. It has been argued that the farmer who hires an expensive agricultural machine, such as the one in question, is not answerable for its deficiency, when the men who took charge of it are sent with the machine by the man who lets it out. This may be so where there is reason to conclude that the owner of the machine retains the whole control of the operation, as the common master of all engaged in the work—his own people, as well as the farmer's people, included. But in this instance I think it was the farmer who had the control; his own servants continued under him; and the machine, for the time, was part of his plant. In the words of the

No. 129.

May 31, 1889.
 Edwards v.
 Hutcheon.

The defender appealed, and argued ;—(1) There was no relevant case against him. The pursuers had no contract with him. He was merely an intermediary between them and the Taylors. (2) Even assuming that the contract was with him, the mill did not belong to him, and he was not responsible for any defects in it of which he was unaware.<sup>1</sup> It was, moreover, by no means clear that the existence of a guard would have prevented the accident. The machine had been started when the accident happened, and even if there had been a guard over the drum, it must of necessity have been open at the time of the accident to admit of the machine being fed by the "feeder." If there was fault at all, it was fault on the part of the male pursuer, who permitted her to ascend the ladder.

Argued for the pursuers ;—(1) The pursuers' contract was with the defender alone. The evidence of the defender himself was against the idea that he was merely an intermediary. (2) He was bound to supply a safe machine.<sup>2</sup> He knew himself of the necessity of guards, for he had them on his own mills. It was indeed most clearly proved that they were recognised as proper and adequate precautions against accidents. It was not in the mouth of the defender to say that possibly the existence of a guard might not have prevented the accident.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is certainly a somewhat difficult and narrow case. We need not, I think, pay any attention to the argument advanced by the defender, that he was not the party contracted with, but merely an intermediary. He was in the practice of providing threshing-machines for farms, and not having one of his own at the time, he undertook to get another. The whole bargain was with him, and the pursuer's father had nothing to do with the terms. If anything has occurred for which the pursuer is entitled to recover damages, it is from the person who provided the machine—that is, from the present defender—that they must be recovered.

The difficult question is, whether or not the circumstances disclosed make it plain that there was fault on the part of the provider of the machine for which he is responsible. That question seems to depend upon whether or not there should have been a guard or cover over the top of the feeding mouth of the machine.

Employers Liability Act,—'It was in use in his business,' and, this being so, the employer's liability for his workmen's safety is the same, whether he acquired it by purchase, or had borrowed it from a neighbour, or had hired it for the day. On the other hand, I think the farmer will have relief against the hirer who furnishes him with an insufficient machine ; for in the hiring of any moveable it is part of the contract that the implement to be furnished shall be such as may be safely used, at least as far as care and skill can make it. If this be so, I see no reason why a farm-servant who may be injured by a defect in the machine may not have direct action against the owner or hirer. It may seem hard that in this case the decree will issue, not against the actual owner Mr Taylor, but the defender Mr Hutcheon, with whom the pursuer's father contracted to furnish the machine. But, as the defender candidly explains, when he cannot send a mill of his own, he tries to get another mill to go, draws the money, and pays it over to the substitute. In these circumstances, it appears to me that he remains responsible, all the more so that, knowing fully the advantage of the guard (all his own machines being guarded), he allowed a deputy to send an unguarded machine as a substitute, and thereby was the primary cause of the accident."

<sup>1</sup> Macarthy v. Young, Jan. 31, 1861, 6 Hurlstone & Norman, 329.

<sup>2</sup> Edgar v. Law & Brand, Dec. 15, 1871, 10 Macph. 236, 44 Scot. Jur. 60.

Now, it is certainly proved that it is not novel in practice to have such a guard, No. 129. and the defender himself has deposed that he considers such to be a preventive against real danger. His evidence contains the following passages :—" My mills have guards on the drum. Asked,—Do you consider that necessary for safety? Yes." May 31, 1889.
Edwards v.
Hutcheon.

It is quite plain, therefore, that there is a practice, which the defender is quite aware of, and is a party to, of providing guards in this manner.

But it is said that when the machine is working such guards must be open, and that in that view they would not act as a precaution in the event of a person falling as the pursuer did. I must say I am not so clear about that. Even if open and upright, the guard might have been of the greatest protection and help to the female pursuer, for she might have caught hold of it to save herself, and if she had fallen sufficiently far forward to fall over the guard, it would have prevented her foot getting down upon the drum. But further, there can be no question that if a guard had been provided, it ought to have been kept shut at the time this accident happened. Such a guard ought not to be raised until the "feeder" has actually placed the sheaves into the machine. In this case, at the time of the accident, the sheaves had not been placed in position. No doubt the machine had to be set in motion slowly to get up full speed before the threshing began, but until the "feeder" was in his place, the other workers in their positions, and the sheaves placed in the machine, the guard ought not to have been opened. The only difficulty is as to whether there is sufficient evidence to satisfy us that there should have been a guard. It is perfectly true that an owner is not bound to have the latest appliances, and that he fulfils his duty if he has those which are generally known to the trade as proper precautions against accidents. But the whole of the evidence goes to shew that the precaution of a guard is recognised and well known, and is one which men who are accustomed to use such machines say is a proper precaution. The defender must therefore be liable, because he did not take that precaution.

I am the more moved to take this view, because accidents of this sort, owing to the want of a cover to the drum, have occurred somewhat frequently.

I am, then, on the whole matter, of opinion that there is no ground for interfering with the judgment of both the Sheriffs.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I can state in a few sentences the exact views upon which I proceed.

The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff are both of opinion, and have so found, that this poor girl lost her foot in consequence of the defective and dangerous condition of the threshing-machine in question. I think there is reasonable evidence to support their views. That being the fact as found by them upon reasonable evidence, what is the law?

The machine was supplied by the defender, along with the services of three men to work it, under a contract by which he was to do the threshing at the farm of the pursuer's father. It was not exactly a contract of letting out the machine, but a contract to do the threshing of the farm, sending the machine and men to work it, the farmer only being bound to supply men to feed it. This is the contract as averred, and I think proved. The defender himself says in evidence,—“I am a proprietor of threshing-mills, and have two. I have occasionally threshed for Mr Edwards. A few days before we went to the threshing

No. 129. at Mr Edwards' he came to see about it. On that occasion I said to Mr Edwards
May 31, 1889. that I would come soon. I found that I was so busy that I could not get soon.
Edwards v. I accordingly saw him one night and told him that I would send a mill. I said Hutcheon. that the Taylors had got a mill out, and that I would send them . . . I had very often been in the same circumstances. When I cannot get to a place I try to get another mill to go. On such occasions I draw the money and I pay the man that I send the same money that I get." I agree with your Lordship that we cannot pay any attention to the view that he was not the contractor himself but a mere intermediary.

The next question is as to whether it was his duty to send a reasonably safe machine. I think under the contract it was. I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that "a person who supplies such a machine is at fault if it be sent out to work without a guard." The Sheriff-substitute then proceeds to tell us that: "this is the third serious injury to girls from unguarded machines of this kind which has been made the subject of action in this Court within a comparatively short time." The Sheriff, after referring to a statute which deals with this matter, and applies to England, says,—“Although, for some reason not apparent, it has not been deemed necessary to extend to Scotland and Ireland the protection which has been given to the English agricultural labourer, I think that, without any such Act, the common law implies as much.” In that opinion I agree with him. Well then, the case becomes so clear as this. Assuming the facts as found by the Sheriff, and assuming the law to be as they both think it is, is there any escape from liability on the part of the defender? The only thing which can be said for him is that the farmer was present, and seeing the state of the machine, allowed his daughter to feed it. I cannot think that this bars his daughter from suing this action. I regard it as an action by the father upon a contract which was fulfilled dangerously, with the result that his daughter, living in family with him, lost her foot. I do not enter upon the question whether either of them could have sued alone, or, rather, whether the daughter could have sued without his concurrence, she being no party to the contract. Indeed, I should be disposed to avoid deciding the point, even if it were hard to do so, and I should assume that the farmer and his daughter, as I have said living in family with him, are joint pursuers of this action. I am not able to attribute failure in duty to him or to the girl herself, who will have her remedy against the primary wrongdoer at least, for the consequences of the wrong.

I may state that I concur in the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute rather than in that of the Sheriff. The latter seems to regard the action in substance and effect as one by the girl against her father, as being her employer, for having exposed her to danger by allowing her to go upon an imperfect machine, conjoined with an action of relief at his instance against the party who supplied the dangerous machine. With this view I do not sympathise. I prefer the view adopted by the Sheriff-substitute.

I agree with your Lordship that this is a narrow case. I do not, however, feel that I should be justified in setting aside the judgments of the Sheriffs either on the facts or on the law. I am of opinion, then, that we ought to adhere.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have found this a difficult case, but upon the whole I agree with the result.

LORD LEE.—I concur. I should only like to say that, as regards the nature of the claim, I agree with Lord Young in preferring to rest my judgment upon the view arrived at by the Sheriff-substitute rather than upon that of the Sheriff.

No. 129.
May 31, 1889.
Edwards v.
Hutcheon.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the defender, on 5th October 1887, contracted with David Edwards, father of the pursuer, Jessie Helen Edwards, to thresh out part of the grain crop on the farm of the latter, and next day sent an engine and threshing-machine with attendants to do the work: Find the machine supplied by the defender for that purpose was defective and dangerous, in respect there was no guard to the drum, and that the injury sustained by the said pursuer when taking her place on the machine, to assist said attendants as feeder, is attributable to the want of such guard: Find in law that the defender is liable to her in damages accordingly: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Of new assess the damages at £150," &c.

RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

DANIEL MATHESON (Matheson's Curator Bonis), Petitioner.—Shaw—Walton.

No. 130.

ANNIE JANE PATTERSON MATHESON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Law—Dudley Stuart.

May 31, 1889.
Matheson's
Curator Bonis
v. Mathesons.

Minor and Pupil—Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Statement of accounts.

—The uncle of three minor children was appointed executor-dative qua factor to their deceased father, and he thereafter agreed to carry on for behoof of the children a farm of which the father had been tenant. He was subsequently appointed curator bonis to the children on their succeeding to certain monies from a relation on their mother's side. In a petition for his discharge as curator bonis held that the curatorial funds must be kept separate, and that he was not entitled in his accounts to deduct the losses he had sustained as executor.

JOHN MATHESON, farmer, Garbole, Inverness-shire, died intestate on 5th November 1879 survived by three daughters, the eldest aged eleven, and the youngest aged seven years. His wife predeceased him.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfriesshire.
M.

On 17th June 1880 Daniel Matheson, a brother of the deceased, was appointed by the Sheriff of Inverness-shire factor to the children. He thereafter gave up an inventory of the deceased's personal estate (which consisted mainly of stock, crop, and implements upon the farm, amounting to £3051, 9s. 9d., the liabilities being £2715, 2s. 5d.), and confirmation was thereafter granted in his favour as executor qua factor. He failed to induce the landlord of the farm to accept a renunciation of the lease, and after consideration he found himself obliged to carry it on as executor qua factor for the children.

In 1882 the children became entitled each to a third part of a sum of £1037, 19s., to which they had succeeded on the death of a relative of their mother. On 22d August 1882, on the petition of their maternal uncle, Daniel Matheson was appointed curator bonis to the children by the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire, and in the inventory which was lodged with the Accountant of Court this fund only was included. On a representation from the Accountant of Court the inventory was corrected so as to include the executry funds—no explanation as to the liabilities being added. When the curator lodged his bond of caution he lodged along

No. 130. with it a certificate by his law-agent that he was not a creditor of the wards.

May 31, 1889.
Matheson's
Curator Bonis
v. Mathesons.

The curator bonis, in July 1887, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire to have his appointment as curator bonis recalled, and for discharge. He stated that he had succeeded in obtaining the landlord's consent to a renunciation of the lease of the farm at Whitsunday 1884, and had thereafter disposed of the farm stock, implements, and crop; that owing to unfavourable seasons, the falling prices of farm stock, and chiefly to unfavourable sales when the assets of the farm were realised, the whole curatorial funds had been spent, and the balance due to the petitioner as at 31st December 1885 amounted to £363, 7s. 4d.

The three wards stated, inter alia, in answer;—"Explained that in the first of the accounts, extending over the period from 22d August 1882 to 31st December 1883, the pursuer debits himself with the said sum of £1037, 19s. received from the trustees of the said Edward Patterson, and on 22d August 1882 credits himself with the sum of £4042, 13s. 8d., as the balance due to him at that date on his intromissions with the executry estate of the said John Matheson; and that in that and the other accounts he includes his subsequent intromissions with the said executry estate, and in particular his intromissions in connection with the said farm of Garbole. The defenders object to this manner of stating the accounts, and claim that an account be stated separately by the pursuer with reference to the said sum of £1037, 19s., which came to them in their own right, and was not liable to the diligence of the creditors of their father. It was the duty of the pursuer, instead of carrying on the said farm at an enormous loss, to have abandoned the same and the executry estate to the landlord and the other creditors of the said John Matheson. In any case, it was the pursuer's duty to have kept the estate belonging to the defenders separate for their behoof, and he is bound to account to them for the same apart altogether from his intromissions with their father's estate. The defenders reserve their objections in detail to the pursuer's account of his intromissions with the said sum of £1037, 19s., when the same shall have been given in."

The petitioner pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having duly accounted for the curatory estate, and his intromissions therewith, and the said estate being now exhausted, he is entitled to have his appointment recalled, and to receive a judicial discharge of his intromissions, and delivery of his bond of caution. (2) The pursuer is entitled to decree against his wards for the balance due to him on his intromissions with the curatory funds, with expenses as concluded for.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The estate coming to the defenders in their own right not being liable to their father's debts, the defenders are entitled to an account of the pursuer's intromissions therewith, apart from his intromissions with their father's executry estate, and the pursuer is not entitled to his discharge until he has made payment to them of the balance ascertained to be due on such account.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hope), on 3d April 1888, pronounced an interlocutor finding that the petitioner was entitled to his discharge, reserving to the respondents to object to the audit of his accounts, and allowing them to lodge objections.*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . To sum up, I may state my opinion to be (1) That the petitioner, as executor qua factor, should never have taken up the lease, and had no power to do so; (2) That the Dumfriesshire curatory should not have had

The Sheriff (Macpherson) on appeal, on 31st January 1889, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and refused the prayer of the petition in hoc statu. No. 130.

May 31, 1889.
Matheson's
Curator Bonis
v. Mathesons.

On 12th February following the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, in accounting for his intromissions with the estate under his charge as curator bonis for the respondents, the petitioner is not entitled to take into account his intromissions with the estate under his charge as factor loco tutoris under the appointment made by the Sheriff of Inverness-shire: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the respondents, and decerns; and appoints the petitioner to lodge an account, framed with reference to the above finding, of his intromissions with the curatory funds within ten days."

On 20th March following the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the petitioner's failure to lodge his accounts, refused the prayer of the petition.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriffs have taken a good deal of trouble about this case, and have, I think, perplexed themselves unnecessarily. The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 12th February 1889 appears to me to be quite well founded, except that the mode in which it is expressed is not quite so full or explicit as I think it ought to be, and I shall suggest a slight alteration upon its language, which, I think, will make it completely applicable to the state of the facts.

Mr Matheson, the appellant, was appointed curator bonis to the three pupil children of his deceased brother, the object of the appointment being that he might take charge of a legacy which had come to them in their own right. Their father had been a farmer in Inverness, and at his death his personal estate consisted merely of the stocking upon the farm of which he was tenant. Mr Matheson, the petitioner,—the same gentleman who was afterwards appointed curator bonis,—applied to the Commissary of Inverness-shire to be decerned executor-dative qua factor, for the purpose of taking over the estate of his deceased brother, and he was confirmed and entered into possession of the estate. He afterwards cultivated the farm as the executor of his deceased brother under an arrangement with the landlord, and in the course of his management he incurred considerable losses. Prima facie, a pupil child cannot be made liable for losses arising from proceedings taken by a guardian in his capacity as executor of a deceased brother. In the present case, if the petitioner had been in a position as factor to pay over a balance to himself in his other capacity as curator bonis, he might, as curator bonis, very properly have received that free balance, because it would have certainly belonged to his wards. But there being no such balance, there is no connection whatever imported into it the affairs of the Inverness-shire factory; (3) That the petition for leave to renounce the lease should not have been brought in this Court, but in that of Inverness; (4) That the whole proceedings should be overturned, if that can possibly be done, so as to disentangle the confusion which has arisen; but (5) That it is not competent for me to do so, and that partly on account of what the Accountant instructed the petitioner to do, and partly on account of the partial recognition of the petitioner's and the Accountant's actings, given per incuriam at the time when the petition for special powers was presented. . . ."

---

No. 130.

May 31, 1889.
Matheson's
Curator Bonis
v. Mathesons.

between the estate in Inverness-shire which he holds as executor and the estate in Dumfriesshire which he holds as curator bonis. Accordingly, I quite agree with the result at which both the Sheriffs have arrived. The petitioner cannot be allowed to mix up the two estates with a view to obtain his discharge as curator bonis.

The second plea in law for the respondents is quite sound, and it is the plea given effect to by the Sheriff-substitute. Mr Matheson must lodge a state of his accounts as curator bonis, and if he attempts to set off his losses as executor in the management of the farm the objection can be taken, and the amount struck out.

LORD SHAND.—In August 1882 the petitioner was appointed curator bonis to the three children of his deceased brother, and he now seeks his discharge from his actings in that office. Prima facie, there is no question that in asking his discharge his accounts should include his transactions as curator bonis, and no more. But he proposes to bring into these accounts certain intromissions had by him with his wards' estate not in his character as curator bonis, but in the character of executor-dative of the father of the children—an office which he thought fit to undertake. In this way he proposes to recoup himself out of the curatorial estate for losses which he sustained in the management of the executry estate. I am very clearly of opinion that he cannot compensate these losses as he proposes, or bring these losses into his accounts.

It is true that if he were in possession as executor-dative of the father of funds belonging to his ward—which were free and unencumbered—it would be right that he should have had these funds made over to him as curator bonis, and credit them in his accounts; but if in place of there being surplus executry funds, there is a liability attaching to that fund, it can affect himself alone, and there is no ground upon which he can make that liability a charge in the curatorial accounts.

The case may be illustrated very clearly in this way. Suppose that another brother of the deceased had assumed the office of executor. There was a certain amount of moveable property upon the farm occupied by the deceased. But there were also subsisting obligations to pay rent for many years to come—and it would be a serious question which the executor had to consider whether he should meddle with the farm at all, which, if he did, would involve the estate in the business of farming. A relative might have taken certain risks for the children, but if he took upon himself the character of executor, and then entered on the farm as tenant, and the result was a loss to the estate, undoubtedly he could not throw one penny of that loss upon the children. If the responsibility which he assumed resulted in the estate being diminished, the executor, though personally liable to make it good, would have had no right to impose the loss on the curator or the children.

Everything was said by Mr Walton which could be said on behalf of the appellant. It was urged that if the executor had declined to take up the lease, that would have involved the giving up of a sum of £600, which represented the value of the stocking on the farm. But it would be better to give that up in many cases than to involve the estate in large responsibility extending over future years. There is no doubt, on the one hand, that an executor acting for young children must personally bear the risks if he undertakes to carry on an agricultural lease, and it turns out unsuccessful, and, on the other hand, it may be that he is bound to give the benefit of any profits that may be made upon the farm to the children. It is clear that the losses resulting from farming cannot be allowed to enter the curator's accounts.

No. 130.
May 31, 1889.
Matheson's
Curator Bonis
v. Mathesons.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Vary the said interlocutor of 12th February 1889 by deleting the words 'factor loco tutoris' on the sixteenth line thereof, and substituting therefor the words 'executor-dative qua factor,' and also by inserting after the word 'Inverness-shire' on the eighteenth line of said interlocutor the words 'and confirmation following thereon': Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor; recall the said interlocutor of 20th March 1889: Quoad ultra refuse the appeal, and find the respondents entitled to expenses in this Court."

THOMAS WHITE, S.S.C.—R. COLLIE GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS HARRIOTT MARGARET HOLMES OR ROBERTSON AND OTHERS
(Robertson's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Mac Watt.
DUNCAN MACGREGOR GARDNER, Defender (Appellant).—Dundas.

No. 131.
May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

Maills and Duties—Right in Security—Heritable creditor.—When a heritable creditor has obtained a decree of maills and duties against the tenants on an estate in an action in which the proprietor has been called for his interest, and has not appeared, he is thereafter in possession of the estate, and has a good title to use sequestration for rent against anyone subsequently possessing as tenant, although he may not have been called in the action of maills and duties.

MRS H. M. HOLMES OR ROBERTSON AND OTHERS, the trustees of the late Robert James Robertson, W.S., were in right of a bond over the lands of Archindarroch and Lagnaha, Argyllshire, to the extent of £9550 of principal and interest.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
M.

On 21st April 1888 a summons of maills and duties, at the instance of Robertson's trustees against the proprietors and tenants of the security subjects, was signeted, and on 12th May following it was called. The persons called as defenders were John Gardner, James Young Gardner, and Alexander Gardner, proprietors of the subjects in question, principal debtors, and among the tenants who were called were John Gardner, Alexander Gardner (being two of the three above-named proprietors), and George J. Alison junior, as individuals, or as trustees for the firm of J. & A. Gardner & Company, quarrymasters at Lagnaha, and J. & A. Gardner & Company for their interest.

The summons contained no conclusion against the proprietors except for payment of expenses, but concluded against the tenants on the estate, other than the Gardners and Alison, for payment of the rents due and payable by them at Whitsunday 1888 for the half year preceding, and thereafter at each half-yearly term during their possession. The conclusion against the Gardners and Alison (who alone defended the action), was for payment of sums due by them in respect of their tenancy of certain slate quarries at November 1887 and 1st May 1888, and thereafter on each 1st May and 1st November following, so long as they remained in possession.

On 25th May 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) decerned in absence against the defenders, John Gardner, Alexander Gardner, and James Young Gardner, principal debtors; and against "the tenants who had not ap-

No. 131. peared, John M'Nicol" and others, conform to the conclusions of the libel, with expenses against the principal debtors.
 May 31, 1889. In their defences the compearing defenders admitted that they were Robertson's tenants and possessors of the quarries up to 6th April 1888, but stated
 Trustees v. that, as at that date, they had assigned their lease to Duncan Macgregor
 Gardner. Gardner under an assignation in his favour dated 11th and 12th April
1888, of which the proprietors had accepted intimation on 14th April 1888, from which date the assignee became liable for the rent, &c., pay- able under their lease. They further stated that the rents, &c. payable by them up to 6th April 1888 had been paid to John Gardner as factor for the proprietors.

On 19th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced decree against the compearing defenders for the rents, &c. due by them at and prior to 1st May 1888, and dismissed the action so far as regarded the rents payable subsequent thereto. On a reclaiming note at the instance of the compearing defenders, the First Division, on 15th January 1889, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

In January 1889 Robertson's trustees, founding upon their right of hypothec, presented in the Sheriff Court at Oban a petition for sequestration for non-payment of rent as from 1st May 1888 against Duncan Macgregor Gardner as lessee of the quarries since 6th April 1888. There was also a prayer that in the event of the subjects of the hypothec being exhausted the defender should be ordained to stock and replenish the quarries.

On 24th January following the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) granted interim sequestration.

A record was subsequently made up in which the pursuers stated that the decrees in the action of maills and duties were effectual against the defender as the successor of the tenants named therein, and that he, as their assignee, had no higher rights than they.

The defender stated, inter alia;—"Denied that, as heritable creditors foresaid, the pursuers are in possession of that portion of the said estates which is occupied by the defender as tenant, and averred that none of the decrees of maills and duties founded on by the pursuers is directed against the defender as tenant foresaid, although he was in possession at the date when the action of maills and duties referred to was raised, and although the pursuers were informed of this so far back as 24th April 1888." He further stated that the pursuers had never placed themselves in a legal position to uplift the rents in question, and to give a valid discharge for them, but expressed his willingness to consign the rents.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender being in arrear in payment of his rent, the pursuers are entitled to obtain sequestration of his effects in security, and for payment of the rent.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers not having entered into possession of the subjects occupied by the defender as tenant foresaid, either under a decree of maills and duties or otherwise, they are not entitled to pursue this action, and the same should be dismissed, and the sequestration recalled, with expenses. (2) The pursuers not having the right of hypothec claimed by them, are not entitled to insist in this action, and the same should be dismissed, and the sequestration recalled, with expenses. (3) In any event, the pursuers were not entitled to raise this action without having made a demand on the said defender for the said rent, and the defender having been all along willing and ready to pay the said rent to any person legally entitled thereto, this action was, and is, unnecessary and oppressive, and the same ought to be dismissed, and the sequestration recalled, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan), on 26th March 1889, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers are heritable creditors in possession of certain lands and others, including the subjects mentioned in the petition, in virtue of decrees of mailles and duties dated 25th May 1888, and 19th July 1888, and 15th January 1889: Finds that the defender is, and has been since 6th April 1888, tenant of the said subjects, conform to a minute of lease and assignation thereof in his favour, dated 11th and 12th April 1888, and relative minute of acceptance dated 12th and 14th April 1888: Finds that the said decrees gave the pursuers, as heritable creditors foresaid, a right to pursue for and recover the rents of said subjects from all parties in possession of the same: Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the petition."*

No. 131.

May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) The defender became tenant in possession of the quarries on 6th April 1888, from which date the assignation by the former tenants took effect. The summons in the action of mailles and duties was signeted on 21st April 1888, and on the 24th intimation was made to the pursuers that the persons who had been called as tenants of the quarries were no longer

* "NOTE.—This is an action of sequestration for rent raised by heritable creditors holding decrees of mailles and duties which were pronounced in an action raised by them on 21st April 1888, in which they called the proprietors of the subjects as principal debtors, and the several tenants or occupants for the respective rents due by them. The action was undefended by the proprietors and certain of the tenants, and decree was pronounced against them, conform to the conclusions of the summons, but the parties who were called in respect of their occupancy of other portions of the subjects, being those referred to in the present action, defended on the ground that before the action of mailles and duties was raised they had assigned their lease to the present defender by assignation duly intimated to and approved of by the proprietors, and they pleaded that having ceased to be tenants before the action was raised the same, so far as directed against them, was incompetent. But as they failed to shew that they had paid the rents and lordships due at and prior to 1st May 1888, or had ceased at the date of the action to be liable therefor, decree of mailles and duties was pronounced against them for these rents, and as to the rents, lordships, and others subsequent to 1st May 1888, the action was dismissed as against said defenders. The present defender pleads that as there was no conclusion against him these decrees of mailles and duties do not affect him, though he was in possession when the action was raised, and the same cannot apply to those portions of the estate which he occupied as tenant. This appears to be a plea against the competency of the proceedings in the action of mailles and duties, and cannot now be considered. In that action decree was pronounced against the proprietors, and that decree gives a right to recover and intromit with the whole rents due, so far as the security extends and is operative, as a constant title of possession against the natural possessors of the ground, and also against the proprietors or liferenters who are in the civil possession, and from whom the natural possessors derive their right—(E. iv. 1, 49). By his assignation, which was duly intimated and ratified, the defender is the tenant of and derives his right from the proprietors, against whom there is a continuing decree, and not from the previous tenants, the decree against whom was limited to the rents applicable to the period of their possession. The rents, therefore, that are due by the defender are payable directly to the pursuers, and they must be allowed the ordinary means for recovering the same. This principle was recognised in the case of Railton v. Muirhead, 20th June 1834, 12 S. 757, where a creditor holding a decree of mailles and duties had allowed the debtor, who was also proprietor, to enter into possession of the subjects, but was found not entitled to bring a sequestration for rent, because he failed to make out any agreement for lease with the debtor, or that the latter had entered on the subject otherwise than as a proprietor, and a pouncing of the ground is the proper remedy when the proprietor is in possession."

No. 131.

May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

tenants. There was no conclusion in the summons in the action of mails and duties against the proprietors, and there could be none, except for expenses, and the Lord Ordinary had accordingly gone wrong when he pronounced decree in absence against them on 25th May. There was thus no decree as against that part of the subjects of which the defender was now in possession. (2) Without such a decree the assignation to the rents contained in the pursuers' bond and disposition in security was of no avail. Incumbrancers like the pursuers required a decree of mails and duties in order to give them a title to uplift the rents.<sup>1</sup> The 119th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868 made no change upon the previously existing law. Under that section it was only "on default in payment" that the creditor was to be entitled to enter into possession. "On default in payment" meant that all proper legal process to compel payment must first be used.<sup>2</sup> But further, this point could not avail the pursuers, for they did not found in any way in their summons on the assignation to rents clause in their security title.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The assignation to rents in their infetment put them in a position to give a good discharge for the rents. The defender knew that the pursuers had entered into possession, and that the landlords were ousted. This was proved by the letter of the 24th April written by the defender's agents to the pursuers. (2) But further, by the decree in the action of mails and duties the pursuers became not only assignees in security but absolute assignees by entering into possession as in a question with the landlord. The decree operated a judicial transference of the landlord's rights.<sup>3</sup>

LORD SHAND.—In this appeal the pursuers, who are the trustees of the late Mr R. J. Robertson, state as their title to bring this action against the defender, who is the tenant of certain quarries near Ballachulish, that they are heritable creditors in possession of the lands of Auchindarroch and Lagnaha in virtue of two decrees pronounced by the Court in an action of mails and duties at their instance against the heritable proprietors pro indiviso of these lands and the tenants thereof. They produce as the foundation of the action the decrees in the action of mails and duties.

The present is an action of sequestration for rent directed against Mr Duncan Macgregor Gardner, a tenant of the proprietors, from whom the petitioners obtained a bond and disposition in security. The Sheriff-substitute has found that the procedure has been regular and competent, and he has granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the petition, there having been no opposition to the terms of the prayer.

The tenant's defence is that he was not called in the original action, and that that being so, it cannot be made the foundation of an action against him of sequestration for non-payment of rent based upon the pursuers' right of hypothec.

<sup>1</sup> Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, & Co., Jan. 14, 1876, 3 R. 333; Neils v. Lyle, Dec. 1, 1863, 2 Macph. 168 (Lord Deas, p. 172); Webster v. Donaldson, 1780, M. 2902.

<sup>2</sup> Rankine on Leases, 44, 324; Railton v. Muirhead, June 20, 1834, 12 S. 757 (Lord Corehouse's opinion, p. 759); Ball's Principles, 1243.

<sup>3</sup> Wedderburn v. Mann, 1707, M. 10,399; M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Practice, 405; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, 274; Lord Lothian v. Vassals of Jedburgh, 1634, M. 14,087; Forsyth v. Aird, Dec. 13, 1853, 16 D. 197 (L. J.-C. Hope, 204); Budge v. Brown's Trustees, July 12, 1872, 10 Macph. 958.

It is to be kept in view that there is no opposition on the part of the proprietors of the lands who granted the bond and disposition in security. It is not said that the tenant is interpellated in any way from paying the rent to the pursuers, and it is difficult to see how the granters of the bond could interpellate him, because decree was granted in the action of mails and duties in which they were called for their interest as proprietors of the quarries. Again, it is not alleged that there is any competition for the rents, or that there is any other creditor of the landlord who has an interest to interfere. Indeed, it is difficult to see what reason the defender has for resisting the decree which is sought, unless it be to delay payment.

No. 131.
May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

The case really comes to turn upon the question whether the pursuers have made out that they are heritable creditors in possession of the lands including the quarries of Ballachulish. Looking to the terms of the decree in the action of mails and duties, I think they are heritable creditors in possession. We find that the persons called in that action were John Gardner, Alexander Gardner, and James Young Gardner, heritable proprietors pro indiviso of the lands of Auchindarrich or Auchindarroch, Argyllshire, and of Lagnaha, principal debtors. These were the proprietors of the lands. Further, the tenants upon the whole estates were called. Decree in absence was granted so far as the proprietors were concerned. So far as they were concerned, there was no opposition. In regard to the conclusion against the tenants, the only persons who appeared were those who were tenants of the very quarries which are now let to the defender. The defence was, admitting that they were tenants, that they had paid the rent to the landlords, who were the brothers of the present defender.

The Lord Ordinary dealt with the defence in this way. The decree bears:—"Sitting in judgment, the said Lords, of the first date hereof, having considered the cause, with the productions mentioned in the inventory, and heard counsel, found and hereby find it not instructed that the compearing defenders have paid the rents and lordships due at and prior to 1st May 1888 or had ceased at the date of raising the action to be liable therefor; therefore repelled and hereby repel the defences so far as applicable to the rents and lordships for the possession up to May 1888, and decerned and ordained, and hereby decern and ordain, the said defenders John Gardner, Alexander Gardner, and George Jamieson Alison junior, as trustees for the firm of J. & A. Gardner & Company, jointly and severally, and the said J. & A. Gardner & Company, to make payment of the rents." The result of that decree is, that the present pursuers vindicated their rights as creditors in possession of the quarries. They obtained decree in that character, and they could only obtain decree on the footing that they had taken up the landlord's rights. It is true that the decree applied only up to May 1888, and that this is the necessary result of the facts, because these tenants had then ceased to have any interest in the quarries. But the fact remains that the decree proceeds upon the footing that the heritable creditors were in possession of the landlord's rights.

What is the defence which is put forward? It is said that upon the 6th April 1888 the defender had become tenant of these subjects. But the pursuers are heritable creditors in possession of the subjects in virtue of the decree of mails and duties which embraces the whole estate. There is no ground for saying that a new proceeding must be adopted against each incoming tenant. It was perhaps to be desired that this defender should have been called, but that is not necessary. The decree did not apply to one-half or one-third of the

No. 131.

May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

estate only ; it embraced the whole. The pursuers are heritable creditors in possession, and entitled to vindicate their rents in the hands of any tenant, where, as here, there are no competing rights.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuers are heritable creditors of the proprietors of the lands of Auchindarrich and Lagnaha, and the defender is Mr Duncan Macgregor Gardner, quarrymaster, Lagnaha. It appears that the interest on their bond being in arrear, the present pursuers took means to recover these arrears, and for that purpose they brought an action of mails and duties against the proprietors and their tenants. That action resulted in a decree which was pronounced in this Court, on which a good deal of the argument has been rested. The dates of the proceedings in that action are somewhat material. The summons was signeted on 21st April 1888. On 25th May decree in absence was pronounced against the proprietors and those tenants who did not appear. Another interlocutor was pronounced on 19th July following against certain of the compearing defenders. These were John Gardner, Alexander Gardner, and George Jamieson Alison junior, as trustees for the firm of J. & A. Gardner & Company, and the said J. & A. Gardner & Company. That interlocutor was affirmed on 9th February 1889, and it was thereby found that these parties had not ceased to be liable at the date of raising the action for the rents and lordships concluded for, and they were decerned against accordingly. Upon the face of the decree, it appears that the action of mails and duties was properly raised against both the proprietors and tenants. They were the proprietors and tenants in possession down to May 1888. If that is so, they were liable for the rents at the date when the action was brought, and they were therefore the proper parties to call in the action. That being so, the defender's argument in the present case is reducible to a proposition which he was unable to face. He could not dispute that if the tenants in possession at the time the action of mails and duties was brought were called in that action, it was unnecessary to call those who might subsequently become tenants.

I think the Sheriff-substitute is right in the result at which he has arrived.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The summons of mails and duties called as defenders the proprietors of this estate, but it did not conclude for any judgment or decree against them, and it is a mistake to decern against a landlord in such a summons. The purpose of calling the proprietor in such an action is that he may have an opportunity of stating any objection which he may have to the heritable creditors entering into possession of the lands and levying the rents which the action is brought to enable them to do. If the proprietor does not appear, he thereby shews that he has no objection to the rents being so levied, and not only so, but he also indicates an assent to the course of proceeding taken by the creditors. Accordingly, if the heritable creditor calls all the tenants upon the estate who, at the date of the raising of the summons, are in possession of the different farms upon the estate which is the rent producing subject, he then enters into possession of the estate to the effect of collecting the whole rents thereof. The interlocutor pronounced by Lord Lee upon 19th July 1888 decerned against the compearing tenants as at 1st May 1888, and the parties called in the action as tenants of the quarries were then in possession and liable to pay rent as at that date. Therefore the decree was complete in all respects, except in this, that as the tenants of the quarries had parted with their lease from and after the 15th April to another tenant, they could not be decerned to pay the rent at the terms after his entry, because they were not in possession thereafter. But that does not make the decree which the heritable creditors obtained the less available as giving them a title to enter into possession of the estate. A tenant who has assigned his lease cannot of course be made responsible for the rents to become due, but the tenant who takes his place becomes liable for the rents to the heritable creditor in possession just as much as he would have been bound to pay to the proprietor of the estate. If the tenant refuses to pay, it may be necessary for the heritable creditor to avail himself of his right of hypothec and to use sequestration. There is no defence here except that there is no decerniture against him personally in the action of mails and duties. But he is personally liable to the heritable creditor, and accordingly the possession of the heritable creditor is quite complete. I therefore agree that the objection is not well founded.

But there may be a doubt as to the latter part of the prayer of the petition, and I think the Sheriff-substitute has probably gone too far in giving effect to it, although it does not appear that his attention was directed to it.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor varying the interlocutor of the 26th March 1889, "to the effect of disallowing in the meantime the prayer of the petition other than that portion of it which craves for warrant to sequester and inventory: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and remit the cause to the Sheriff to proceed further therewith in terms of law."

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 131.

May 31, 1889.
Robertson's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

ROBERT TAYLOR, Petitioner.—J. C. Lorimer.

No. 132.

UNION HERITABLE SECURITIES COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Crole.

June 1, 1889.
Taylor v.
Union Heritable
Securities
Co., Limited.

Company—Bankrupt—Shareholder—Discharge on composition and reinvestiture—Liability for subsequent calls on shares.—A shareholder in a limited company, the shares of which were only partly paid up, was sequestrated, but in 1885 was discharged, on payment of a composition "of all debts and obligations contracted by him, or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration," and reinvested in his estate. The company did not claim in the sequestration. In 1887 the shareholder, for the first time, requested the company to remove his name from their register, on the ground that his estates had been sequestrated, but the company refused to do so, and subsequently made a call upon him in respect of his shares. In a petition at his instance to have his name removed from the register on the ground that the amount unpaid on his shares was a debt for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration, the Court refused the prayer.

Opinions reserved as to the respective effects of the discharge on a composition and of the reinvestiture on the liability of the shareholder for calls made subsequent to the sequestration.

On 13th March 1889 Robert Taylor, Leith, presented a petition, in 1st Division. which he prayed the Court to ordain the Union Heritable Securities Company, Limited, to remove his name from their register of members as holder of seventy-five shares (£5 each), numbered 7481-7530, and 13,214-13,238, all inclusive. M.

He stated that he had paid £1 on all the shares, and further averred;—"The company sustained heavy losses owing to the serious and long-continued depression in the value of heritable property in Scotland since 1878. Since the year 1885 the company has paid no dividend. The

No. 132.
 June 1, 1889.
 Taylor v.
 Union Heritable Securities
 Co., Limited.

estates of the petitioner were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, on 29th April 1885, and Mr Joseph Campbell Penney, C.A., Edinburgh, was duly appointed and confirmed trustee. The petitioner made a composition settlement of 5s. per £ with his creditors in terms of the Bankruptcy Statutes, and on 6th July 1885 the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles discharged him 'of all debts and obligations contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration (29th April 1885), and declared and hereby declares the sequestration to be at an end, and the bankrupt reinvested in his estate (reserving always the claims of the creditors for the composition against him and the cautioner),' conform to act and warrant of discharge herewith produced. The amount unpaid, viz., £4 per share, on the petitioner's seventy-five shares in the said company formed part of the debts and obligations contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of his sequestration, and from which he was discharged in the sequestration proceedings. Accordingly, the petitioner was and is entitled to have his name removed from the register of members of the company. On 5th May 1887 he intimated to the company that he was not a shareholder. The intimation was in the following terms:—'On looking over my papers I find the enclosed report of the directors of the above company, which I suppose was sent by you, and which should have been returned at the time, but I must have overlooked it. It has been sent to me by mistake, as I am not a shareholder.' On 11th May 1887, in reply to the secretary of the company, the petitioner wrote:—'You know quite well that my estates were sequestrated, and unless my name is taken of the register I shall apply to the Court for this purpose.' The petitioner heard nothing further from the company till March 1888 when a balance-sheet of the company was sent to him, and he replied, on 3d March 1888, 'I return herewith the balance-sheet you have sent me—evidently by mistake—as I am not a shareholder, and my name ought to have been struck off the list. I refer you to minute of 5th and 11th May last year.' Thereafter, in or about the month of June 1888, the petitioner had an interview with the secretary of the company (Mr R. A. Robertson, S.S.C.), when the latter undertook that his name should be removed from the company's register; and on 27th June 1888, the petitioner's agent (Mr P. Morrison, S.S.C.) wrote to the secretary reminding him of his undertaking and of the petitioner's former letters, but no satisfactory reply has been received. The directors have power under the company's articles to accept surrenders of shares. The directors of the company recently called a meeting of the shareholders for 11th March 1889, to consider whether a call should not be made upon the shareholders."

A call was made of £1 per share at that meeting.

The respondents answered;—"It is admitted that the petitioner had acquired on his own application, and had allotted to him, the shares mentioned in the petition on or about the dates referred to therein. He has paid £1 per share on his shares. The petitioner acquired and retained the said shares under and in terms of the memorandum and articles of association of the company—a copy of which is produced and referred to. The articles of association contain provisions for the transfer as well as for the surrender of shares. The petitioner has not, however, complied with these provisions, and he has not in terms thereof either transferred or surrendered his shares. The shares have, since he acquired them, stood in the register of shareholders in the name of the petitioner. It is admitted that the petitioner's estates were sequestrated, that a trustee was appointed, and that the petitioner was discharged upon payment of a composition and reinvested in his estates. All this took place without any intimation of any kind being sent to the company by the petitioner or the trustee on his sequestrated estates. It is denied that Mr Robertson undertook that the petitioner's name should be removed from the register of shareholders."

No. 132.

June 1, 1889.

Taylor v.

Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was provided by section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862,* that payment of calls in respect of shares in a company was a debt due by the shareholder to the company, and the liability was as much a debt due to the company whether the call was made in a winding-up or by the directors when the company was, as here, a going concern.<sup>1</sup> These shares were acquired, and all liabilities in respect of them were undertaken, prior to the sequestration. But the Sheriff had in the sequestration discharged the petitioner of "all debts and obligations contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration," and this debt of liability to pay calls was discharged as well as all the petitioner's other debts. It would be very anomalous if the petitioner's name was retained on the register when he alone among the shareholders had no liability (or at most a liability to pay in terms of the composition agreement) in regard to his shares, and it ought therefore to be removed. Further, the correspondence quoted in the petition amounted to a surrender of the shares. The petitioner might have refused to be re-invested in this portion of his estate, and though two years had elapsed between the discharge and his application to the directors he was entitled to take up that position even at so late a date, as the company was now in as good circumstances as in 1885.

Argued for the respondents;—The petitioner had stated no relevant ground for having his name removed from the register. There was no relevant averment of an agreement by the directors to accept a surrender of the shares, and, in point of fact, no such agreement was ever made. That being so, unless the shares had been transferred or forfeited, they must continue to stand in the petitioner's name, as there was no other legal method for a shareholder to get rid of his shares. No such transference or forfeiture was averred here. Whether the petitioner's name was to be removed was the only question before the Court, and there was no necessity to consider the extent of the petitioner's liability for calls.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the petitioner previous to his bankruptcy was proprietor of seventy-five shares in the Union Heritable Securities Company, Limited, numbered 7481-7530 and 13,214-13,238, all inclusive. I give the numbers to shew that there is no difficulty in identifying the shares which were his property before the sequestration, and I use the word "property" advisedly, for there is no doubt that a right to shares in a company of this sort is a right of property, and in bankruptcy is an asset of the bankrupt estate, more or less valuable doubtless, but still a right of property.

What occurred in the sequestration was this. A trustee was appointed, and after certain procedure a composition arrangement was agreed to, and carried * Section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), provides, inter alia, that "All monies payable by any member to the company in pursuance of the conditions and regulations of the company, or any of such conditions or regulations, shall be deemed to be a debt due from such member to the company, and in England and Ireland to be in the nature of a specialty debt."

<sup>1</sup> Wishart & Dalziel v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 14, 1879, 6 R. 823; Galletly's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Nov. 12, 1880, 8 R. 74.

No. 132.

June 1, 1889.
Taylor v.
Union Heritable Securities
Co., Limited.

through, and thereafter the bankrupt was discharged and reinvested in his estate. The respondents state that the sequestration, composition agreement, and reinvestiture were all unknown to them. Be that as it may, it is certain that the company never claimed in the sequestration, and they now appear as respondents in the present application.

The petitioner demands that his name shall be removed from the register of the company, but I have all along understood, and no authority has now been cited to contradict that idea, that the name of a shareholder in a joint stock company cannot be removed from the register except in terms of the statutes regulating such matters, or of some provision in the memorandum or articles of association of the company, which are made under statutory authority. Now, I know of only three ways in which a shareholder can get rid of his shares—first, by transferring them to someone else; second, by forfeiture; and, third, by the company accepting a surrender. These are all statutory proceedings, and in no other way could these shares be disposed of. The statutes do not contemplate that shares shall simply cease to exist; there may be some provision in the memorandum or articles of association contemplating such a thing, but unless that is so the shares must belong to someone. Here there is no one else except the petitioner to whom these shares can belong, and until he divests himself of them in some statutory way his name must remain on the register.

Several questions have been suggested which may arise at some future time with regard to the liability of the petitioner for calls on these shares, but those questions are not now before us. It is sufficient to say that they appear to me to raise very considerable difficulties, but the only question before us is whether the petitioner's name should be removed from the register. I think no ground has been shewn to entitle him to such an order, and therefore I am for refusing the prayer of the petition.

LORD SHAND.—I can very well see that in the future very nice and delicate questions may arise between the petitioner and the respondents in this application,—in the first place as to the extent of the petitioner's liability for calls, whether it is limited in any way by his sequestration and discharge on payment of a composition, and in the second place, whether, if there is a limit on his liability, he was not bound to make his claim to that limitation timeously. But in this petition those questions do not arise, and it would not be proper to give any opinion with regard to them, and indeed I have not formed any opinion on the matter.

On the petition as it stands I am very clear that we must refuse the prayer. The petitioner asks that his name should be removed from the register on two grounds. The first is the sequestration and the composition arrangement. If that ground were given effect to here, it would be made the ground of similar applications in numberless cases where shares were valueless, and calls were likely to be made. There are cases where shares are very valuable assets no doubt, but in many cases, as here, they are of no value and subject the holder to liability for future calls.

Mr Lorimer, however, further tried to make out that these shares had been surrendered, but a surrender is a thing to be arranged between the shareholder and the directors, and there is nothing here to shew that the directors of this company entertained any such arrangement. I agree with your Lordship that there are only three modes by which a shareholder can get rid of shares in a joint stock company, and here none of them has been adopted ; and, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that this petition must be refused.

No. 132.
June 1, 1889.
Taylor v.
Union Heritable Securities
Co., Limited.

LORD ADAM.—I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that this petition must be refused.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT refused the petition.

P. MORISON, S.S.C.—J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

REV. WILLIAM HASTIE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Party.
REV. JOHN M'MURTRIE AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

No. 133.
June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

Contract—Church—Foreign Mission of Church of Scotland—Principal of Missionary Institution—Nature of office.—On 16th April 1878 the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland (a committee appointed yearly by the General Assembly to manage the affairs of the Foreign Mission, which was supported entirely by voluntary contributions), determined to offer the post of principal of their institution at Calcutta to W. H., who was then a licentiate, "on the usual salary and allowance." The committee's minute of 8th May bore that W. H., who was present, agreed to accept office "on the terms minuted at last meeting." On 16th July the committee appointed W. H. to be principal "on the terms and under the conditions already agreed on."

Some years previous to that appointment the committee had drawn up certain regulations, which were approved by the General Assembly, in reference to the employment of missionaries in India. Under these rules the committee had power, inter alia, to dispense with the services of a missionary at any time by giving six months' notice. W. H. had a copy of these regulations in his possession, and had considered them at the date of his acceptance of office. On W. H.'s acceptance, the Presbytery of Edinburgh met, and having sustained his trials (as the minute of meeting bore), "he was . . . set apart to the office of the holy ministry and inducted to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta." After he had been principal for five years the committee decided to dispense with his further services, and recalled him, paying him six months' salary in lieu of notice.

W. H. thereafter raised an action of declarator, payment, and damages against the committee, in which he maintained that they had acted illegally in recalling him, in respect (1) that, as matter of fact, he had, before accepting office, stipulated that he should not be bound by the regulations above referred to, and (2) that, having been ordained and inducted to his office in due form by the presbytery, he held it ad vitam aut culpam. Held, after a proof (1) that the office in question was not a munus publicum, but that the pursuer's employment depended on an ordinary contract of service ; and (2) that his engagement was terminable at six months' notice by either party in terms of the regulations. The defenders were therefore assolized.

Public officer—Nature of office—Induction—Appointment ad vitam aut culpam.—Observations (per the Lord President) on the history and effect of induction to an office or cure.

Observed per the Lord President,—“The law applicable to appointments ad vitam aut culpam may be summarised thus—Either the appointment must expressly bear that the appointee is to hold his office for life, or the office must be of such a nature that a life appointment is necessarily implied. In this last class are embraced only offices of the nature of munera publica. Public officers are irremovable except for fault. Holders of benefices in the church are public officers, and these offices are munera publica.”

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

IN January 1888 the Reverend William Hastie, Edinburgh, raised an action against the Rev. John M'Murtrie, convener, and John Thomson MacLagan, secretary, as representing the committee of the Foreign Mission of the Church of Scotland, and the whole individual members thereof, in which he concluded for declarator " (first) that upon the 16th day of October 1878 the pursuer was by the Presbytery of Edinburgh ordained and set apart to the office of the holy ministry in the Church of Scotland, and inducted to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta, to which office he had been nominated and elected by the said mission committee, by which ordination and induction he became entitled to the emoluments, salary, and whole profits attached to the said office, so long as he continued to hold the same, and should not demit the said office, or be legally removed therefrom, according to the laws and constitution of the said Church of Scotland; and (second) that immediately thereafter the pursuer went to Calcutta and entered upon the discharge of the duties attaching to the said office of principal of the General Assembly's institution there, and continued in the discharge of said duties until the 15th day of December 1883, when he was wrongfully, illegally, unwarrantably, and maliciously extruded and removed from the said office, and prevented from discharging the duties thereof by the defenders, the Foreign Mission Committee aforesaid, or by representatives thereof for whom the said defenders are responsible, and that since the 15th June 1884 he has been wrongfully and illegally deprived of the emoluments, salary, and whole profits attached to his said office, in violation of the rights conferred upon him by his ordination and induction thereto as aforesaid under the laws and constitution of the said Church of Scotland"; and further concluded (third) that the defenders should be ordained to make payment of arrears of salary and for future payments thereof in all time coming during his lifetime, "or until he demits the said office, or is lawfully removed therefrom according to the laws and constitution of the said Church of Scotland; and (fifth), in any view, for payment of £7500 as damages."

The pursuer averred that in 1878, "while acting as a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, he was called and nominated to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta by the Foreign Mission Committee represented by the defenders. This call and nomination was accepted by the pursuer on the condition that he should not be bound by the special rules applied by the committee to their other missionaries. Thereafter on the motion and request of the said Foreign Mission Committee, the pursuer was taken on trials, and was ordained and set apart by the Presbytery of Edinburgh upon the 16th day of October 1878, to the office of the holy ministry in the Church of Scotland, and inducted to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta. In virtue of his ordination and induction by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, he became subject to its jurisdiction, and has remained ever since without interruption subject to its jurisdiction as a Court of the Church of Scotland. His induction to the foresaid office of principal of the General Assembly's institution in Calcutta conferred upon him a vested right to the said office, and to the emoluments, salary, and profits attached thereto, so long as he continued to hold the same and should not have demitted it or be legally removed therefrom according to the laws and constitution of the said Church of Scotland."

The defenders, in answer, referred to the minutes of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and of the Foreign Mission Committee of the General Assembly; quoad ultra denied the pursuer's averments, and stated;—"The Foreign Mission Committee merely requested the presbytery to take the pursuer on trials for ordination to the office of the ministry. The pursuer No. 133. accepted office on condition, inter alia, that he might be dismissed on six months' notice and being paid his passage to this country, and the Foreign Mission Committee had no power to make or sanction an appointment on a different tenure." June 4, 1889.

Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

The pursuer further averred ;—(Cond. 2) "The Foreign Mission Committee represented by the defenders is appointed annually by the members of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in connection with the consideration of a report of the work of Foreign Missions in India, Africa, and China. The members of this committee do not require to be members of the Assembly, or even office-bearers of the Church of Scotland. The said committee is not a Court of the Church of Scotland, and it has no statutory recognition or authority. It has no ecclesiastical jurisdiction over ordained and inducted ministers, and when the exercise of such jurisdiction was required for the pursuer's ordination and induction, application for that purpose was made by the committee to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, of which presbytery the convener and several leading members of the said committee were members. It is not a committee of members of the General Assembly, nor does it represent the Assembly as an Ecclesiastical Court constituted by law, although it contains representatives from the different presbyteries of the Church. It has not been constituted by any Act of the Assembly, but is in reality a committee of members of the Church of Scotland contributing funds for missionary enterprises, and working as a voluntary association. It receives and administers all the funds raised for missionary purposes in connection with the Church of Scotland, and disburses these funds through its treasurer, and its investments are made, and rights and securities taken, in name of the convener and secretary of said committee and their respective successors in office in trust for behoof of said committee." (Cond. 3) "The said committee when they called and nominated the pursuer to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution agreed to pay him the salary of £510 per annum, by monthly payments, being £100 more per annum than they paid to other missionaries appointed under their special rules, and in addition the said committee agreed to provide him with a house as principal of the General Assembly's institution or to pay an allowance in lieu thereof, which according to the usage at Calcutta is £100 per annum. From January 1879 to January 1881 the pursuer was duly paid his salary at the rate of £510 per annum, but in January 1881 it was increased by mutual agreement to £560 per annum, according to which agreement he has been paid up to the 15th June 1884. The agreement as to salary and allowance and the guarantee for the payment of these involved in the call and nomination of the pursuer to his office by the Foreign Mission Committee were known to the members of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, when they proceeded to ordain and induct him to the said office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta. The pursuer was also appointed by the said committee to superintend its evangelistic mission in Calcutta, in which capacity it was his duty to report upon the progress of the mission and the character and qualification of its agents generally." (Cond. 4) "The conditions upon which the pursuer held his rights as the ordained and inducted principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta were exceptional and special as regarded his relation to the Foreign Mission Committee. He was not an applicant for the office, and only agreed to accept the call of the committee on the ground of the special arrangements made for his exemption from the special rules of the committee, and for his holding his office under the same securities as apply to other ordained

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

and inducted ministers of the Church. The special rules of the Foreign Mission Committee have never been applied to the relations of the pursuer to his office, but he has continued till now under the authority and jurisdiction of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, as regards the conditions and obligations imposed upon him in connection with the duties of the said office. The pursuer was the only principal of the General Assembly's institution who was so appointed and inducted at any time to this office. The reason of this special arrangement in the case of the pursuer was the desire of the convener and Foreign Mission Committee of 1878 to secure his services. . . . It was on these grounds that the pursuer agreed to sacrifice his prospects in the Church at home, and that the special guarantee of induction as a security for his position in connection with the Church was given to him by the Presbytery of Edinburgh. During the course of these arrangements it was impressed upon the pursuer by the convener and other members of the Foreign Mission Committee that his mission was expected to be largely a work of reform, as it was known throughout the Church that the missionary efforts at Calcutta had been for a long time unsuccessful as regarded the proper purposes of the mission, and much dissatisfaction was felt throughout the Church with the mission in consequence." (Cond. 5) "Immediately after his ordination and induction as aforesaid, the pursuer proceeded to Calcutta, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his said office of principal of the General Assembly's institution there, and he remained in the discharge of these duties until the 15th day of December 1883. . . . The pursuer, on the 1st day of December 1883, to his great surprise, had intimation made to him by the Reverend William Macfarlane, an agent of the Foreign Mission Committee, that on the 6th day of November preceding the Foreign Mission Committee had passed a resolution summarily dismissing him from his office on the ground, as they alleged, that he had given unmistakeable proofs of a temper and disposition not only unsuited to the high position which he occupied, but also incompatible with the successful management of the institution, and appointing the said Reverend William Macfarlane to take charge of the management of the institution. This resolution was passed by the Foreign Mission Committee at a meeting privately held in 22 Queen Street, Edinburgh, without the knowledge of the pursuer, and without any intimation to him that such a resolution was contemplated, and it was carefully concealed from his law-agents and friends in Edinburgh, in order that he might be more taken by surprise, and prevented from taken steps to correct or resist it. On receiving this resolution, the pursuer protested against it as illegal and incompetent, and as emanating from persons who had no ecclesiastical or other jurisdiction over him; but as it became impossible for him in consequence of the said resolution to carry on the work of his office, he was compelled to desist from discharging its duties. He was forcibly extruded not only from the office but from the dwelling-house attached to the institution, which he was then occupying, and he was prevented from further discharging the duties of principal of the General Assembly's institution and superintendent of the mission there. . . ." (Cond. 8) "In consequence of the action of the Foreign Mission Committee in illegally dismissing him from his office, and in publicly maligning his character, conduct, and capacity as principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta, the pursuer has suffered greatly in his patrimonial interests, reputation, and health, and by their said unjustifiable dismissal, and their malicious conduct towards the pursuer, the committee have rendered themselves liable in reparation and damages to the pursuer. In consequence of the manner in which he has been dealt with by the members of the Foreign Mission Committee, No. 133. the pursuer has also suffered so greatly in his public character and reputation that he believes his whole prospects in life have been blasted, and he has no hope of obtaining employment at home as a minister or professor of the Church of Scotland. The damages he has thus sustained at the hands of the Foreign Mission Committee by their malicious, illegal, and unjustifiable conduct, are moderately estimated at £7500."

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been elected to the said office by the said Foreign Mission Committee, and having been ordained and inducted thereto in due and competent form according to the laws and constitution of the Church of Scotland, is entitled to declarator in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) In respect of said election and of the pursuer's ordination and induction as aforesaid, he is entitled to the salary and whole profits and emoluments of the said office and to declarator of his right thereto. (3) The pursuer neither having demitted the said office, nor being legally removed therefrom, is entitled to the salary and emoluments thereof from the date of his wrongous extrusion therefrom, as concluded for. (4) In any event the pursuer, having been wrongfully and illegally removed from the said office without notice or any just or sufficient cause, is entitled to damages with expenses as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. The Foreign Mission Committee is a mere committee of the General Assembly. (2) All parties not called. (3) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (4) The pursuer's whole material averments being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilized.

On 30th May 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) repelled the defenders' first, second, and third pleas in law, and allowed parties a proof of their averments.

The defenders reclaimed.

Thereafter when the cause came before the Inner-House the parties, by joint minute, consented to the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor "being restricted to a proof of the terms and conditions of the pursuer's appointment to the principalship" at Calcutta, "and the tenure of said appointment," and the Court accordingly affirmed the interlocutor in so far as it repelled the first and second pleas, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed, reserving to the parties their whole pleas, so far as not disposed of by this interlocutor.

Thereafter on 17th July 1888 proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, and from the oral and documentary evidence the following facts appeared:—The Foreign Missions Committee of the Church of Scotland was appointed annually by the General Assembly of the Church, their duty being to administer the scheme of the Church for sending missionaries to foreign parts (particularly to India). The scheme was carried on entirely by voluntary subscription, there being no permanent endowment of any kind belonging to the scheme or to the offices under the charge of the committee.

The following were the minutes of the Foreign Mission Committee relating to Mr Hastie's appointment:—"16th April 1878.—The convener reported his communication with the Rev. William Hastie as to accepting the office of principal of the institution at Calcutta, and it was unanimously agreed to offer Mr Hastie the appointment on the usual salary and allowance, with an additional special allowance of £100 per annum; also to make him an allowance until his departure for India at the rate of £100 per annum.

"8th May 1878.—The Rev. William Hastie, B.D., was introduced by the convener, and expressed his willingness to accept the appointment of principal of the institution at Calcutta, on the terms minuted at last meeting.

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

"4th June 1878.—Mr Hastie appeared before the committee, and stated that from the 1st of this month he has come to Edinburgh to study specially for his new appointment. It was agreed to prepare for his ordination about the beginning of October.

"16th July 1878.—The committee resumed consideration of the case of the Rev. William Hastie, B.D., and being satisfied of the ability, scholarship, and piety of Mr Hastie, and that he is qualified to advance the cause of the Lord Jesus as a missionary to the heathen, do hereby appoint him to be one of their missionaries to India, and to be principal of their institution at Calcutta, on the terms, and under the conditions already agreed to. The secretary was instructed to forward extract of this minute to the Rev. the Presbytery of Edinburgh, with the request that they would be pleased to take Mr Hastie on trials for ordination to the office of the ministry. The committee would suggest that if agreeable to the presbytery the ordination should take place within the first fortnight of October.

"19th November 1878.—The Rev. William Hastie, B.D., appointed principal of the institution at Calcutta, was introduced to the committee, and was addressed by the convener, after which he was commended in prayer, led by Mr Wilson, to the grace and guidance of God.

"Mr Hastie acknowledged receipt of the regulations for salaries, &c., and expressed his satisfaction with them. He will sail from Liverpool on 23d inst."*

It did not appear clearly from the evidence when the pursuer received a copy of the regulations referred to, but he admitted at the proof that he had seen a copy of them and considered it "before accepting the call" to go to Calcutta.

Mr Hastie deponed that at the meeting of 8th May 1878 (of which the minute has already been quoted) he stated to the members of committee present that he only accepted the office in question on certain conditions, of which the first was that he should not be bound by the special

---

* The regulations of the committee, adopted in January 1877, referred to in the last minute quoted, contained, inter alia, these rules:—

"I.—Ordained Missionaries.—Period and Terms of Engagement.

"1. Twenty-five years shall be taken as the full period of a missionary's service, at the expiry of which time his engagement ends without notice on either side. All further engagements shall be matter of special arrangement between the committee and the missionary.

"2. A missionary may resign at any time, by giving six months' notice: but if he resign within the first five years he shall, if called upon, refund the outfit and passage-money paid on his account, and shall not be entitled to a passage home. Notice of resignation by a missionary shall count from the date of his letter addressed to the Home Committee.

"3. The committee may dispense with the services of a missionary at any time, by giving six months' notice, and paying his passage if he wishes to return to this country at the close of that period.

"4. In case of immorality, or other gross misdemeanour, the committee shall have power of summary dismissal. The committee shall be sole judges of the merits of any case coming under this and the preceding rule, and their decision shall be final.

"5. The committee reserve the right of determining the place at which, and the work in which, a missionary is to be employed."

The regulations then went on to deal with the outfit and salaries, leave to Europe, payment of passage, life assurances, retiring allowances, and annuities to widows and orphans of ordained missionaries.

The General Assembly, on the report of the committee, approved "of the revised regulations for the salaries and allowances of missionaries in India."

rules applicable to the appointment of other missionaries.* The Rev. Dr No. 133.
Herdman deponed that he felt "sure that Mr Hastie did not claim to be

June 4, 1889.

Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

* Mr Hastie deponed,—“On 7th May I went to Melrose to see Dr Herdman (convener of the Foreign Mission Committee in 1878), but missed him, and on coming back to Galashiels I found a note from him asking me to meet with the committee in Edinburgh on the following day, the 8th of May. At that time I had not intimated my acceptance of the call. I went in to Edinburgh on the morning of the 8th, and had a talk with Dr Herdman in connection with the difficulties that occurred to me as to the appointment. My impression is that Dr Herdman travelled with the same train as I did, but I did not see him en route. I had a conversation with him generally as to the difficulties that I felt on the subject. It was in Edinburgh that I had that conversation with him. The conversation was with reference to this proposed appointment. I explained to him generally the difficulties that I felt in going to India. The conversation turned mainly upon the difficulty that was arising on their own side in carrying out the arrangement harmoniously, because objection was made to my appointment by Mr James Wilson, who was locum tenens of the principalship in Calcutta. The import of the conversation was that I was to shew him consideration, I think ‘tenderness’ was the word Dr Herdman used, but I said that I would use Mr Wilson with all consideration. Mr Wilson had shewn a little soreness about being superseded and at not getting a permanent appointment. I think in that conversation with Dr Herdman that morning we discussed the dangers of the climate and the difficulties of the work mainly. I afterwards went to the offices of the Church in 22 Queen Street, to meet with the committee. I remember meeting with Dr Scott, of St George’s, before the meeting. When I got in I sent for Dr Herdman, who came downstairs. I told him that I had come now prepared to accept. He then went upstairs to where I understood the committee were met, and after a time Dr Scott came down, shook hands with me, and expressed his gratification at my having resolved to accept this appointment; and then he went away. Before he went away, he said: ‘Now they are ready for you, and you can go upstairs.’ I went upstairs and found the committee met. It was a large meeting. I was introduced to them by Dr Herdman, and got a seat at his left hand at the head of the table. He turned to me and made a short address, in which he said that he hoped I was now prepared to accept of this offer—I think he said ‘call,’ but he certainly said ‘offer’—and hoped that I saw my way to undertake the duties of the office, with some other general expressions of that kind. Then I made a short statement in reply. I began by saying that they knew that I had not been an applicant for this office; that I had done nothing to bring before them any qualification which I might be supposed to have for the duties of the office; that their call had weighed with me very greatly, and that I had resolved now to accept it, but only on four conditions, which I distinctly stated. The first was that I would not be bound by the special rules applicable to the appointment of other missionaries. The second was that I should only be appointed principal of the institution and not also superintendent of the mission, as I had studied the duties involved in the former office, but did not quite understand what responsibilities were attached to the latter. The office of superintendent of the mission involves evangelistic work entirely outside the institution. The institution is a teaching establishment. The third condition was that I should not be bound by any particular period of service. The fourth was that I should be allowed to go away quietly, without any public demonstration being made about my appointment. By going away I meant going away from this country. I stated these conditions articulately, just as I am putting them now. I did make further remarks of a more general character. Dr Herdman was in the chair at the time. He demurred to one of the conditions. He said: ‘It is advisable that Mr Hastie should be the head of our mission—should be superintendent of our mission as well.’ That was all he said. I don’t think I replied anything to that; I acquiesced. I did not press my objection. Of course it was understood on my side that he laid that duty upon my head, but it did not enter

No. 133. exempted from any of the regulations" at the meeting of 8th May.* Mr MacLagan, secretary of the committee, the Rev. Mr Wilson, Mr Horatio formally into my appointment. I remember that reference was made by one of the members again to Mr Wilson's position. I cannot say which member it was, but he asked if I had been informed about Mr Wilson's feelings and views, and how I would act towards him. I replied that I had been informed, and that Dr Herdman had referred to it in his letter, and that I had promised to treat him with all forbearance and with every consideration, and that I would probably have to learn some things from him. Reference was also made as to the date when I was to leave this country. It was arranged that I should leave in the end of the year—the cold season as we call it in the East. I had with me for reference a jotting of these four conditions that I made, but I cannot say that I held it in my hand. I have not got it just now, as all my books and papers have gone smash in consequence of this business. I don't know whether that jotting exists or not. I searched for it previously to this, but not just now. It was when discussing the matter with the presbytery that I searched for it. All these matters were before me then; I searched for my papers at that stage. At that time I was not able to find that jotting. I merely mentioned the fact that I had come prepared upon those terms, and that upon those terms alone would I accept the appointment. Those conditions were the result of previous deliberate consideration on my part. Nothing else of any consequence took place at that meeting. (Q.) Did you leave that meeting on the distinct understanding that you were not to be bound by the regulations one to five? (A.) Yes. (Q.) The minute of the meeting of the 8th May is in these terms,—“The Rev. William Hastie, B.D., was introduced by the convener and expressed his willingness to accept the appointment of principal of the institution at Calcutta on the terms minuted at the last meeting?” (A.) Yes. I would only say about that minute that those terms said to be minuted at last meeting were not overtly put before me. Dr Herdman put it to me and it was on the understanding of his communication to me that I accepted these terms. The only thing noticeable about these terms is that I got a special allowance of £100. These are the only terms referred to in the minute of 8th May. But I did not refer to these terms. I laid down my conditions that I accepted. (Q.) That is to say, at that meeting you did not refer to these pecuniary terms? (A.) No. (Q.) Had you in view the rules relating to arrangements subsequent to appointment at all? (A.) These were not strongly before my mind; it was simply a question of the condition of the appointment. I resolved that I could not accept office if these were to govern my appointment. That had been a matter of conversation between me and my friends. (Q.) I notice that in these rules one of the conditions is that twenty-five years is to be taken as the full period of a missionary's service; were you prepared to bind yourself to twenty-five years' residence? (A.) No; that was the first rule which staggered me; I would not accept a definite engagement for twenty-five years. (Q.) What else in them seemed to you of the nature of what you would not accept? (A.) I objected to them all. Take the fifth rule in particular; I could never have accepted that rule. My appointment was to be principal of this institution, and I could never have accepted it under the condition that could have shifted me from that to * Dr Herdman deponed,—“(Q.) Is it the case that at the meeting of May or any subsequent meeting Mr Hastie disclaimed being bound by any of the regulations? (A.) I think not; I feel sure that he did not claim to be exempted from any of them. (Q.) If such a claim for exemption had been laid down by him as a condition of his appointment would you have taken notice of it? (A.) I was in the habit every two or three months of having to deal with the appointment of a missionary, who comes before the committee and who is sent out under these regulations. If any missionary had stipulated that he was to be exempted from the regulations it would have been such an extraordinary thing, and so utterly unequalled in the history of the committee, that it must have impressed itself upon my mind.”

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

Macrae, and others, members of the committee who were present at that meeting, all gave evidence to the like effect. No. 133.

On 16th October 1878 the Presbytery of Edinburgh met to ordain Mr Hastie preparatory to his sailing for India. The minute of meeting bore, June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

—“Mr William Hastie, B.D., delivered the discourses which had been prescribed to him as part of his trials for ordination, all of which were sustained; and the presbytery having taken a conjunct view of all his trials, and approved of the same, resolved that he should be ordained to the office of the holy ministry. Whereupon the questions appointed to be put to all ministers previous to ordination were put, and having given satisfying answers to all the same, he was, by solemn prayer and imposition of the hands of the presbytery, set apart to the office of the holy ministry, and inducted to the office of Principal of the General Assembly's Institution at Calcutta. Thereafter he subscribed the formula, and was suitably addressed by the moderator on the duties of his office.” Immediately after his ordination Mr Hastie proceeded to Calcutta, and entered on the duties of his office.

On 6th November 1883, at a meeting of the Foreign Mission Committee, a resolution was passed that Mr Hastie's “connection with this mission must immediately cease,” and instructions were given to the secretary “to arrange for the payment of Mr Hastie's salary for six months from date on which he will receive intimation of this decision.” The intimation was received by Mr Hastie on 15th December 1883, and he was paid his salary for six months from that date.

On 20th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

any other work at any time. With regard to the other rules, I may say that, although careful not to carry back my more definite feelings of late, I regarded them as rules that no ordained minister could accept, and I would not have accepted an appointment in this country, or in the Church of Scotland, with these rules. I had studied the law of the Church to some extent, and I understood that I would have been under proper professorial government, and that those rules are inconsistent with that government. (Q.) Had you clearly realised to your own mind the position of an ordained minister of the Church as contrasted with a person under those rules of a committee of the Church? (A.) Certainly, and that was the ground mainly. (Q.) That was sharply before your mind? (A.) Yes. At that meeting I led the committee as distinctly to understand as I am now stating it, that I would not submit to the latter position. I anticipated objection, but there was no objection raised. I anticipated discussion, and was prepared to have objections stated to me, and that among others. I communicated to my friends immediately afterwards that I had accepted the appointment. I stated to them that I was not bound by the rules in any way. I have throughout, from that hour to this, maintained that position. If I have used any expression inconsistent with that, it must have been inadvertently.”

* “OPINION.—I regret that there ever should have been any cause for this litigation. The pursuer of this action is, according to the evidence of all the gentlemen called as witnesses for the defence, a man of much learning and varied gifts. If he had been a priest of another communion than the Church of Scotland, or of any other Presbyterian Church, these gifts would have been utilised in a different sphere, if they had proved unsuccessful, from that where he was first planted. But the utilisation of talent in this way is not a characteristic of our Presbyterian governing bodies. When a collision comes between them and a minister, the course adopted is to cut him off, without reference to his powers of usefulness in some other department of the Church's labour. The pursuer did not seek the place of principal of the Calcutta College. He was besought by the Foreign Mission Committee to take it, and bribed to do so by an increased salary beyond that had by other missionaries and his predecessors in the Calcutta

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The first five of the regulations by which it was said he was bound had never been approved by the College. One cannot but sympathise with a man so inveigled away from the fair prospects he had of advancement in his own country, when we find him roughly turned adrift on the first collision with the Mission Committee.

"However, I am not called upon to express further any opinion upon this aspect of the case. My duty here is simply to decide in a civil action as to whether the pursuer has proved his case. The action is for damages for breach of contract, and nothing else. The defence in limine is, that there was no breach of contract, in respect that what the defenders did they were entitled to do, according to the very terms of the contract. They dismissed, or rather, to use more appropriate language, they recalled their appointment of the pursuer as principal of their institution at Calcutta, and superintendent of their mission there, holding that, according to the terms of the contract, they could do so upon giving him six months' notice. They did not give him six months' notice, but in lieu thereof they gave him six months' salary. The rule upon which they found is in the following terms :—'The committee may dispense with the services of a missionary at any time by giving six months' notice, and paying his passage if he wishes to return to this country at the close of that period.'

"Now, the question is whether such was the contract, and I am of opinion that the contract was as stated by the defenders. The pursuer has not proved to my satisfaction any special agreement with him, to the effect that he should be exempted from the rules and regulations applicable to other missionaries, and that his appointment was one ad vitam aut culpam. It would be rather a hazardous and extraordinary contract to enter into on the part of the Foreign Mission Committee to appoint any missionary ad vitam aut culpam. The labours of a missionary are in a foreign land, and under a climate somewhat obnoxious to Europeans, and no Foreign Mission Committee would in these circumstances be justified in entering into a life engagement with any missionary. Exceptions were made in two points with regard to the pursuer, on account of his energy and his abilities. He received £100 a-year more than other missionaries did, and when the physician declined to certify him as a good life, he was exempted from the obligation to insure his life for £500, which is required by the rules. But there were no further exceptions made in the pursuer's favour from the rules binding upon all missionaries. He himself admits that he had read these rules before his appointment ; and it would have been very odd if he had not. A man of the pursuer's acuteness was not the person to enter into the service of the defenders without knowing exactly what were the conditions under which he was to work. The minute of 19th November 1878, which sets forth that he had received a copy of the rules and regulations, and was satisfied therewith, truly sets forth what took place at that meeting. The result is that the defenders must be assoilzied from this action. It is true that before dispensing with the pursuer's services, the defenders did not give him six months' notice as required by the rules, but turned him out of the institution at Calcutta without any notice at all. A more gentle and a more considerate mode of treatment of the man whom they had invited to go to India might have been expected from persons in the position of members of the Committee of the Foreign Missions of the Church of Scotland. If the connection was to be broken, it might have been done in such a way as not unnecessarily to hurt the feelings of the servant who was to be dispensed with. But this is a matter also for which the law provides no redress. When a servant is entitled to notice before dismissal the obligation is complied with if the wages during the period of notice are paid ; and there is much to recommend this rule, for it frequently would be impossible to carry on the work when the servant appointed to discharge it is under notice to quit. The defenders have paid the salary for six months to the pursuer, and his passage money home from India, and having done that they have fulfilled their legal obligation.

"With reference to expenses, I am of opinion that these should be found due to neither party. The defenders set up a number of untenable preliminary pleas,

General Assembly, and were therefore not binding on him. The only regulations so approved were those relating to the "salaries and allowances," and not those relating to the "period and terms of engagement." Further, there was no reference to those five regulations in the minutes of the committee, and he had expressly stipulated that he should not be bound by them. But, even if there had been such a contract entered into as the defenders averred, i.e., a contract of service terminable at six months' notice, it would have been a pactum illicitum. The Presbytery of Edinburgh had not only ordained him, but, as they were bound to do, had inducted him to his office. But it was illegal to induct for a limited period of years, as contemplated by the first regulation, and his status was that of a minister inducted ad vitam aut culpam to a particular charge, just as much as any parish minister in this country. The General Assembly was the head and governing body of the mission in India, and he was appointed by their instruction. That being so, any undertaking on his part to remove on six months' notice was not binding. There was no such thing as ordination in the Church of Scotland unless it was coupled with appointment to a certain cure.<sup>1</sup> He did not deny that the Presbytery of Edinburgh if they proved sufficient cause might remove him from office on the ground of fault, but the presbytery could alone deal with his case. The committee ought to have gone to the presbytery and obtained his dismissal through that body. At all events, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor did not dispose of the question of damages for slander which was relevantly raised on record.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no contract entered into with Mr Hastie that he should not be subject to the usual regulations as to missionaries. The minutes made no reference to such a stipulation, and all the members present at the meeting of 8th May denied that Mr Hastie made any such statement on the subject as he stated he had. His statement was entirely uncorroborated, and if such a departure from the ordinary procedure had been made some of the members of the committee must have remembered it. The appointment could not be ad vitam aut culpam. Such appointments could only exist where it was specially stipulated that the office was to be held for life, or where the official was the holder of one of the recognised munera publica, e.g., parish ministers or parish schoolmasters. Here the pursuer held no such office. The mission work of the church was entirely carried on by voluntary subscription, and the precarious nature of the fund from which the committee paid their officials was in itself sufficient to shew that they could never appoint anyone ad vitam aut culpam. The law would impute perpetuity to an appointment, though it was not expressed in the contract, only in a very limited class of cases, where the official was in the truest sense of the word a public servant,<sup>2</sup> and in other cases the onus lay on the person averring perpetuity to prove his case.<sup>3</sup> This Mr Hastie had failed to do. The present case was analogous to the cases of Gibson and Bell, where the and my judgment repelling these was carried to the Inner-House, whose judgment also was adverse to the defenders. The pursuer has no doubt lost his case upon the proof, but he was successful on the preliminary pleas. Upon the whole matter, the justice of the case will be attained by finding neither party entitled to expenses."

<sup>1</sup> Duff v. Grant, 1799, M. 9576.

<sup>2</sup> Duff v. Grant, M. 9576; Mitchell v. School Board of Elgin, June 15, 1883, 10 R. 982.

<sup>3</sup> Gibson v. Directors of Tain Academy, March 11, 1836, 14 S. 710, Dec. 22, 1837, 14 S. 301, March 2, 1840, 1 Rob. App. Cas. 16; Bell v. Milne, June 15, 1838, 16 S. 1136, May 4, 1841, 2 Rob. App. Cas. 286.

No. 133.
 June 4, 1889.
 Hastie v.
 M'Murtrie.

institutions in question were purely private, and supported by voluntary contributions, as in this case. Here, though the institution was in connection with the Church of Scotland, the salaries were paid by voluntary subscription. The ceremony of ordination gone through by the presbytery only gave the pursuer the status of a minister, but gave him no civil rights in respect to any particular office, and "induction" added nothing to the effect of the ordination. Induction gave no right to the emoluments of a parish in Scotland; it had to be preceded, before patronage was done away with, by presentation, now by election to the cure. It was the presentation or election which gave right to the emoluments, and induction, though it necessarily followed, did not in any sense confer the right.

After the Court had intimated that they would take time to consider the cause, the pursuer tendered the following minute of amendment:—"The pursuer respectfully craves leave to amend the record in this action, so that his fourth plea in law may read as follows;—(4) In any event, the pursuer having been wrongfully and illegally removed from the said office by the defenders, and the defenders having libelled and slandered the pursuer to his loss, injury, and damage, and the sum sued for being only reasonable reparation in the premises, decree should be granted therefor, in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action for breach of contract. The defenders are the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland, who are appointed annually by the General Assembly to administer the scheme of the Church for sending missionaries to foreign countries, and more particularly to India.

The maintenance of this scheme depends entirely on voluntary contributions, the only accumulated capital possessed and administered by the committee consisting of savings of such voluntary contributions. There is nothing in the way of permanent endowment belonging to the scheme, or attached to any office or appointment under the committee.

The pursuer was appointed in 1878 by the defenders, in terms of a minute to be more particularly noticed hereafter, "to be one of their missionaries to India, and to be principal of their institution at Calcutta." On the 6th of November 1883 the defenders recalled the pursuer's appointment, giving him a half year's salary from the date of his receiving notice of his recall, which was afterwards confirmed by the General Assembly. This recall constitutes the breach of contract of which the pursuer complains in the present action.

The contract is a parole agreement. There is no document signed by the parties embodying the terms and conditions of the contract. There is no interchange of missives sufficient of themselves to constitute a contract. There are certain minutes of meetings of the defenders; but these, so far from constituting a contract, are not even admissible in evidence in such a question, until it is established either by evidence or admission that they accurately represent the res geste of the meetings of which they bear to be the minutes.

The pursuer avers that "the conditions upon which the pursuer held his rights as the ordained and inducted principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta were exceptional and special as regarded his relation to the Foreign Mission Committee. He was not an applicant for the office, and only agreed to accept the call of the committee on the ground of the special arrangements made for his exemption from the special rules of the committee, and for his holding his office under the same securities as apply to other ordained and inducted ministers of the Church."

The defenders, on the other hand, aver that "the pursuer accepted office on the condition, inter alia, that he might be dismissed on six months' notice and being paid his passage to this country, and the Foreign Mission Committee had no power to make or sanction an appointment on a different tenure." This averment is denied by the pursuer.

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

In this state of the record it was apparent that the whole dispute between the parties depended on the terms of their parole agreement. If the pursuer was appointed ad vitam aut culpam, his recall in November 1883 was unauthorised, and constituted a breach of contract. On the other hand, if he was appointed on the condition that he might be recalled by the defender at any time on six months' notice, the recall in November 1883 was within the powers of the defenders, and there is no breach of contract. The parties therefore most properly and reasonably agreed by joint minute that the proof should be "restricted to a proof of the terms and conditions of the pursuer's appointment to the principalship of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta, and the tenure of said appointment." Upon this arrangement evidence was led by both parties, and upon the concluded proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced judgment in favour of the defenders.

The pursuer contends that he was inducted into an office the natural tenure of which is ad vitam aut culpam (independently of the appointment of the defenders), by virtue of an act of ordination and induction by the Presbytery of Edinburgh. This argument I shall examine by-and-bye; but in the meantime, dealing with the agreement of parties as being truly a contract of employment, I have very little difficulty as to the import and result of the evidence. It is not seriously disputed that the minutes of the defenders as a committee accurately represent what took place (though perhaps in the pursuer's view not all that took place) at their meetings. On 16th April 1878, on the report of the convener, it was unanimously agreed "to offer Mr Hastie the appointment on the usual salary and allowance, with an additional special allowance of £100 per annum, also to make him an allowance until his departure for India at the rate of £100 per annum." The pursuer was not present at that meeting, but he attended the next, on the 8th of May, "and expressed his willingness to accept the appointment of principal of the institution at Calcutta on the terms minuted at last meeting."

Then follows on the 16th July a more formal appointment in the following terms:—"The committee resumed consideration of the case of the Rev. William Hastie, B.D., and being satisfied of the ability, scholarship, and piety of Mr Hastie, and that he is qualified to advance the cause of the Lord Jesus as a missionary to the heathen, do hereby appoint him to be one of their missionaries to India, and to be principal of their institution at Calcutta, on the terms and under the conditions already agreed to. The secretary was instructed to forward extract of this minute to the Rev. the Presbytery of Edinburgh, with the request that they would be pleased to take Mr Hastie on trials for ordination to the office of the ministry. The committee would suggest that if agreeable to the presbytery the ordination should take place within the first fortnight of October."

The bargain was thus completed so far as regards the fact of appointment and the emoluments of the pursuer. But it certainly would have been a very strange and unbusinesslike proceeding if no agreement were made as to the nature of the duties expected of the person thus appointed, and as to the length

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

of his service under the defenders. And accordingly, it now appears very clearly from the evidence that both parties had in view certain regulations adopted by the defenders so far back as January 1877 "in reference to the employment of European missionaries in India." It does not very clearly appear at what particular stage of the negotiations the pursuer was put in possession of a copy of these regulations, but he certainly had a printed copy, as he himself in his evidence states, "about the time the call was received by me, and when I was just considering the matter of accepting it, and before accepting it"; and from other parts of his evidence it appears that he studied the regulations very carefully as a matter vitally affecting his own position if he should accept the appointment offered to him.

The regulations are divided into two heads, the first applying only to "Ordained Missionaries," and the second to "European Missionaries." Under the general head of "Ordained Missionaries" the first subdivision is entitled "Period and terms of Engagement," consisting of five articles. These five articles provide in unequivocal language that the full period of a missionary's service in any case shall be twenty-five years, that a missionary may resign at any time by giving six months' notice, that "the committee may dispense with the services of a missionary at any time by giving six months' notice and paying his passage if he wishes to return to this country at the close of that period," that in cases of immorality or gross misdemeanour the committee may dismiss summarily, and that in this last case, as well as in the case of recalling on six months' notice, "the committee shall be the sole judges of the merits of any case," "and their decision shall be final." The remaining portions of the regulations have no material bearing on the present question.

Obviously, if these regulations form part of the contract between the parties, they furnish a complete and conclusive defence to this action. But the pursuer contends that he refused to be bound by these articles of the regulations, distinctly intimated his refusal to the defenders, and that they acquiesced in this arrangement. This contention is to be found not on the record, but only in his evidence as a witness, and to do full justice to the pursuer's view of this part of the case his evidence must be given in his own words. At the meeting of the 8th May when the appointment was offered to him by Dr Herdman, the convener of the committee, the pursuer says,—“Then I made a short statement in reply. I began by saying that they knew that I had not been an applicant for this office; that I had done nothing to bring before them any qualification which I might be supposed to have for the duties of the office; that their call had weighed with me very greatly, and that I had resolved now to accept it, but only on four conditions, which I distinctly stated. The first was that I would not be bound by the special rules applicable to the appointment of other missionaries. The second was that I should only be appointed principal of the institution, and not also superintendent of the mission, as I had studied the duties involved in the former office, but did not quite understand what responsibilities were attached to the latter. The office of superintendent of the mission involves evangelistic work entirely outside the institution. The institution is a teaching establishment. The third condition was that I should not be bound by any particular period of service. The fourth was that I should be allowed to go away quietly, without any public demonstration being made about my appointment. By going away I meant going away from this country. I stated these conditions articulately, just as I am putting them now. I did make further remarks of a more general character. Dr Herdman was in the chair at No. 133. the time. He demurred to one of the conditions. He said,—‘It is advisable that Mr Hastie should be the head of our mission—should be superintendent of our mission as well.’ That was all he said. I don’t think I replied anything to that; I acquiesced. I did not press my objection.” Again he states,—“I had with me for reference a jotting of these four conditions that I made, but I cannot say that I held it in my hand. I have not got it just now, as all my books and papers have gone smash in consequence of this business. I don’t know whether that jotting exists or not. I searched for it previously to this, but not just now.”

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M’Murtrie.

It is unfortunate that the pursuer did not preserve the jotting from which he spoke on the 8th of May; but this is the less to be regretted, because if it was not more definite than the account he now gives of the statement he made to the meeting, it would not much advance the decision of the question before us. He says he proposed four conditions. The first was that he was not to be bound by the special rules applicable to the appointment of other missionaries. But as these special rules comprehend the whole arrangements for salaries and allowances, which had been settled, and a variety of other matters about which apparently he was indifferent, the statement of this condition was apparently altogether wanting in point. The second, that he was to be principal of the educational institution only, and not also superintendent of the mission, he says he after some discussion abandoned. The third that he was not to be bound to any particular period of service was already secured to him in the rules to which he says he was objecting, and which provide that he may resign on six months’ notice. As regards the fourth he seems to have had his own way entirely, but whether in consequence of what passed at the meeting on 8th May or not is of no consequence.

But having thoroughly studied the regulations, if he intended to object to the power of the Mission Committee to recall him on six months’ notice, then was the time to state that objection and to protest that his appointment was to be ad vitam aut culpam; and yet there is nothing approaching to such objection and protest. Neither the power of the committee to recall nor the tenure of his office was according to his statement of the res gesta suggested to him for consideration.

Whatever may have been the impression on the pursuer’s mind when he left the meeting, the other persons present who are examined as witnesses for the defenders are quite clear that if any proposal had been made to alter the tenure of office of the pursuer, and to give him an appointment for life, or to limit the power of recall by the Foreign Mission Committee, the proposal would have been at once rejected, as one which they had no power even to consider, and that such a proposal if made would certainly have dwelt in their memory as something quite exceptional and unprecedented.

If there had been any conflicting or even ambiguous evidence to weigh or analyse I should have been inclined to attach a good deal of importance to the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary that it would be a hazardous and extraordinary contract for a Foreign Mission Committee to appoint a missionary ad vitam aut culpam. But it is unnecessary to resort to antecedent improbability when the direct evidence is so clear.

So far therefore as the appointment of the pursuer by the defenders, or more properly speaking, the contract of employment between the parties, is concerned,

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

there is no room for doubt as to the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; but the pursuer relies very confidently on what followed on his appointment by the defenders as giving him a tenure for life.

It was necessary that the pursuer should be ordained as a minister of the Church of Scotland, because he was to go to Calcutta as an "ordained missionary," and the defenders by their minute of 16th July 1878 requested the Presbytery of Edinburgh "to take Mr Hastie on trials for ordination to the office of the ministry." The Presbytery of Edinburgh took Mr Hastie on trial accordingly, and ordained him "to the office of the holy ministry"; but their minute of 16th October bears further that they "inducted him to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta." The pursuer seems to attach some mysterious importance to the term "inducted," but he has not been able to explain what precise significance he ascribes to it.

What is meant by "inducting" an ordained minister of the Church to an office? Induction is not a nomen juris, neither is it a vox signata in the existing ecclesiastical law of Scotland. By the canon law, which was the ecclesiastical law of Scotland prior to the Reformation, induction was the legal name of a ceremony by which, after collation by the bishop of the diocese, some inferior ecclesiastical persons gave the presentee actual and corporal possession of the church and benefice, under mandate from the bishop, by the use of certain symbols, which it is needless to enumerate. The ceremony was formal and imposing, and necessary to complete the presentee's title to the benefice. During the two comparatively short periods in the 17th century when the National Protestant Church of Scotland was governed by bishops, induction had again a fixed and technical meaning, and was the name for a somewhat similar ceremonial conducted under the authority of the bishop, which consisted in the inferior clergy of the diocese, after collation by the bishop, carrying the collated presentee into the church and placing him in the pulpit or some other conspicuous part of the church, and there delivering to him the keys of the church. But with the ceremony the name of induction as a nomen juris has perished. There is no use of the name in any of the numerous statutes relating to the settlement of ministers under Presbyterian Church government.

In the earliest of these statutes (1567, c. 7) it is provided "that the examination and admission of ministers be only in the power of the kirk." By the Act of 1592, c. 116, presbyteries are "bound and astricted to receive and admitt whatsumever qualified minister presented," &c. The Act of 1690 simply revived the Act of 1592. By the Act 10 Anne, c. 12, restoring patronage, the presbytery is "bound to receive and admit such qualified person or persons, minister or ministers, as shall be presented." The Aberdeen Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. c. 61), bears in its title to be an Act respecting the admission of ministers, and by section 3 presbyteries are directed to "admit and receive into the benefice." Lastly, in the Act 37 and 38 Vict. c. 82, abolishing patronage and giving the appointment of ministers to congregations, it is enacted (sec. 3) that "the Courts of the Church are hereby declared to have the right to decide finally and conclusively upon the appointment, admission, and settlement in any church and parish of any person as minister thereof." As to the form of admission to the benefice, the Church Courts are left at perfect liberty to exercise their own discretion. But it is clear that they could not use, and never have used, the old ceremonial of induction.

It may be true that the name of the old ceremony of induction still lingers in the common speech of the country, and may be used popularly even in the proceedings of Church Courts as an equivalent of "admission to a benefice." It is remarkable, however, that in the earlier authoritative or quasi-authoritative Church documents, as distinguished from Acts of Parliament, the term "induction" entirely disappeared. In the first and second Books of Discipline, in Pardovan's Collections, in Principal Hill's View of the Constitution of the Church of Scotland, "admission of ministers," and not "induction," is the phrase used. But what is the act of admitting a minister to a benefice, and what is its effect? There is no actus solemnus apart from ordination. By the imposition of the hands of the presbytery the candidate is admitted and set apart to the office of the holy ministry. If he has been already ordained the fact is minuted. What follows is not a ceremony at all, but merely a recognition of the new minister as a member of presbytery in his capacity of minister of the benefice to which he has been presented or elected.

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

If the term induction was used in a merely popular sense by the Presbytery of Edinburgh in the present case it can have no effect whatever in law, because the pursuer had not been appointed to a benefice in the church, but to an entirely precarious office, depending for its subsistence on the continuance of voluntary contributions, and from which by his contract of employment he was liable to be recalled on six months' notice. If the pursuer was to be admitted in any sense to the office of principal, one would expect that to take place at Calcutta and not in Edinburgh.

It is said that there is no ministerium vagum permitted in the Church of Scotland, and that no man can be ordained unless for the purpose of undertaking a cure. This is true with a certain qualification. The Church will not ordain any man to the ministry unless he is about to be employed in the proper work of the ministry. But the Church is in use to ordain ministers who have no endowed benefice or appointment ad vitam aut culpam, otherwise there could never have been ordained ministers in chapels of ease, and just as little could there have been ordained missionaries whose emoluments and the continuance of whose office depended on the continuance of voluntary subscriptions.

This subject is well illustrated by the recent case of MacLagan v. Brown, 14 Ret. 1083. In that case the Court held that Mr Brown when he became the ordained minister of the Chapel of Ease of St Michael's in 1881 was not admitted to a benefice, because he had no permanent endowment or fixity of tenure, but was merely employed as an ordained minister of the Church to conduct the services in a chapel which was the property of certain benevolent persons who had built it at their own expense, and who engaged to pay £150 a-year for three years to the person undertaking to conduct the services in the chapel. The Court laid it down emphatically that the relation subsisting between Mr Brown and the owners of the chapel was that of parties to a mutual contract of employment. But the chapel, with a surrounding district, was subsequently, with the consent of the proprietors of the chapel, erected into a quoad sacra church and parish under the Act 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, with a permanent endowment. Mr Brown was then no longer acting under a contract of employment, but was a beneficed clergyman of the Church of Scotland, and was then for the first time received and admitted as such by the presbytery of the bounds.

The law applicable to appointments ad vitam aut culpam may be summarised thus: Either the appointment must expressly bear that the appointee is to hold his office for life, or the office must be of such a nature that a life appointment is necessarily implied. In this last class are embraced only offices of the nature

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

of munera publica. Public officers are irremovable except for fault. Holders of benefices in the Church are public officers, and these offices are munera publica. But the pursuer's office was not of such a nature, for the reasons already fully explained.

At the conclusion of the hearing of the cause the pursuer tendered a minute of amendment, which now falls to be disposed of. It is in these terms:—"The pursuer respectfully craves leave to amend the record in this action so that his fourth plea in law may read as follows:—(4) In any event, the pursuer having been wrongfully and illegally removed from the said office by the defenders, and the defenders having libelled and slandered the pursuer to his loss, injury, and damage, and the sum sued for being only reasonable reparation in the premises, decree should be granted therefor in terms of the conclusions of the summons." This proposed new plea is based on breach of contract, and as I have already negatived that ground of action, the new plea seems necessarily to follow the fate of the pursuer's other pleas. But if it be intended by this new plea to convert the present action into an action for libel or slander on the assumption of there being no breach of contract, then it must be kept in mind that the proposal was made for the first time not only after final judgment by the Lord Ordinary, but after the argument on the reclaiming note had been completed on both sides, and the Court had intimated that they would consider the cause in private before giving judgment. In such circumstances it would not be possible to admit such an amendment in any case except under condition of the pursuer paying the whole previous expenses. But I am for refusing the amendment de plano, because I think it involves a proposal at this last stage of the process to alter entirely the nature of the action, which would, in my opinion, be an abuse of the privilege of amendment.

On the merits of the cause I propose, with your Lordships' concurrence, to refuse the reclaiming note and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD SHAND.—Having had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinion which your Lordship has now delivered, I have to express my entire concurrence in the views which your Lordship has expressed. I shall only therefore, avoiding detail, endeavour to state shortly the grounds on which I am clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed.

The pursuer's claim is rested entirely on the view that he held an appointment ad vitam aut culpam, and that consequently he could not be dismissed on six months' notice, or on payment of six months' salary. His office was that of a missionary to India and principal of the institution of the Church of Scotland at Calcutta maintained in connection with the Indian Mission by the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church.

In regard to such an appointment it is clear that the onus lies on the pursuer to instruct his averment that the person appointed has right to the office for life, for there is every presumption against the notion that the Foreign Mission Committee of any Church would give a missionary or teacher, or even the head of their institution, a life appointment, inferring continuing obligations, with a salary of considerable amount, and without any power to dispense with his services even if they found that the person appointed proved after a time to be quite unsuited to the duties required of him. The pursuer, contending against this presumption, has undertaken to shew that the defenders conferred on him a life appointment, and his whole case depends on his establishing this to be the fact. An appointment to an office for life might arise, as your Lordship has observed, in either of two ways—either because of an express contract, or because of the nature of the office itself.

No. 133.
June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

At the close of the very full argument submitted by Mr Hastie in support of his appeal against the Lord Ordinary's judgment it was by no means clear whether he maintained that there was an express contract between the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church and himself giving him an office for life. I understood that he did not contend that anything of the kind had been proved, and that he rather rested his argument on the view that life tenure was to be inferred from the nature of his office, and his induction, as it has been called, to that office by the Presbytery of Edinburgh. But whatever the argument may be, I am very clearly of opinion that on the proof there is not the smallest ground for saying that the parties—the Foreign Mission Committee on the one hand and Mr Hastie on the other—contracted that Mr Hastie should have an appointment for life. In the negotiations and arrangements for the employment of the pursuer, next to the ascertainment of the services and duties to be required of him, it was of course necessary that the salary to be paid and the period of service should be fixed. It is scarcely conceivable that an engagement could be made without having these points settled; and I think they were clearly fixed by the rules which are admittedly referred to in the minutes of the committee of 16th April 1878, which records that it was “agreed to offer Mr Hastie the appointment on the usual salary and allowance, with an additional special allowance of £100 per annum.” These rules were in the pursuer's hands and their terms were fully known to him, and it is clear that both parties contracted with reference to them. They provide in regard to ordained missionaries, of whom the pursuer was to become one, that twenty-five years should be the full period of service, at the expiry of which time the engagement should end without notice on either side; (2) that a missionary might resign on six months' notice; and (3) that the committee might dispense with the services of a missionary at any time by giving six months' notice. I have no doubt as the result of the proof that these rules were a part of the contract of service between the parties. The pursuer does not maintain that there was any special and exceptional arrangement made with him to give him an appointment for life, and it appears to be clear that the committee had no power to make any such appointment.

It remains only to consider whether there was authority in the nature of the situation or office which the pursuer accepted, or in what followed on his appointment, which could convert his service, which by contract was determinable by six months' notice on either side, into an engagement ad vitam aut culpam, and having listened patiently to the pursuer's argument I have heard no intelligible ground to support his contention. The office conferred by the committee was described as “one of their missionaries to India and principal of their institution at Calcutta”—an educational institution carried on mainly in furtherance of the mission. The appointment had nothing about it to suggest the idea of a public office—a munus publicum under the state or otherwise. The Mission of the Church to India was begun and has been carried on entirely by voluntary contributions, which might cease at any time; and the Church itself might at any time, for reasons which to it might seem good, cease to carry on the mission at all. Everything therefore in the nature of the office indicates that it must be, as in fact it was under the committee's rules, an office terminable on six months' notice on either side.

No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

But the pursuer says, though all this be true, I was inducted into my office by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and the virtue of this act or ceremony of induction was so great as to convert my office—precarious in its nature, terminable on six months' notice on either side—into an office for life, with an obligation on the Foreign Mission Committee to pay a salary of several hundreds a-year, rising with the lapse of time, for my lifetime. I confess I find it difficult to treat this argument seriously. I am unable to conceive how anything which the Presbytery of Edinburgh could possibly do could add to or alter the terms or conditions of the contract between the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church and the pursuer. It was necessary that the pursuer should resort to the presbytery for one purpose and for one purpose only—for ordination as a minister of the Church, for he could only enter on his duty under his contract after becoming an ordained missionary. Accordingly the committee requested the presbytery to take Mr Hastie on trials for ordination to the office of the ministry, and suggested that the "ordination" should take place at an early date. He was taken on trials accordingly. The questions appointed to be put to all ministers previous to ordination were put, and he was ordained in ordinary form to the office of the ministry. The minute of presbytery bears as part of it also, that he was "inducted to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta." So far as I can see, the Presbytery of Edinburgh had no warrant in the terms of the extract minutes of the Foreign Mission Committee, containing the limited request above quoted, for proceeding to induction of the pursuer to any office, and if that proceeding could have had any such marvellous effect as to convert an engagement terminable at six months' notice into an engagement for life it was clearly unauthorised, and therefore could have no such effect. The so-called induction, indeed, seems to me to have been a mistake altogether, proceeding on some supposed analogy between the case and that of a presentee to a benefice in Scotland, while there is no true analogy between the cases.

But, finally, suppose the induction to have been all regular and in order, it could never have the effect, for which the pursuer contends, of giving him his office for life. It was, in any view, besides ordination to the ministry, merely an act of recognition of his admission to his office—admission which could properly proceed only from the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church. The pursuer points to other cases of induction, to the ordinary case of a presentee before the abolition of patronage, or of a minister called or elected to a new charge under the recent statute, and because in these cases induction, it is said, gives an office ad vitam aut culpam the same result must follow in his case. For the reasons so fully stated by your Lordship I consider the term "induction" as now commonly used means admission to the office only. But the important consideration is that it is not by the admission or induction that the right to the office for life is given. That right is inherent in the nature of the office itself—a permanent charge with a right to stipend from the heritors, which is a permanent fund, and the right is conferred not by the act of the presbytery admitting to the charge, but by the presentation or the call, or election under the statute, which no doubt must receive the sanction of the presbytery—which indeed the presbytery in ordinary circumstances is bound to give. There is no analogy or similarity between such a presentation or election to a benefice of the Church and the precarious office of a missionary and principal of the Church's institution in Calcutta—precarious because there is no permanent fund like the teinds payable to the minister of a parish, for the Church's Mission Scheme to India may fail for want of the annual voluntary contributions which support it—and precarious because the parties have wisely provided by their contract that the service of the missionary and principal or teacher shall terminate by six months' notice on either side. A clergyman presented or elected to a benefice carries in his hand to the presbytery his title to a munus publicum with a right to an office ad vitam aut culpam. The pursuer had no such office, and his engagement or contract expressly excluded any such right, and so his argument on the effect of induction or admission to his office by the presbytery entirely fails. No. 133.

June 4, 1889.
Hastie v.
M'Murtrie.

It may be that the proceedings of the Foreign Mission Committee in suddenly terminating their connection with the pursuer, paying him six months' salary, was a harsh measure, or at least an act in which due consideration was not shewn towards his feelings. On the other hand, it may be that the conduct of the pursuer in the management of the mission made it necessary summarily to bring his connection with the mission to an end. Any question of this kind is not before the Court, and I have no opinion in regard to it. But one thing is to my mind abundantly clear, and that is that the Foreign Mission Committee in what they did acted entirely within their legal rights, and in the result they are therefore entitled to succeed in this action.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the pursuer, the Rev. William Hastie, against the interlocutor of Lord Fraser of date 20th July 1888, and considered the cause, adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Further, having considered the minute for the pursuer, No. 103 of process, tendered by him, at the close of the debate on the reclaiming note on 23d May 1889, craving leave to add a new plea to his summons, refuse the desire thereof: Find the pursuer liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's said interlocutor; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit," &c.

WELSH & FORBES, S.S.C.—MRNZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN STRACHAN AND OTHERS (Patrick Strachan's Trustees), First Parties. No. 134.
—Murray—W. C. Smith.

JAMES GLEN WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Murray—
W. C. Smith.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

MRS BARBARA STRACHAN OR HAYNES AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—
Gloag—Lyell.

JAMES ALEXANDER MOLLESON (William Strachan's Factor) AND ANOTHER, Fourth Parties.—Low—M'Lennan.

JOHN STRACHAN, Fifth Party.—C. S. Dickson—G. W. Burnet.

GEORGE JAMES WALKER AND OTHERS, Sixth Parties.—Gloag—Lyell.

Succession—Trust of special fund.—A testator directed his trustees to hold £60,000 of his estate in trust "as a special fund for the special use and behoof of the four daughters of my brother . . . the survivors and survivor of them severally and respectively in liferent." He directed that "the interest or annual income arising from said special fund . . . shall only be divided and annually paid over to the said four daughters, the survivors or survivor of them, share and share alike, for their personal maintenance and support allanarly, during their respective lives, . . . and that, subject to said liferent, . . . the

No. 134.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

said fund shall be held by my said trustees and executors for behoof of the respective child or children lawfully begotten of the said four daughters, or either of them, to the extent of their respective mother's share in said special fund in fee, and that immediately, and not burdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters, and failing child or children, to such person or persons, and in such way and manner, all as each daughter may direct and appoint by or in any writing under her hand, . . . and that either burdened or unburdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters as may be expressed in such writing."

The four nieces survived the testator. The eldest died unmarried, and without having executed any deed of nomination. Another niece, A, died subsequently leaving children.

In a special case held that on the death of the eldest niece the fund had been properly divided into three shares, to the liferent of one of which the surviving nieces were each entitled; and that on the death of A her children became entitled to the fee of the third which had been liferented by their mother, and that unburdened by any liferent to their surviving aunts.

2D DIVISION.
M.

PATRICK STRACHAN died on the 31st July 1872 leaving a last will and testament, by which he bequeathed his whole estate to certain trustees, whom he appointed his executors.

By article 6th of this will the testator directed his trustees, at the expiry of a certain period, to realise his securities in America and elsewhere, or otherwise to value them, and thereafter to hold the same "to the extent and value of sixty thousand pounds sterling (£60,000), or the equivalent of that sum, and as a special fund for the sole use and behoof of the four daughters of my brother George aforesaid, to wit—Jane, Barbara, Helen Patricia, and Georgina, the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike; and I further direct that when said special fund is ascertained, and secured to be of the sterling value of £60,000 sterling, or the equivalent to that sum, the same shall be held by my executors and their successors in trust for the alimentary use and behoof of the said four daughters, the survivors or survivor of them severally and respectively in liferent."

By article 7 of the deed, the testator provided,—“I further direct that the interest or annual income arising from said special fund of £60,000 sterling, or its equivalent as aforesaid, shall only be divided and annually paid over to the said four daughters, the survivors or survivor of them, share and share alike, for their personal maintenance and support allenary during their respective lives, . . . and that subject to said liferent as hereinbefore expressed, the said fund shall be held by my said trustees and executors for behoof of the respective child or children lawfully begotten of the said four daughters or either of them, to the extent of their respective mother's share in said special fund in fee, and that immediately, and not burdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters, and failing child or children, to such person or persons, and in such way and manner, all as each daughter may direct and appoint by or in any writing under her hand, however informal the same may be, and that either burdened or unburdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters as may be expressed in such writing; and I hereby further direct and give power to my executors, the survivors or survivor of them, to assume and appoint new executors to act under this my last will and testament, with the same powers, privileges, and immunities, as belong to the executors hereinafter named; and I further direct that the residue or remainder of my whole estate, when its sterling value is ascertained and secured at the period more particularly described and provided for as aforesaid, over and above the said special fund of £60,000, or the equivalent of that sum as aforesaid, shall be paid over to my nephew, John Strachan, presently a merchant in Liverpool, for his sole use and benefit.”

The testator was survived by the four nieces mentioned in article 6 of No. 134. the will.

Miss Jane Strachan, one of the nieces, died unmarried and intestate on 12th March 1881.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

The revenue of the special fund was equally divided among the four nieces until the date of death, and thereafter was divided among the three survivors.

On 21st April 1887 Mrs Georgina Strachan or Williamson, another of the nieces, died, survived by two pupil children, William Frederick Williamson and Constance Rose Williamson.

Questions having then arisen as regarded the construction of the provisions of the will, this special case was presented to the Court.

The first parties in the case were the trustees of the deceased Mr Patrick Strachan.

The second parties were the two children of the deceased Mrs Williamson and their guardians.

The third parties were the two surviving nieces, Mrs Haynes and Mrs Thackeray.

The fourth parties were the representatives of William and George Strachan, who were brothers and heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of the testator.

The fifth party was John Strachan, the testator's residuary legatee.

The sixth parties were the heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of the deceased niece Miss Jane Strachan.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were as follows:—

"(1) Are the second parties entitled to a conveyance of one-third of the said special fund of £60,000, or are they entitled to a conveyance of only one-fourth of the said fund? (2) Are the third parties entitled to the liferent of the one-fourth which was payable to Miss Jane Strachan? (3) Are the fourth parties entitled to the fee of Miss Jane Strachan's one-fourth of the trust fund, and, if so, is their right burdened with a liferent in favour of the surviving nieces of the testator? (4) Is the fifth party entitled to Miss Jane Strachan's one-fourth share of the trust fund, as residuary legatee of the testator, and, if so, is his right burdened with a liferent in favour of his sisters? Or, (5) Are the sixth parties entitled to Miss Jane Strachan's one-fourth share of the trust fund as next of kin of Miss Jane Strachan, and, if so, is the right burdened with a liferent in favour of the surviving nieces of the testator?"

Argued for the second parties;—They were entitled to get one-third share of the fee of this special fund, because the settlement gave it to them, "to the extent of their mother's share." Their mother was rightly liferented in one-third of the sum set at liberty by Miss Jane Strachan dying without issue or nomination. In the gift of income there was a gift to the survivors in the event of a niece dying without children or without disposing of her share by will. The words "severally" and "respectively" were not inconsistent with this construction.<sup>1</sup> The express power to disburden of an accrescing liferent implied such liferent where the power was not exercised.<sup>2</sup> The words "share and share alike" were merely demonstrative of the mode of distribution. Besides, in a gift of income "survivors" did not primarily mean surviving the testator. There was an express gift to the survivors in the gift of income. No such consideration existed in the case of Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, &c.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Barber v. Findlater, Feb. 6, 1835, 13 S. 422, 7 Scot. Jur. 210; Bell's Prins. sec. 1879.

<sup>2</sup> Tulloch v. Welsh, Nov. 23, 1838, 1 D. 94, 11 Scot. Jur. 80.

<sup>3</sup> Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, &c., July 16, 1886, 13 R. 1191.

No. 134.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

Argued for the third parties;—The second parties were only entitled to an immediate conveyance of a fourth of the special fund. That fourth, the liferent of which had been set free by the death of their sister Jane, fell to be paid to the third parties and the survivor of them in liferent from and after the date of the death of their sister Mrs Williamson.

Argued for the fourth parties;—(1) The fifth party (the residuary legatee) was excluded by the terms of the deed. The residuary clause was not a bequest of residue in the ordinary sense, that being a bequest of a whole estate burdened with the debts and legacies. The clause here carried only the residue (as ascertained at a particular date in a particular way), "over and above the said special fund of £60,000." The residue and the special fund were here kept just as distinct and separate as if there had been two separate trust-deeds. (2) The second, third, and sixth parties, the beneficiaries in the special provision, were equally excluded by the terms of the deed. The bequest to the truster's nieces implied merely a liferent. Though words importing a fee occurred, they were restricted to a liferent by other words in the same clause, and not as in Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay, &c.<sup>2</sup> by words in a subsequent and distinct part of the deed. This liferent was granted to the four nieces "severally and respectively," and the mention of "survivors" related only to survivance of the testator. The same considerations applied to the initial clause of the seventh trust purpose disposing of the liferent. The liferent of one-fourth vested in each of the four nieces at the testator's death, and on the death of one of the four there was no accretion. The words "share and share alike" excluded accretion.<sup>3</sup> The fee of each fourth went to the children, if any, of each of the liferentrics. If there were none, then it went to her appointee, provided she made an appointment. Failing these contingencies, it fell into intestacy. It could not be maintained that the liferent clause had a different meaning where a deceasing niece left children from what it had where she left none; and whatever its meaning was, it must apply where children were left, because the bequest to children was "subject to said liferent as hereinbefore expressed." Clearly, therefore, there was no accretion either of liferent or fee. Therefore (3) the heirs in mobilibus ab intestato of the testator were entitled to succeed. No doubt the law was unfavourable to intestacy, but where it clearly appeared that a testamentary provision had failed, and that the fund was not otherwise disposed of, intestacy was inevitable.<sup>4</sup> Here it was natural that a testator who preferred strangers appointed by the liferentrics to the fiars under the deed should similarly prefer his own next of kin.

Argued for the fifth parties;—There was no vesting of their shares in the nieces who died.<sup>5</sup> There was no accretion.<sup>6</sup> There was a presumption against intestacy.<sup>7</sup> The residuary legatee was entitled to everything which in the event turned out not to be well disposed of by the testator.<sup>8</sup>

Argued for the sixth parties;—Miss Jane Strachan's next of kin were entitled to a fourth of the special fund. A liferent with an absolute

<sup>1</sup> Storie's Trustees v. Gray and Others, May 29, 1874, 1 R. 953.

<sup>2</sup> Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay, &c., Dec. 14, 1880, 8 R. 281.

<sup>3</sup> Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, &c., 13 R. 1191, supra.

<sup>4</sup> Fulton's Trustees v. Fulton, &c., Feb. 6, 1880, 7 R. 566.

<sup>5</sup> Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, &c., Nov. 26, 1880, 8 R. 142.

<sup>6</sup> Paxton's Trustees v. Cowie, supra; Stobie's Trustees, June 27, 1888, 15 R. 340.

<sup>7</sup> Aberdein's Trustees v. Aberdein and Others, March 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 750, 42 Scot. Jur. 387.

<sup>8</sup> Jarman on Wills (4th ed.), i. 761.

power of disposal had been given to her, which was equivalent to a fee.<sup>1</sup> No. 134.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Mr Patrick Strachan by his last will and testament set apart in the hands of the executors a sum of £60,000, as a special fund for the sole use and behoof of four nieces and of “the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike,” and as regards the nieces themselves, the testator’s executors were directed to hold the money “in trust for the alimentary use and behoof of the said four daughters, the survivors or survivor of them severally and respectively in liferent.” He directed that the annual proceeds should be divided and annually paid over to the nieces, “the survivors or survivor of them, share and share alike, for their personal maintenance and support allenerly during their respective lives.” Subject to this liferent provision he directed the fund to be held for the children of the nieces “to the extent of their respective mothers’ share in fee,” and this fee on the death of the mother is declared not to be burdened with a liferent to the surviving nieces. Failing children each niece is entitled to test on her share, either with or without the burden of a liferent to the surviving sisters as she might express by any document under her hand. These are all the important parts of this deed which it is necessary to refer to in deciding this case. The testator was survived by four nieces. One of these, Jane, died in 1881, leaving no issue, and another, Georgina, died in 1887, leaving two children. The two other nieces are still alive, and have no issue.

Now, the two questions which it seems to me require to be answered here, are—(1) How is Jane’s share to be disposed of as at her death? and (2) How is the share of Georgina as at her death to be disposed of? I am of opinion that the true interpretation of the deed is, first, that on the death of Jane without issue the fund fell to be divided by three instead of by four, so that the three other sisters as surviving Jane became each entitled to the liferent of one-third of the fund. And second, that on the death of Georgina her two children became entitled to the one-third of the fund, of which their mother had enjoyed the liferent between the time of the death of Jane and her own death. This being my view, the answers I would suggest your Lordships should give to the questions will be as follows:—To the first question, that the second parties are entitled to a conveyance of one-third of the special fund; to the second question the answer will be in the negative—that they are entitled only to a liferent of one-third each of the whole fund; and the three other questions will be answered in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—One of the nieces died in 1881 eleven years after the truster and she left neither children nor nominee, to take the fee of what she liferented. The disposal of the share she had previously liferented depends upon the expression “survivors and survivor.” Did the testator mean to limit that expression to the survivors or survivor of himself, taking the period to be surviving his own life? That is the meaning which such words may bear, and most commonly do bear, it being manifest upon the face of the deed that that is the intention. But they may also mean, and frequently do mean, survivorship inter se, and if that shall appear to be according to the intention of the testator, that meaning must be attached to the words. Now, if we put that latter <sup>1</sup> Alves, &c. v. Alves, &c., March 8, 1861, 23 D. 712, 33 Scot. Jur. 354.

No. 134.

June 4, 1889.
Strachan's
Trustees v.
Williamson.

meaning upon the words here the result will be that the £15,000 which Jane liferented till her death will go to the three surviving nieces. Admittedly that would have been the case if Jane had died before the testator. I think it quite clear that this accords with the intention of the testator, for he intends only these four nieces, and their children or nominees, to participate in this trust fund, as to which they are the only beneficiaries named.

The next decesser was liferentrix of £20,000. She left children, and I think, according to the language of the deed, the fee of that £20,000 which she liferented on her death must go to her children.

If, in the future, one of the surviving daughters die without children or nominees, the survivor will liferent the £40,000, and the fee of whatever she liferents will go to her children or nominees. But if the last should leave no children or nominees, then there will be a fund liberated, and there will be no recipients according to the trust. That will be a case of resulting trust, and there will be a question whether the trustees then hold for the residuary legatee or for the next of kin.

In the meantime my opinion is, with your Lordship, that Jane's death after the testator, without children or nominees, put matters in exactly the same position as if she had predeceased the testator, and that the surviving three thus took the whole fund.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—My only doubt has been whether the terms of the deed are not such as to confer the fee of an equal share upon the nieces who survived the testator. On the whole, however, after considering the case with the benefit of your Lordship's views, I am satisfied that there are no grounds for that view, and I therefore concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first of the questions therein stated to the effect that the parties of the second part are entitled to a conveyance of one-third of the special fund of £60,000: Find it unnecessary to answer the second question: Answer the third, fourth, and fifth questions in the negative."

AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—HORNE & LYELL, W.S.—JAMES F. MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

ROBERT DICK FRASER (M'Dougall's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Darling—A. S. D. Thomson.

EDWARD GIBBON, Defender (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Baxter.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, cap. 5.—A, being indebted to B, granted along with a friend C, a promissory-note to B for the amount of the debt. Of the same date A disposed in favour of C certain heritable subjects by disposition ex facie absolute, but by back-letter declared to be in security merely of C if he should be called to pay under the promissory-note. A was sequestrated within sixty days of this transaction. The trustee in the sequestration brought a reduction of the disposition on the ground that it conferred a preference on B indirectly, in contravention of the Act 1696, cap. 5, but did not conclude for reduction of the promissory-note, nor call B as a defender. Held (diss. Lord Lee), that looking to the transaction between A and C alone there was no ground for reduction under the Act 1696, as C was not a prior creditor of A, and that as B was not called as a party to the action the transaction as a whole could not be considered. The defender was therefore assolvièd.

Observations on Miller v. Duncan, 4 S. 283, and H. L., 2 W. and S. 583.

IN March 1887 James M'Dougall, wood-merchant, Bellfield Street, No. 135. Glasgow, was indebted to Brownlee & Company, timber-merchants, Glasgow, in the sum of £701, 14s. 1d., partly on a past due bill, and partly on open account. Being pressed for payment M'Dougall, along with Edward Gibbon, timber-merchant, Glasgow, granted a promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. at three months to Brownlee & Company. This note was dated 31st March 1887. On the same day M'Dougall and Gibbon, who were proprietors of certain subjects in Springburn Road, Glasgow, equally pro indiviso, executed a disposition of these subjects in favour of Gibbon. The disposition was ex facie absolute, but Gibbon granted a back-letter, dated 1st April, which, after narrating that he had signed the promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. for M'Dougall's accommodation, and the disposition in his favour, bore, "and whereas, although the said disposition bears ex facie to be an absolute and irredeemable conveyance of the subjects therein contained, yet the same was truly granted, so far as regards the beneficial interest of the said James M'Dougall therein, to secure me, in the event of my being called upon to pay the principal sum contained in the said promissory-note, and to secure me against all sums of money advanced or lent or paid, or which may hereafter be advanced or lent or paid by me to the said James M'Dougall, or for which I may become bound on his behalf by bill, promissory-note, or otherwise," Gibbon bound himself "to reconvey to the said James M'Dougall the one-half pro indiviso of the said subjects acquired by me under the foresaid disposition, and for that purpose to grant, subscribe, and deliver to and in favour of the said James M'Dougall, at his expense, a formal reconveyance of one-half pro indiviso of said subjects, . . . but that only in the event of my being freed and relieved of all obligations entered into by me on behalf of the said James M'Dougall, and repaid all sums of money advanced or lent or paid by me to him or on his account as aforesaid."

On 23d April 1887 the estates of M'Dougall and of James M'Dougall & Son, of which he was sole partner, were sequestrated, and Robert Dick Fraser was appointed trustee.

On 31st December 1887 the trustee brought an action against Gibbon for reduction of the disposition of 31st March. There were also declaratory conclusions which it is unnecessary farther to refer to. The summons also concluded against Brownlee & Company for reduction of certain transactions between them and the bankrupts, which disputes were settled extrajudicially, and Brownlee & Company were assoilzied. The summons did not conclude for reduction of the promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d.

The pursuer after setting forth the sequestration, and the bankrupt's debt to Brownlee & Company, averred;—(Cond. 3) "The said James M'Dougall was desirous of paying up this debt to Brownlee & Company, and it is believed and averred offered to convey to them the property after mentioned in payment or security, but they, knowing him to be insolvent, and that a direct conveyance in their favour would be cut down under the Act 1696, c. 5, refused to accept a conveyance." (Cond. 4) "M'Dougall accordingly informed the said Edward Gibbon of this, and arranged with him to obtain his assistance in settling with Brownlee & Company. At this time Gibbon was perfectly well aware, and it is the fact, that M'Dougall was hopelessly insolvent. For some years prior to this period they had been intimately associated in building speculations, and, indeed, were partners or joint adventurers. One of the properties built by them at Blenheim Street and Springburn Road, Glasgow, was disposed by them in September 1885 to Brownlee & Company, in security of debts then due, and to become due by them, or either of them. Another of their properties at Avenue Street and Springburn Road was com-

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

2d DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

No. 135.
June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

pleted at Martinmas 1886, and it was arranged between them that they should grant the promissory-note after mentioned to Brownlee & Company, jointly, and that M'Dougall should convey to Gibbon his whole interest in said last-mentioned property. This arrangement was carried out."

(Cond. 5) "The pursuer believes and avers that the value of M'Dougall's interest in the said property was far more than £701, 14s. 1d., and that the said disposition was arranged for and granted in pursuance of a fraudulent and collusive scheme, between them, to defeat the just claims and debts of prior creditors of M'Dougall and his firm, by withdrawing the property from them and transferring it to Gibbon. The said disposition is struck at by, and is reducible under the Act 1696, cap. 5, and is reducible also at common law."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The disposition challenged is reducible, both at common law and under the Act 1696, c. 5, as having been made and granted, in satisfaction or security of prior debts, within sixty days of notour bankruptcy, in preference to other creditors.

There were also averments and pleas applicable to reduction under the Act 1621, cap. 18, but this ground of reduction, looking to the opinions of the Court, need not be further considered.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The said disposition, dated 31st March 1887, not being reducible, in virtue of the Statutes 1621, c. 18, and 1696, c. 5, or at common law, the present defender is entitled to be assolized.

A proof was allowed. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

On 6th August 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that the disposition called for in the summons was granted by the bankrupt, James M'Dougall, in favour of the defender, Edward Gibbon, as part of an arrangement in which the defender was participant, to enable the said James M'Dougall and Edward Gibbon to use the bankrupt's share of the subjects conveyed by said disposition as a security for a prior debt due by the said James M'Dougall to Messrs Brownlee & Company, timber-merchants, and for which the said Edward Gibbon became liable as a cautioner under the promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. then granted and payable at three months' date: Finds that the whole transaction was within sixty days of the sequestration of the said James M'Dougall's estates under the Bankrupt Statutes, and finds that the said disposition was granted, though not directly in their favour, for the further security of the said Brownlee & Company, contrary to the Act 1696, c. 5: Therefore repels the defences of the said Edward Gibbon: Reduces, declares, and decerns in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, and finds the said Edward Gibbon liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process as between him and the pursuer, and remits," &c.*

* "OPINION.—I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Miller v. Duncan (Dec. 8, 1825, 4 Sh. 283); and my opinion is that the conveyance in favour of the defender Gibbon is reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5.

"The evidence shows that the defender was jointly interested with the bankrupt, not only in the various building speculations mentioned on record, but also in sundry bill transactions between the bankrupt and Messrs Brownlee & Company of the City Saw Mills, with whom the bankrupt had dealings in connection with their building operations. In March 1887 the bankrupt was due to Brownlee & Company a sum of £701, 14s. 1d. partly on open account, and partly on a bill which became due on the 25th of that month. He was pressed for payment by Brownlee & Company; and it appears from the correspondence with Messrs Hill, No. 57 of process, that he was being pressed at the same time for payment of a debt of £2000 heritably secured over certain subjects in King Street of Glasgow. It is established by the proof that the disposition under

The defender reclaimed.<sup>1</sup>

No. 135.

reduction in this action, though ex facie absolute, was granted as part of an arrangement between the defender and the bankrupt and Messrs Brownlee & M'Dougall's Company, the object of which was to enable the bankrupt to satisfy the claims of Brownlee & Company through the intervention of the defender. This was not done by a cash payment in respect of which the defender at once extinguished the debt due to Brownlee & Company, and became himself immediately the creditor of the bankrupt, taking the disposition in question as his security. The arrangement was that as Brownlee & Company refused to be satisfied with a disposition to the Springburn Road subjects in their favour, the defender (who was joint proprietor of these subjects along with the bankrupt) should join the bankrupt in a promissory-note, payable in three months, to Brownlee & Company; and should take from the bankrupt a disposition to his pro indiviso half of the subjects 'to secure me (Edward Gibbon) in the event of my being called upon to pay the principal sum contained in the said promissory-note.' (See back-letter No. 21 of process.)

"This transaction was arranged, and the promissory-note and disposition were executed on 31st March; but the arrangement appears not to have been completed until the delivery of the promissory-note on 7th April. The disposition was delivered and recorded on 1st April, but delivery of the promissory-note to Brownlee & Company was withheld for a time, owing to the defender's desire to have an express undertaking from them that the promissory-note should be held as contingent on the security over the property being effectual. (See Messrs Brownlee, Watson, & Beckett's account, No. 33, and the letters in No. 110 of process.) But the whole transaction was within sixty days of the bankrupt's sequestration, the date of which was 23d April 1887.

"It is said that Brownlee & Company were not parties to any agreement that the promissory-note should be enforceable against the defender only in the event of the disposition in the defender's favour being effectual. This appears to be the case, although it is worthy of notice that in fact the note never has been put in force against the defender by Brownlee & Company, who have claimed in M'Dougall's sequestration without valuing the obligation of the defender, 'the bankrupt being the primary debtor in said debt.' But the material question under the Act 1696 is as to the footing on which the defender entered into the transaction with the bankrupt. This appears clearly enough from the evidence already referred to. He trusted that there would be no sequestration, but he took his chance of it. He accepted the position of becoming answerable for Brownlee & Company's debt on the security of the disposition in question. But he acknowledged that the disposition was only to secure him in the event of his being called upon to pay the promissory-note. In that event he would acquire right to Brownlee & Company's debt, and would, of course, become a creditor of the bankrupt in place of Brownlee & Company. In short, the substance of the transaction was that the disposition was given to the defender as a substitute for Brownlee & Company, and in satisfaction of or security for the debt of Brownlee & Company, which he undertook to pay, and for payment of which previously there was no security over the bankrupt's heritable estate.

"It was urged that the Act 1696 could not apply, because the defender was not a creditor before he obtained the disposition in question. If that were true, it would be a question whether the disposition was not granted contrary to the Act 1621 in favour of a conjunct and confident person, without true, just, and necessary cause, and without just price really paid. But, in the view I take of the case, it is not true that the defender, under the arrangement by which he obtained the conveyance, became creditor in a new debt. What he did was to

<sup>1</sup> Defender's Authorities.—Low v. Bell, June 12, 1827, 2 W. and S. 579; Miller v. Low, Dec. 11, 1822, 2 S. 77; Campbell v. Macgibbon, Aug. 10, 1780, M. 1139; Blackie v. Robertson, March 9, 1781, M. 887.

Pursuer's Authorities.—Carter v. Johnstone, March 5, 1887, 13 R. 698; Barbour v. Johnstone, May 30, 1823, 2 S. 351; Miller v. Duncan & Low, Dec. 8, 1825, 4 S. 283, H. L., 2 W. and S. 583.

No. 135. At advising,—

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

LORD YOUNG.—The pursuer is trustee in the sequestration of James M'Dougall, interpose himself as security for an old debt, upon obtaining a conveyance in relief which could not have been granted to the creditor directly without being struck at by the Act 1696; and I think that the conveyance is not the less struck at by the Act 1696 when granted in favour of one who so interposed. The statute expressly applies to deeds granted 'directly or indirectly' in favour of creditors. The observation of Lord Gillies in the case of Miller v. Duncan appears to be applicable to the present case with the alteration of the name. 'This was just a security for a prior debt, and it is proved that Patrick Duncan was participant in and a party to the arrangement; so that it must be set aside as to all the parties in order to do justice to the other creditors.'

"The case of Miller v. Duncan does not stand alone as an authority for setting aside a conveyance granted not to the original creditor but to one who interposes as cautioner. I think, notwithstanding the observation of Professor Bell (vol. ii. p. 227, 5th ed.), that the point was tried and decided in the case of Swinton's Creditors (M. 1181). It appears from the report that the Lord Ordinary's judgment, so far as setting aside the vendition obtained by the cautioner, was acquiesced in by the cautioner, and that it was only as regards the validity of the promissory-note in the hands of the creditor that his interlocutor was altered. But it is unnecessary in this case to decide the abstract point referred to by Professor Bell, as there is evidence that the arrangement to which the defender was a party was a device for the purpose of granting a security which could not have been granted to the original creditor, by granting it in favour of a cautioner who paid no money, but obtained the conveyance as a security against the contingency of his being called on to meet the obligation which he undertook by signing the joint promissory-note, payable at three months' date.

"The case of Spier v. Dunlop (5 Sh. 729) went even further, and sustained the application of the statute to a cash payment made to an indorser of a bill not then due as a provision for payment of the bill when it became due. I think it unnecessary, however, to proceed upon that case in deciding the present.

"I have not thought it necessary in explaining the grounds of my judgment to go over the evidence in detail. But the evidence of the bankrupt shews that he knew his difficulties, and explained them to the defender. This is not contradicted by the defender. These difficulties were such that Mr Young, on behalf of Brownlee & Company, asked to see his books, and that the defender refused to interpose his security without getting a conveyance of the Springburn Road subjects in relief. They arose not only from the pressure of Brownlee & Company, who were the principal trade creditors, but also from the pressure of an heritable creditor; and it must have been obvious to the defender, as well as to the bankrupt, that the effect of the arrangement by which he obtained a conveyance to the Springburn Road subjects was to satisfy the largest of the trade creditors in a manner which must prejudice the other creditors who held no securities, and also those heritable creditors whose securities were insufficient.

"With regard to the claims of the defender founded on his allegations in statement 3, I may explain that it was intimated on his behalf, before the commencement of the proof, that the deed was not to be maintained as a security for the sum of £269 there referred to, but only as a security for the £701, 14s. 1d.

"I was informed that the pursuer's objections to the other transactions referred to in the summons, and in articles 7, 8, and 9 of the condescendence, have been given effect to extrajudicially; and as the conclusions against Brownlee & Company have already been disposed of, in terms of the joint minute No. 7 of process, by interlocutor of 3d February 1888, the only judgment now required is upon the reductive conclusions of the summons directed against the defender Gibbon.

"Upon that point I think that the pursuer is entitled under the Act of 1696 to prevail."

wood-merchant, Glasgow, and the action contains both declaratory and reductive conclusions. The declaratory conclusions are, I think, superfluous, and had better have been omitted. The only reductive conclusion with which we have to deal regards a disposition, of date 31st March 1887, by the bankrupt of part of his property in favour of the defender, Edward Gibbon, who is now the only defender in the case. There were others, and among them Messrs Brownlee & Company, but they have been assoilzied, the case, so far as they were concerned, having been settled to the pursuer's satisfaction and theirs.

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

The disposition in question is challenged on the Act 1696, cap. 5. It is also challenged on the Act 1621, cap. 18, and at common law, but as the Lord Ordinary has decided the case only on the Act 1696, I shall confine my observations, in the first place at least, to that ground of challenge. And the disposition being on 31st March, and the sequestration of the disponent on 23d April following, the disposition is undoubtedly reducible on the Act 1696, provided the disponent received it in satisfaction or security of a debt then owing to him by the disponent. It is, however, admittedly not the fact that the disponent (the defender Gibbon) so received it. It was granted subject to a back-letter, which expresses the history of it with admitted truth, viz., that it was for the defender's security and relief of a promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. which he of the same date signed and delivered for the disponent's accommodation. This promissory-note was granted by the defender in conjunction with the bankrupt in favour of Messrs Brownlee & Company, who were at the time creditors of the bankrupt to the amount of it. It is plain—res ipsa loquitur—that Brownlee & Company were pressing their debt, which the bankrupt was unable to meet, and that the defender Gibbon was induced to join in the promissory-note to them on the condition of receiving the disposition to secure his relief.

It was contended by the pursuer that an undue preference, contrary to the Act 1696, was thus given to Brownlee & Company, and that the defender being a party to the proceeding by which they got it, thereby exposes his security to a reduction on that Act. Any creditor is entitled to demand and receive security or satisfaction from his debtor—no fraud being practised. Should the debtor become bankrupt within sixty days it will be set aside,—that is to say, he will be deprived of it, however honest he may have been in taking it, and his debtor in giving it. So here if the delivery to Brownlee & Company of this promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. was an undue preference to them for their satisfaction or security within sixty days of their debtor's bankruptcy, the pursuer is at liberty to challenge it accordingly, and if the challenge is successful, all virtue will be taken out of the disposition to the defender, which he holds only for his relief of the obligation upon him by that promissory-note, which will thereupon cease to exist.

But in the absence of Brownlee & Company, and they are not parties to the case before us, we cannot possibly hold that they received any undue preference, and, on the contrary, must assume that they not only honestly, but lawfully and regularly received the promissory-note signed by the bankrupt and the defender, and are entitled, as the holders, to enforce payment of it, or to transfer it by indorsation (which, for aught I know, they may have already done) to any other, it being a negotiable document of debt.

I must therefore deal with the case on the footing that the only defender before us is no otherwise connected with the bankrupt M'Dougall than as the grantee of the disposition in question and as an obligant on the promissory-note

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

which he gave in return, and which was the only consideration for it. The idea of satisfaction or security for prior debt is thus excluded, and with it challenge on the Act 1696. The only debt of the bankrupt to the defender was the contingent debt arising on the promissory-note, which the defender signed for his accommodation on the condition of receiving the disposition in question and delivered in return for it, and the legal aspect of the case would not, in my opinion, have been different had it been a promissory-note to the bankrupt himself or to the bearer—so that the bankrupt might use it by discounting it in a bank, or endorsing it to anyone he pleased, or holding it in his own hands. The notion of reducing the disposition and leaving the promissory-note, which was given in exchange for it, to stand as a valid document of debt against the defender, is, I think, inadmissible. If the transaction is challengeable it must, I should think, be challenged as a whole, and restoration made to both the parties to it against the obligations which it involves hinc inde.

The pursuer plainly cannot invoke the provision of the Act 1696 without referring to some creditor of the bankrupt as having received an undue advantage in preference to other creditors directly or indirectly by and through the deed which he challenges. He accordingly refers to Brownlee & Company as the creditor thus preferred. I shall return to this topic, which I notice now only to observe that it is not alleged that Gibbon, the only defender before us, is such a creditor. The disposition to him was for a consideration given at the time, and he was therefore, to use the language of Professor Bell, “in no sense a creditor at the time of entering into the transaction” in pursuance of which the disposition was given, and so not a creditor receiving satisfaction or security “in preference to other creditors.” But, to return to the reference made by the pursuer to Brownlee & Company, it is averred that the preference designed, and effected if the transaction shall be allowed to stand, was to Brownlee & Company for a prior debt due by the bankrupt to them; that Mr Gibbon was participant in this design; and that the disposition to him was, “though not directly in their favour, for the further security of the said Brownlee & Company, contrary to the Act 1696, c. 5.” I quote these words from the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor affirming the pursuer’s contention, and notice that his Lordship says in the note to his interlocutor that “the disposition was granted as part of an arrangement between the defender and the bankrupt and Messrs Brownlee & Company, the object of which was to enable the bankrupt to satisfy the claims of Brownlee & Company through the intervention of the defender”; and again,—“In short, the substance of the transaction was that the disposition was given to the defender as a substitute for Brownlee & Company and in satisfaction of or security for the debt of Brownlee & Company, which he undertook to pay.” Now, if this be all true, and the decision of the Lord Ordinary proceeds on the footing that it is, and on no other, it is, I think, clear law that the whole transaction is reducible on the Act 1696, and that Brownlee & Company cannot be permitted to retain the promissory-note for £701, 14s. 1d. which the bankrupt delivered to them signed by himself and by the defender Gibbon, a result which, as I have pointed out, would at once terminate the defender’s interest in and right or even desire to retain the disposition in question.

But can we, behind the back of Brownlee & Company, in an action to which they are not parties, affirm these alleged facts to any effect? I am humbly of opinion that we cannot, and that as we cannot it is prudent to abstain from forming, or at least expressing any opinion on the import of the evidence respecting them, which I think ought not to have been taken in the absence of Brownlee & Company.

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

It is, I think, sufficient for the decision of the case that in this action of reduction on the Act 1696 the only creditor of the bankrupt who is alleged to have received and to retain contrary to the Act a document for his satisfaction or security in preference to other creditors is not called as a defender, and that the document which he so received and retains is not challenged or sought to be reduced.

The law on the subject of a security given to a cautioner for such a debt as the Act 1696 applies to is, I think, rightly and satisfactorily stated by Professor Bell, 2 Com. 215-227. The case of Monteith v. Douglas, 12th December 1794 (Bell's Fol. Ca. 127) which he cites, distinctly supports his opinion, and it appears from a statement made in that case by the then Solicitor-General (afterwards Lord President Blair) that a corresponding question which arose in the case of Swinton's Trustees v. Sir W. Forbes, Feb. 19, 1790, M. 1181, "was not before the Court, so that no decision could be given on it, and was afterwards settled, and never received a judicial decision."

The reports of the case of Miller v. Duncan (4 S. 283, 2 W. and S. 583), both here and in the House of Lords, require examination, and I have read them carefully. In that case two actions were brought at the instance of the trustee in bankruptcy—the one against the Dundee Bank, which the creditor alleged to have been unduly favoured by the indorsation and delivery of a bill for £615, and of which reduction was asked under the Act 1696, and the other against Patrick Duncan, who had joined with the bankrupt as acceptor of the bill on receiving from the bankrupt a disposition in security for his relief, of which reduction was asked under the Act 1696.

The Court of Session pronounced decree of reduction in both actions, and ordained the bank to deliver up the bill to the trustee. Now, this was in accordance with the law as stated by Professor Bell, and the opinion which I have expressed—assuming the facts to be as found by Lord Eldin, whose interlocutor was affirmed—viz.,—"That the bond and disposition in security was granted in pursuance of a collusive plan to which Patrick Duncan was a party, intended for the purpose of giving a partial preference to the Dundee Bank to the prejudice of the other creditors of James Duncan at a time when he was insolvent, and in bankrupt circumstances, and within sixty days of the sequestration of his estate." Now, this judgment—reducing the disposition to Patrick Duncan—was not appealed, or the action in which it was pronounced ever before the House of Lords in any way. The two actions appealed (apparently by two appeals), were—1st, that in which decree was pronounced reducing the indorsation to the bank of the bill for £615 and ordering its delivery to the trustee; and 2d, a Sheriff Court action by the bank on this bill directed against Patrick Duncan, in which, reversing the judgment of the Sheriff, the Court of Session assoilzied the defender. In the first of these appeals Patrick Duncan was not a party, while the trustee in the bankruptcy was no party to the second. Both appeals appear to have been heard and decided in the House of Lords indeed, but by the then Chief Baron—Sir William Alexander. The result was that in the first appeal—that against the reduction of the indorsation of the bill, and order to deliver it to the trustee—the decree was affirmed, except in so far as the bill was thereby ordered to be delivered up; and in the second—the decree of absolvitor was

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

reversed with a declaration that the bank were at liberty to sue on the bill—"forasmuch as it does not appear either by admission or evidence that the cashier of the Dundee Banking Company, or any other person authorised on their behalf, did concert with James Duncan (the bankrupt), or the said Patrick Duncan, that the said James should give to the said Patrick the heritable security mentioned in the proceedings in consideration of his the said Patrick's accepting the bill of exchange for £615 in question." I notice that the Chief Baron pointedly asked the question—"Have we before us the question as to the heritable bond, except in so far as it may be used in argument," and was of course answered in the negative.

I cannot regard this as an authority adverse to the statement of the law by Mr Bell in his Commentaries, or to the decision in the case of Monteith v. Douglas, or to the legal views which I have expressed in this case. I rather incline to think that the Chief Baron, holding the views in point of fact which are expressed in the judgment of the House of Lords (and which contrast strikingly with those of the Lord Ordinary in this case), would have set aside the reduction of the bond and disposition in security as well as the indorsation of the bill, had the question as to its validity been before him.

I have only to say further that I think the pursuer has no case either on the Act 1621 or at common law.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I remain of opinion that the disposition in question was granted by the bankrupt as part of an arrangement to which the defender Gibbon was a party, and the effect and purpose of which was to give a security to Brownlee & Company, in preference to other creditors; and I still think that the security is struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.

It does not affect my opinion that the security was not granted directly to Brownlee & Company, but was granted to Gibbon, in consideration of his becoming liable along with the bankrupt for the debt due by him to Brownlee & Company. For I consider it clear that the debt which was being secured was Brownlee & Company's debt, and that Gibbon was aware that the security was conveyed to him to enable him to pay Brownlee & Company.

I think it unnecessary under the statute to make out fraudulent collusion. The statute was not required to cut down fraudulent transactions. The question is, in my opinion, whether such an arrangement entered into for the purpose of defeating the statute, though in the belief that it was a legitimate mode of doing so, is struck at; and this is the question which I think must be answered in the affirmative.

I accept the law as stated by Professor Bell (5th ed. vol. ii. p. 226), "where the security is granted, not to the creditor in a prior debt, but to a cautioner who becomes bound to that creditor, it would appear that whenever the creditors" (or trustee) "cannot establish that there was a device to defeat the statute, and in which the cautioner is participant, or at least of which he has notice, they will not succeed against the cautioner."

I cannot regard the case of Monteith's Trustees v. Douglas (Bell's Folio Cases, 127), as having settled the law otherwise. That case has never been so regarded. It was not so regarded in the case of Miller v. Duncan & Low (4 Shaw's Rep. 282), and I think that it proceeded upon an erroneous view of the case of Swinton's Trustees v. Sir William Forbes & Co., which is reported in Morrison's No. 135. Dict. p. 1181, as having turned on the question whether there had been any concert for giving a preference, not whether there had been any fraudulent concert to that effect. June 4, 1889.

M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

The judgment of the Court in Miller v. Duncan & Low, setting aside the heritable security granted to the cautioner, was not appealed; and I find nothing in the report of the proceedings in the appeal relating to the bills which should suggest that the learned Chief Baron who heard that appeal gave any opinion against the soundness of the decision of the Court of Session in the case which was not before him.

The question then is, was there any concert in this case between the parties for the purpose of giving a preference to Brownlee & Company? According to my view of the evidence, the proof on this subject is clear. The evidence of M'Dougall, and Gibbon, and Young, as well as the documents, and particularly the entries in the agent's accounts, shew that Gibbon knew the involved position of the bankrupt's affairs, and obtained the disposition in question to enable him to meet the promissory-note, in the event of his being called on to pay it. He even asked a promise that the promissory-note should not be put in force in the event of the disposition proving invalid. No doubt Brownlee & Company declined to give such an undertaking. But the fact that it was asked proves Gibbon's view of the transaction, and his knowledge that he was receiving this disposition to enable him to give on behalf of M'Dougall a preference to Brownlee & Company.

On the whole, therefore, my opinion is that the Statute of 1696 applies to this disposition, because it applies to any deed granted by a bankrupt for the satisfaction or further security of a creditor, if it be, directly or indirectly, in preference to other creditors, and within sixty days of bankruptcy.

With regard to the question as to Brownlee & Company's claim upon the promissory-note, I assume that Gibbon will be liable to pay it. He will thereby acquire right to Brownlee & Company's debt. But the fact that reduction of his security will have the effect of leaving him without any further security than could have been given to Brownlee & Company is, in my opinion, no reason why he should be allowed, contrary to the statute, to retain M'Dougall's property conveyed to him within sixty days of bankruptcy for the purpose of securing or enabling him to pay Brownlee & Company's debt.

It is said that Brownlee & Company were absent, and that we cannot decide in their absence that this was a preference. I notice that there is no such plea on record, and I think this not surprising. For in point of fact Brownlee & Company were called, and all we know of their absolvitor and absence is that it was in respect of a minute in which they concurred in stating that they had "acceded to the pursuer's claims as contained in the said summons." My opinion, however, is that the pursuer was entitled to challenge the only deed granted to the prejudice of the bankrupt estate, and if that deed be bad on the ground I have stated I think it can afford no defence to Gibbon that Brownlee & Company were not called, and that Gibbon has not attempted to reduce his promissory-note, or to make such reduction a condition of this action being entertained.

Gibbon's plea has been that the transaction was novum debitum, and I think that plea is not well founded upon the facts.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The bankruptcy to which this case relates took place

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

upon the 23d April 1887, and it is undoubted that the whole transaction by which the defender joined with the bankrupt in granting a promissory-note to Brownlee & Company—thus accommodating the bankrupt—and received a disposition to the bankrupt's pro indiviso share of certain heritable subjects, to secure him for his risk in giving the accommodation, took place within the sixty days preceding the bankrupt's sequestration.

It is also quite certain that the defender Gibbon had no interest or advantage to gain in the way of securing debt due by thus mixing himself up with the bankrupt's obligations. He was not a creditor of the bankrupt, and it is not alleged that prior to the sixty days before the sequestration Gibbon and the bankrupt stood to one another directly or indirectly in the relation of creditor and debtor. The transaction into which the defender entered was not one by which he, being then a creditor, sought to obtain a preference over the other existing creditors of the bankrupt for a debt due. What he did was to bring himself under obligation to a firm who were creditors of the bankrupt by becoming joint obligant in a promissory-note, and in respect of his doing so securing himself, if he should be called on to pay the amount or any part of the amount in the promissory-note to the bankrupt's creditor, by taking a disposition to the bankrupt's share of heritable subjects.

It appears that the defender was anxious to obtain from the bankrupt's creditor an undertaking that the promissory-note was to be held as contingent upon the security over the property being effectual. Ultimately the defender did not withhold the note, but delivered it, and, as it is described in the lawyer's account, left himself in the creditors' (Messrs Brownlee's) hands. Thus, Brownlee & Company were no parties to any arrangement by which the promissory-note was to be held by them on any other footing than the ordinary one as regards enforcement of it against the obligants whose names were attached. There was thus, in my opinion, no collusive arrangement, no concert to give a preference in favour of a prior creditor.

The real question in this case is, whether the words of the Statute of 1696 apply, and whether the transaction which the defender Gibbon desires to uphold must be cut down, as being directly or indirectly a preference to a prior creditor, in fraud of the interests of the other creditors of the bankrupt.

I am unable to see how, in a question solely between Gibbon and the pursuer, it can be held that the granting of a disposition of the heritable property in question to Gibbon, subject to a back-letter, can be held to be a preference given to a prior creditor. It is only when the transaction with Brownlee & Company, by which they received from the bankrupt the promissory-note for £701 with Gibbon's indorsation upon it, is introduced into the inquiry, that any question of preference to a prior creditor can arise. Brownlee & Company were undoubtedly creditors of the bankrupt prior to the time when the sixty days preceding bankruptcy began to run. It is a question which does not arise here whether the granting of this promissory-note is open to attack under the Act, on the ground that the delivery of that note to Brownlee & Company placed them in a position of preference. This may or may not be, but there is nothing of the nature of preference apart from the promissory-note. For the disposition which Gibbon received had no force or effect independently of the promissory-note. For unless Gibbon was compelled to pay the sum in the note he was debarred by the back-letter he had granted from obtaining any benefit by the disposition. If the note can be challenged as an illegal preference, the whole virtue—as Lord Young has expressed it—is taken out of the disposition which the pursuer is attacking, and it falls as a matter of course. The defender has no interest to maintain it.

No. 135.

June 4, 1889.
M'Dougall's
Trustee v.
Gibbon.

Now, we have no parties before us but the pursuer and Gibbon. There can, therefore, be no challenge of the validity of the note. Gibbon's position is that not being a creditor he exchanged his obligation on the note for a disposition of property. There was in this no giving by the bankrupt of satisfaction for a prior debt. He owed Gibbon nothing. Gibbon's right to demand anything depended upon his being called on to pay the sum in the note. The debt was not existing but contingent. If M'Dougall succeeded in retiring the note with his own funds all right in Gibbon ceased, and under the back-letter he would have been compelled to reconvey. The whole case, therefore, turns upon the note—not upon who is the debtor in the note, but upon who is the creditor in the note. The pursuer has clearly no case unless he can establish that he is suing someone who at the time of the transaction challenged was already a creditor of the bankrupt, and was by the transaction receiving “satisfaction or security” for his debt in preference to other creditors. But is there here any such creditor? I think it is clear that there is not. And if there is no such creditor here we have no basis for the application of the Act of 1696. To deal with the disposition to Gibbon by reduction, apart from the counterpart of the transaction in the promissory-note, would be, in my judgment, unjust in itself, and would be applying the Act of 1696 to a case to which it has no application.

On these grounds I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Young, and have only to add, that I also concur in his views upon the cases referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note, and in the opinion that the pursuers have no case here either at common law or upon the Act of 1621.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

W. ELLIOT ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

MRS JANET REID (Reid's Executrix), Pursuer (Respondent).—

Salvesen—A. S. D. Thomson.

JOHN SOMERVILLE & COMPANY AND R. B. M'CAIG, Defenders (Reclaimers).

—H. Johnston—Wilson.

No. 136.

June 6, 1889.
Reid v. Somerville & Co.

Cessio—Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 9—Decree of cessio in debtor's absence.—The Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, enacts, by section 9, that “if the debtor fail to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum at any meeting to which he has been cited, and if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may, in the debtor's absence, pronounce decree of cessio bonorum.”

In a creditor's petition for cessio the debtor was cited to appear for examination on 28th February 1888. At the diet the Sheriff, on the petitioning creditor's motion, adjourned the diet to 16th March 1888, “in respect that there was a prospect of an arrangement being come to.” The debtor was not present at the diet, and the adjourned diet was not intimated to him. Disputes having arisen as to a trust-deed, the creditor at the adjourned diet moved the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio, and the Sheriff, “in respect of no appearance by or for the defender,” granted decree. Held that as notice of the diet had not been given to the debtor, the decree was disconform to the statute, and fell to be reduced.

JOHN REID, wine and spirit-dealer, Barachnie, Lanarkshire, raised an 2D DIVISION. action against John Somerville & Company, wine-merchants, Leith, and R. B. M'Caig, accountant, Glasgow, for reduction of a decree of cessio

Ld. Wellwood.
M.

No. 136. pronounced against him by the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Airdrie, on 16th March 1888, in a petition at the instance of the defenders Somerville & Company. The other defender was the trustee appointed in the decree.

June 6, 1889.
Reid v. Somerville & Co.

Reid died during the dependence of the action, and it was afterwards insisted in by his widow and executrix-nominate.

More than one ground of reduction was alleged. The only objection, however, to the decree which required the consideration of the Court was the objection that the debtor, Reid, had not had due notice of the diet at which the decree was granted.

The facts as disclosed by a proof were as follow: The petition for cessio was presented by the defenders Somerville & Company at Airdrie on 8th February 1888. The defender M'Caig was acting for them, and had instructed the presentation of the petition.

On 10th February the Sheriff-substitute (Mair) made the usual first order in a petition for cessio, by which, inter alia, the debtor was ordained to appear for examination on 28th February 1888. Reid was cited to attend the diet.

On 28th February 1888, "on the craving of the petitioners and in respect that there is a prospect of an arrangement being come to with the debtor, and no opposition being made to the craving of the petitioners," the Sheriff-substitute continued the diet till 16th March 1888.

Reid was not present on 28th February, and the new diet for 16th March was not intimated to him.

In consequence of a dispute as to a trust-deed which Reid had granted, M'Caig determined that it would be better to proceed with the cessio. He therefore attended before the Sheriff on 16th March, and a motion was made on his behalf that decree of cessio should be granted, and that he should be appointed trustee. On that motion the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor, which was that brought under reduction:—"The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of no appearance by or for the defender, decerns the debtor, John Reid, to execute a disposition omnium bonorum to and in favour of Robert Burns M'Caig, accountant, Glasgow, who is hereby appointed trustee for behoof of the creditors of said debtor: Dispenses with the trustee finding caution hoc statu: Finds the pursuers entitled, out of the first and readiest of the debtor's funds, to the expenses of this process. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The procedure in said petition of cessio having been illegal and disconform to the Cessio Acts and relative Acts of Sederunt, the said decree should be reduced in terms of the conclusions.*

The defenders pleaded;—The decree of cessio being legal and valid, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the debate, together with the proof and process, in respect the late John Reid was not duly cited to the diet at which the decree of cessio under reduction was pronounced, and that no intimation of the said diet was made to him, finds, in the circumstances, that the said decree is reducible at the instance of his widow and executrix, the present pursuer: Therefore reduces, decerns, and declares, in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

---

* The Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), enacts, sec. 9,—“If the debtor fail to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum at any meeting to which he has been cited, and if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may, in the debtor's absence, pronounce decree of cessio bonorum.”

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The debtor had been cited to the meeting of 28th February. A citation to a Court was “with continuation of days.” It was for the debtor, not having appeared at the meeting of 28th February, to ascertain what was done. If so, he would have learned that the Sheriff had merely adjourned his examination till 16th March. It was unnecessary to give him notice of a mere adjournment.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—My opinion is quite clear and distinct as to the intention of this clause 9 of the Act. Its purpose is to provide a very sharp remedy against contumacious absentees, and it is quite general in that view of it. It is in these words,—“If the debtor fail to appear in obedience to the citation under a process of cessio bonorum, at any meeting to which he has been cited, and if the Sheriff shall be satisfied that such failure is wilful, he may, in the debtor's absence, pronounce decree of cessio bonorum.” This is with a view to the punishment of debtors who have been cited to attend meetings contumaciously absenting themselves. There must be citation to a meeting, or the clause has no application, and there must be no excuse for the failure to attend. The Sheriff must be satisfied that it is wilful, and in that case he may decline to adjourn the meeting, and grant decree of cessio at once, but there must be a meeting to which the debtor has been cited, and he must be contumaciously absent to warrant the decree of cessio at that meeting. I do not think that can be predicated of the meeting of 16th March. It is not such a meeting as this clause provides for. The debtor was not cited, and there was nothing to indicate that he was contumaciously absent. I think the whole proceedings are inept, and ought to be set aside accordingly.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think it would be very advisable that if a decree of cessio is pronounced in absence, the fact that the debtor is wilfully absent should be distinctly ascertained before decree is given.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is necessary to state that this is a statute which requires to be carefully complied with. Cessio is nothing else than diligence.

LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

STURBOOK & GRAHAM, W.S.—JAMES COUTTS, S.S.C.—Agents.

ARTHUR DELANEY.—James Clark.

JAMES COLSTON AND OTHERS (Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge).—J. C. Lorimer.

No. 137.

Parent and Child—Custody of children—Charitable institution—Responsibility of directors.—Prior to 1884 S. established and managed a home for destitute children in Edinburgh.

In December 1882 a man applied to have his three children (all under five years of age) admitted to the home, and agreed to pay for their board at the rate of 2s. 6d. per week. The children were admitted, and he made payments to account of board down to June 1883, but not thereafter.

In May 1884 S. appointed a board of directors.

In May 1886 S. removed the children, without their father's consent, to a home she had established in Nova Scotia. The father having applied to the directors to have his children restored, S., at the request of the directors,

June 7, 1889.

Delaney v. Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge.

No. 137. brought the children to Edinburgh in November 1886, and this fact was intimated to the father, but neither he nor the directors took any proceedings to obtain the custody of the children. S., who had concealed the children's address from the directors and from their father, again removed the children to Nova Scotia.

June 7, 1889.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

In June 1888 the father presented a petition against S. and the directors of the home, praying to have the respondents ordained to restore the children to him. The directors maintained that they were not responsible for the delivery of the children, in respect (1) that they were not parties to their removal, and had never had them in their custody since; and (2) that they had intimated to the father the return of the children to this country in order that he might recover them if he wished to do so.

The Court, holding that the directors of the home had, by accepting office in 1884, become responsible for the custody of the children, pronounced an order ordaining them and S. to deliver the children to their father.

1st Division.
M.

In December 1882 Arthur Delaney, painter, applied to Miss Stirling, the founder and honorary superintendent of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, to have his three children (the eldest of whom was four years old) admitted into the Home at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, stating as his reason that their mother had died, and that it was impossible for him to look after them. They were admitted, and he agreed to pay for their board at the rate of 2s. 6d. each per week. He made some payments on account of board, but these appeared to have entirely ceased after June 1883.

In June 1888 Delaney presented a petition against Miss Stirling and the directors of the Refuge to the Court, praying that they should be ordained to deliver his children to him.

Mr James Colston and certain other directors, who alone appeared, stated that Miss Stirling had given up her house near Edinburgh, and had now taken up her residence permanently in Nova Scotia. With reference to the children they stated,—“(2) The object in Miss Stirling's acquiring her said property in Nova Scotia was that it might be a temporary home where she could maintain destitute and neglected children sent out from this country until they are placed in suitable homes in Nova Scotia, and through her means a considerable number of such children have been relieved and provided for, who have now a prospect of comfort and usefulness in that country. Of the petitioner's said children, one was taken by Miss Stirling to Nova Scotia in May 1886, and the other two in August of the same year—that is, after they had been for three and a-half or four years entirely neglected and deserted by their father. (3) In the end of the year 1886 the petitioner, through a law-agent, applied to the respondents for the children's address, which was at once given to him. He thereafter threatened proceedings for the return of the children. Shortly afterwards, and in order to save any trouble, the respondents communicated with Miss Stirling, recommending her to bring the children back to this country on her return. Miss Stirling, acting on this advice, brought back the children with herself, in November 1886, and the respondents believe she then took them to her private residence, which was then at Merleton, Wardie, near Edinburgh. Miss Stirling, however, never restored the said children to any of the homes under the management of the respondents, and she never informed them, and they do not know, how the said children were disposed of. The petitioner was aware, through information given to his agent by the agent for the respondents, that the children had been brought back to this country, and he made no effort to communicate with them or to obtain their custody. The law-agent who represented the petitioner intimated to the respondents that he had resolved not to take any proceedings such as had been threatened. In these circumstances, the respondents submit that the petitioner, by deserting his children for four years, was himself entirely to blame for their having been taken to Nova Scotia, and further, that he is to blame for not asking the said children to be returned to him when they were brought back to this country. The respondents further submit that they did everything in their power to meet any reasonable desire on the part of the father of the children, by advising Miss Stirling to bring them back to this country as aforesaid. The present respondents have ceased to have any responsibility for the said children, and they have no control over their custody."

No. 137.

June 7, 1889.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

Proof was led which bore out the statements made in the answers above quoted, and from which it appeared that the directors of the institution were first appointed in May 1884, that there were at one time a number of homes in connection with it, and that the charge and superintendence of these was to a large extent left to Miss Stirling prior to her resignation in 1887.* It was shewn that the children had been brought back from * Mr Colston, the chairman of the board of directors, deponed,—“I am one of the directors of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge. I became chairman of the board of directors in 1884. Prior to that I was president of the committee of advice. Miss Stirling managed the whole establishment on her own account, but she desired the advice of friends occasionally, and I was one of those who acted as advisers. There had been no report published prior to 1884, and no list of directors. There was no board of directors prior to 1884. After that there were meetings of directors, and minutes were kept. The directors are in charge of the homes now, and have been since Miss Stirling resigned in the end of 1887. The directors did not manage the homes as they do now prior to Miss Stirling's giving up responsibility; it was Miss Stirling who managed them then. She was also the largest contributor to the funds, and I think the directors felt a diffidence in interfering owing to that fact. She contributed the greater part of the money expended.

The directors have never had anything to do with the management of the Nova Scotia farm, nor with sending out children to it. We knew that Miss Stirling was occasionally taking young people out, but we had nothing to do with selecting them. When children are sent abroad now it is under the directors' charge. I first heard about Delaney when Mr Considine" (who was Delaney's agent at that time) "threatened us with an action, towards the end of 1886. I had an interview with Mr Considine along with Mr Gray, and I stated that I had not the slightest objection to giving the children back. In pursuance of that view, a cable message was sent to Miss Stirling. I promised to Mr Considine that I would urge on Miss Stirling to bring the children back to Scotland. In November of the same year I heard from the secretary that the children had been brought back, and Mr Considine was informed of that fact. Miss Stirling refused to give up the children; she thought they were her property, and refused to give them up unless the law compelled her. The directors did not concur in her view. She refused to tell us where they were. The directors did everything they could to get Miss Stirling to give up the children, except bringing an action against her. The children were in Nova Scotia under Miss Stirling's care, and we induced her to bring them back, and having communicated to Mr Considine the fact that they were back, we expected he would look after them. They did not return to our home, and were not under our care. I don't know what was done with them when they were brought home: there is nothing in the books about them. We have no information about them except what is contained in Miss Stirling's recent letters to Mr Macdonald and Mr Gray. We have been all along, and are now, quite willing that the children should be restored to their father: we have no desire to have any litigation on the subject." Cross.—“The functions of the committee prior to 1884 were simply to assist a benevolent lady who desired to do good. I was president of the institution. The institution consisted of the

No. 137. Nova Scotia at the instance of the directors in November 1886, but that since the secretary of the institution had parted from Miss Stirling and them at the Caledonian Railway Station at that time, when he saw them into a cab, he had known nothing of their whereabouts. It was proved that the petitioner had thereafter unsuccessfully made every effort to ascertain where his children were. Letters were produced from Miss Stirling in Nova Scotia, the last dated 5th February 1889, in which she declined to give the directors the addresses of the children.

June 7, 1889.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

After counsel had been heard upon the proof, and before the case was advised, the respondents lodged the following minute:—"Lorimer, for the compearing respondents, stated that, in consequence of the expression of opinion by the Court that the prayer of the petition could not be refused, the respondents undertake to apply forthwith to Miss Stirling for the return of the children to them, and, if necessary, to take proceedings in the Canadian Courts for that purpose; and they crave that in the meantime any judgment pronounced by the Court should be limited to the first finding in the prayer of the petition, namely, that the petitioner is entitled to the custody of his children."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—When the petitioner applied in the month of December 1882 to have his children received into what is called the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, in point of fact the children were received by Miss Stirling, and it does not appear that anybody else was responsible for the custody of the children at that time except Miss Stirling. But it must be quite clear, I think, that when the respondents became directors of this institution in the year 1884 they assumed a responsibility for the safe custody of all the children that were in these homes or in other places belonging to the institution. And among other obligations and responsibilities which they thus incurred by homes kept through Miss Stirling's benevolence, in which she was assisted by a good many ladies and gentlemen as advisers. My functions as chairman were just the ordinary functions of a chairman. I had no further duty. I should say Miss Stirling's contributions to the funds were five times as much as those of the general public. (Q.) When you heard that Delaney's children were in this country, why didn't you obtain from Miss Stirling information as to where they were? (A.) One man may take a horse to the water, but ten cannot make him drink. I don't consider that we were called upon to bring an action against her: we had brought the children within the forum of this Court, and Mr Considine knew Miss Stirling's residence at Merleton, Wardie. Mr Considine was told that the children were with Miss Stirling. She admitted that she had brought the children to this country. I did not consider it my duty to resign because Miss Stirling refused to give up the children."

A minute was lodged for the compearing respondents, which contained this statement:—"In the year 1884 a report was prepared and issued by Miss Stirling, titled 'Sixth and Seventh Annual Report, from January 1883 to January 31, 1884, of the Stockbridge Day Nursery and Infant Home.' It embraced the years 1882 and 1883, but there is no trace of any prior reports. It contains a 'List of office-bearers' for the future administration of the charity, including a president and seven directors. Miss Stirling's name is entered as 'Founder and Hon. Secretary.' The minutes of first meeting of the directors, which was written by Miss Stirling, is dated 1st May 1884.

"In the year 1885 a statement by the directors was issued, containing a history of the work of Miss Stirling. The directors therein announced that in future the movement should be known as 'The Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge for the Protection of Children.' In the years 1886, 1887, 1888, and 1889, annual reports were issued by the directors, containing a financial statement for the year."

becoming directors was the obligation to redeliver the children to their parents when they were demanded. Now, in point of fact, these children were taken out of the jurisdiction of this Court and out of the United Kingdom in 1886, and that was certainly a most indefensible proceeding. Nothing could justify that without the consent of the parents. The respondents, the directors of the institution, seem to have been sensible of that very soon after it took place, and they remonstrated with Miss Stirling, who had carried the children to Nova Scotia, and desired her to bring them back. In that I think they acted quite rightly. But, then, I think they acted very far short of their duty after the children were brought back to this country, because they allowed Miss Stirling, after she had brought the children to the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, to conceal them from their parents, and also from the respondents themselves. Indeed, there is an appearance on the part of the respondents of an indisposition to acquire any knowledge of where the children were, and to all applications on the part of the petitioner for access to his children there could be no satisfactory answer made. The consequence was that the children were again carried out of the country. Now, for that I think the respondents must be answerable, because they were thus violating the obligation which they had undertaken to be responsible for the safe custody of the children while they were in the institution, and to deliver them when the parents required them.

It is therefore, I think, impossible not to say that the respondents are under an obligation to deliver these children now to the petitioner; and the only question of course which perplexes one in dealing with the case is, that as the children are not here, it may require the lapse of some considerable time, perhaps proceedings in another country, in order to accomplish the object for which this petition was presented. I approve entirely of the spirit in which the minute is expressed, which Mr Lorimer has just read, and I am very glad to find from that that the respondents are now fully alive to what their responsibilities are. But I think it would be hardly consistent with the duty of the Court to abstain now from pronouncing an order against the respondents for the redelivery of the children. Of course that must be qualified to this extent, that they must have time; and the order which I would propose, with your Lordships' concurrence, to pronounce, is to ordain the whole parties called as respondents in the petition to deliver to the petitioner his children James, Annie, and Robina Delaney, named in the petition, and that on or before the first sederunt-day in October next; and further, appoint the respondents to report to the Court on Thursday, 18th July next, what steps have been taken in pursuance of this order.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt that from the time when the directors took office they were responsible for the custody of the children, and from the minute-book which has been produced, and the number of entries which it contains in reference to the boarding and treatment of children, they seem in point of fact to have undertaken and realised that responsibility. It follows that they also clearly came under an obligation to restore the children to their parents and guardians.

The only defence which can be made to this obligation is for the directors to shew that the petitioner has relieved them of that obligation. They say here that they put it into the power of the father to get back his children when they had the children brought home from America. That is the defence they make, but I do not think that it has been sufficiently made out. The directors were

No. 137.

June 7, 1889.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

No. 137.

June 7, 1889.
Delaney v.
Directors of Edinburgh
and Leith
Children's Aid
and Refuge.

bound to have vindicated the custody of the children from Miss Stirling when they were brought home and kept in concealment, and to have put them at the disposal of the petitioner. The ground upon which the respondents are now ordered to deliver up the children is that in 1884 they undertook the custody of the children, and have not shewn that they have done anything to relieve themselves of the responsibility which resulted. The order which we are to pronounce will, I think, strengthen the hands of the directors in taking measures to have the children restored.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor ordaining the whole parties called as respondents to deliver the children to the petitioner, and that on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further, appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order.

E. DENHOLM YOUNG, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 138.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

DUNCAN MACDONALD AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—

A. S. D. Thomson.

ALEXANDER MACDONALD, Defender (Appellant).—Sym.

Donation—Mortis causa donation—Deposit-receipt—Effect of destination in deposit-receipt in proof of donation.—J. M. took from a bank a deposit-receipt in these terms,—“Received from J. M., and A. M. his brother, to be drawn by them, or either, or survivor, £286, 19s. 2d.” Some months thereafter J. M. died while on a visit to A. M. After his death A. M., who became his executor, produced the receipt and claimed to have right to it as having been given to him when the deceased was ill, and in prospect of death. In an action of count and reckoning against A. M. as executor, after a proof in which, apart from the terms of the receipt, the only evidence of donation was the testimony of the alleged donee and his daughter, held that A. M. was in lawful possession of the deposit-receipt as creditor therein, and that it did not form part of J. M.’s estate.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
I.

JOHN MACDONALD died at Edinburgh on 22d December 1887, intestate and unmarried. He was survived by two brothers, Alexander Macdonald, residing in Edinburgh, and Duncan Macdonald, residing at Abriachan, Inverness-shire, and by certain nephews and nieces, the children of his brother James, who predeceased him. Another brother, Hugh, had predeceased him without leaving issue.

In May 1888 Alexander Macdonald was decerned executor-dative qua next of kin to the deceased.

In December 1888 Duncan Macdonald and the children of James Macdonald raised in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh an action of count and reckoning against Alexander Macdonald, as executor.

They averred that the estate of the deceased included besides certain other sums two deposit-receipts, one of which was with the Caledonian Bank, Inverness, for £280, dated 5th May 1887, and was in the names of John Macdonald and Hugh Macdonald, “repayable to either or survivor,” and the other of which was with the British Linen Bank, Inverness, also dated 5th May 1887, and was in these terms:—“£286, 19s. 2d. Received from Mr John Macdonald, Dochfour, and Mr Alexander Macdonald, his brother, to be drawn by them, or either, or survivor, two hundred and eighty-six pounds, 19s. 2d. sterling, which is this day placed to the credit of their deposit account with the British Linen Company." No. 138.

The defender admitted that the money in the deposit-receipt with the Caledonian Bank was part of the estate of the deceased. He denied, however, that the money in the deposit-receipt with the British Linen Company was part of the estate of the deceased at his death, and averred that it was his own property by donation from the deceased. June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

The defender averred that the money contained in it "consisted of monies belonging jointly to the said deceased John Macdonald and the defender, —that it was the intention of the said John Macdonald that the whole of the contents of the said deposit-receipt should belong to and be the property of the defender, in the event of his survivance. Further explained and averred that the said deceased John Macdonald, some time before his death, delivered over to the defender the said deposit-receipt as his sole property, and gifted the whole contents thereof, so far as belonging to him, to the defender, and the same is his sole and exclusive property."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The sum in the said deposit-receipt for £286, 19s. having belonged exclusively to the deceased, and not having been gifted by him to the defender, the pursuers are entitled to their respective shares of the same, as representatives of the deceased.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The deposit-receipt in question having been taken jointly to the said deceased John Macdonald and the defender, payable to either or the survivor, and the said John Macdonald having intended that the same, and the contents thereof, should be the exclusive property of the defender, in the event of his survivance, the same does not form part of the estate available for division. (3) The said deceased John Macdonald having delivered the said deposit-receipt to the defender by way of gift, the pursuers are not entitled to participate in the contents thereof, and the same belongs exclusively to the defender.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed the defender a proof of his averments, and the pursuer a conjunct probation.

From the proof it appeared that the deceased had for many years been a butler in a family in Inverness-shire, while the defender had been a coachman with another family in Morayshire. Some time before his death the deceased had gone with his employer's family to reside most of the year at Brighton, but was also part of the year in Scotland. The defender having left his employment in Morayshire had come to Edinburgh about 1882, and the deceased when in Scotland had been in the habit of calling on the defender, with whom he was on affectionate terms. The deceased, who was about seventy years of age, came from Brighton to the defender's house in bad health in October or November 1887. At first he slept in a room taken for him by the defender, who could not receive him, owing to his house being occupied by lodgers, but he took his meals with the defender and his family, and spent the day with them. After a week, however, he resided altogether with them. He was ill of internal cancer, and was told by the doctor who attended him that he would not recover.

The parole evidence in proof of the alleged donation consisted only of that of the defender himself and of one of his daughters, and is quoted below.*

---

* The defender deponed,—“My brother John came down from Brighton to my house about the end of October 1887. He was in bad health at that time, and came to reside with me on that account, to see if the change would do him good. The doctor had ordered him to take a change. He mentioned to me that he was to stay with me when he retired from the service of Lady Georgina Baillie. His health

No. 138. None of the pursuers had been in Edinburgh at the time of the death of John Macdonald. The deceased had been on friendly terms with them,

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

did not improve after he came down to Edinburgh; he got weaker, and died on 22d December 1887. I recollect his taking an airing in a cab about ten days before his death. When he came into the house after the airing, he said to me that the doctor had told him he was not likely to get rid of his trouble, and he wished to settle matters. He opened his desk and took out a paper which he handed to me, and said 'That is for you, Sandy; that is for you wholly.' (Shewn deposit-receipt for £286, 19s. 2d., by the British Linen Bank, dated 5th May 1887)—That is the paper which my brother handed to me on that occasion. I said to him that I wished he could live a little longer and enjoy it himself. When I got the deposit-receipt from him, I put it into my own trunk. I never gave it back to him again. It remained in my possession in the trunk until the Saturday night after the funeral. When my brother gave me that deposit-receipt, he shewed me the deposit-receipt for £280, 11s. 4d., by the Caledonian Bank, dated 5th May 1887. He did not give me that one, but put it back, saying that 'he would settle about it to-morrow.' By that, I understood that he meant to draw the money. He did not draw the money. He was not so well next day, and was not able to go out. He got worse every day after that, till he died. He was never out again after the occasion when he gave me the deposit-receipt by the British Linen Bank. The other deposit-receipt remained in his desk till after the funeral. . . .

"Cross-examined.— . . . On the occasion when my brother returned to the house from the airing about ten days before his death, he said that he wished to settle up affairs, because the doctor thought that he would not get rid of his trouble. Then he opened his desk. I had not spoken to him on the subject first; it was he himself who referred to it. It was Professor Muirhead who was attending him. My brother opened the desk, and took out the deposit-receipt for £286, and said, 'That is for you, Sandy, wholly.' My daughter was present at the time. It was in the afternoon, but I cannot give the exact hour. His complaint consisted of cancer in the stomach. (Q.) When your brother spoke of settling up affairs, did you think he was giving you back what was your own? (A.) Yes, along with his own. (Q.) How do you know that he was not merely giving you back your own? (A.) It was only £100 I gave him. (Q.) How did you come to suppose that he was giving you the whole of the deposit-receipt? (A.) He said it; he said, 'That is for you yourself.' He gave me the paper as it was. (Q.) May he not have been giving you back your own money? (A.) I don't know; he may. (Q.) Did it not occur to you that he may have given you your own money back, and the rest to distribute as executor? (A.) No, that never occurred to me. (Q.) Is not that possible? (A.) I don't think it is possible. (Q.) Why? (A.) Because he said it was for myself. He left the other receipt in his desk. I am quite certain it was left there till after his funeral. While my nephew and niece were in the house after the funeral, I did not take two receipts out of my own trunk; I just took out the one in question, for £286. The other was in the desk, along with the Post-Office Savings' Bank book. My brother did not give his watch to me; it was to my daughter he gave it. I did not see him give it to her, but I know that she nursed him. He never told me that he was going to give the watch to my daughter. I found the purse on the table in my brother's own bedroom. It was there before he died. I did not leave it on the table when I first saw it; as far as I remember, I put it into my pocket or in the desk. I was north at Abriachan last week seeing the pursuers. (Q.) Did you ask Maggie Macdonald if she saw the receipts coming out of the desk? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Why? (A.) Because they said I had taken the two receipts out of the one place. (Q.) When did you hear that? (A.) I heard that at Abriachan. They said I had taken the two receipts out of the desk. I asked her if she saw it, and she said 'No.' (Q.) When your nephew and niece were with you after the funeral, did you say in their presence, 'I wonder very much that John would put my name in the receipt without telling me'? (A.) No; I will swear that. (Q.) Did you not say it two or three times? (A.) No. It is and had been in use to visit them at Abriachan when he was in the north. His last visit was in the month of April preceding his death, when he

No. 138.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

not very likely I would say that when I knew. I did not tell my nephew and niece when they were in the house that the sum in the deposit-receipt had been gifted to me. (Q.) Why? (A.) Because I had no reason for saying it. When I shewed them the deposit-receipt for £280, 11s. 4d. they got quarrelsome, and they said there was more than what I had shewn them. I shewed them the other receipt, but John took the pet and went away out for two hours. The deceased did not talk to me about the other receipt further than what I have stated. He was north at Hugh's funeral, and I was with him. He personally renewed the receipt. I have noticed that it was renewed after his brother died. (Q.) Is not that very curious? (A.) I cannot say whether he had done this before going to Inverness or after coming from it. My brother Hugh died two years ago in April. (Q.) Are you sure the Hugh Macdonald mentioned in the receipt is the man who is dead? (A.) Yes; I have a nephew of that name. (Q.) Could it not be he? (A.) No. I have given my brother John some money before I sent him the £30. I had given him £5 at a time. I sent the £30 from Oban to my brother in Inverness by a cheque on the bank. I sent the cheque through the post-office. I think the next sum I gave my brother was one of £10 about twelve months after that at Inverness. I believe that is the last sum that I gave him. My brother had money deposited in bank before May 1887, but I cannot say how long before. I knew that, because he was always speaking about it when we met. I knew that he had money in the Caledonian Bank. He had a deposit-receipt before, and I saw him change it in Inverness for the one now in question with the British Linen Bank on the 5th of May 1887. I was with him at the bank at the time. (Q.) Did he put more money into the bank on the 5th of May 1887, or did he get some out? (A.) I cannot say. (Q.) Did he give you any interest for the money you gave him? (A.) I understood that the interest was always added to the money. Re-examined.—(Q.) Repeat the exact words that John used when he gave you the deposit-receipt? (A.) He said to me,—‘Sandy, I wish to settle up affairs. I don't think I am going to get rid of my trouble.’ He said the doctor had been saying so. He then opened his desk and took out the deposit-receipt, and said,—‘That is for you, wholly to yourself.’”

Margaret Macdonald, the defender's daughter, deponed,—“My uncle died on 22d December 1887. I recollect him going out for an airing in a cab about ten days before his death. When he came back I helped my father to bring him into the house. He said,—‘The doctor told me—and I am afraid he is right—that I won't get better.’ He then asked for his writing-desk, and went to it, saying,—‘As long as I am able I would like to settle affairs, if I can.’ He opened his desk and took out a deposit-receipt by the British Linen Bank, and handed it to my father. I am now shewn the deposit-receipt. It was handed to me at the time, and I read it. When my uncle handed it to my father he said,—‘Sandy, here, take this; I give it to you wholly for yourself; and I hope that you will remember that Duncan has been my care all my life, and that you will always see to him, that he may never want.’ My father put the deposit-receipt into his pocket, and afterwards into his own box. My uncle, at the time he gave my father the deposit-receipt, took a Savings' Bank book for £19 out of the desk and handed it to my father, and asked him to give it to his brother Duncan. My uncle then lifted another deposit-receipt and said,—‘Tomorrow, if I am well, and spared, I will go and see about this, because I would like to have things made right for Duncan.’ (Q.) What did you understand by him saying that? (A.) From the rest of his conversation, I understood that he meant to go to the bank and withdraw the money. He did not mention what he was to do with the money. My uncle never was out after that; he grew gradually worse, until he died. The conversation to which I have referred took place in my uncle's bedroom while he was sitting in a chair. There was nothing else taken out of the desk at that time to my knowledge. (Q.) No bank book? (A.) No. He repeatedly asked my father to look after his brother Duncan.

No. 138. attended the funeral of his brother Hugh, and settled his nephew John Macdonald, one of the pursuers, in the croft at Abriachan, which was held by the family. They had been informed by the defender of the serious illness of the deceased shortly before he died, and two of them left Abriachan at once for Edinburgh in order to see him, but he was dead before they arrived.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

The evidence of these two pursuers was in conflict with that of the defender on certain points. They deponed that on the occasion of a conversation with the defender after the funeral he took both the deposit-receipt in question and that by the Caledonian Bank out of his own trunk, whereas the defender, in his evidence quoted above, stated that he kept the former deposit-receipt in his own possession after the gift of it to him and left the other in the deceased's desk. The pursuers also stated, in contradiction to the defender, that the defender had at the same occasion repeatedly expressed surprise at his name having been put in the deposit-receipt in question. They also stated that he did not at first tell them that the deceased had given him the deposit-receipt before his death; and further, that the defender had stated that he had himself given the gold watch belonging to the deceased to one of his daughters, whereas the defender stated that he had said the deceased gave the watch to the girl for nursing him in his illness.

At the time of the death of the deceased his purse, containing about £12, was in his room. The defender in his evidence stated that he had put it in his pocket or in the desk of the deceased, but that it had gone amissing at the time of the funeral.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford), on 18th March 1889, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact and in law (1) that the defender has failed to prove that the deposit-receipt, No. 10 of process, dated 5th May 1887, or the sum of £286, 19s. 2d. sterling therein mentioned, was a gift or donation to him by the deceased John Macdonald; (2) that the said sum of £286, 19s. 2d., with accruing interest thereon, was in bonis of the said John Macdonald at his death on the 22d of December 1887, and falls to be included in the account of his personal estate to be given up by the defender as his executor-dative," &c.*

. . . Cross-examined.—My uncle John was very anxious that his brother Duncan should be taken care of. I believe Duncan is weak, mentally and otherwise, and my uncle took care of him as if he were a child. I was not astonished that my uncle John should speak of Duncan when he gave my father the deposit-receipt. I remember being in the kitchen with my father and my cousins after my uncle's funeral. They began to talk about money matters. My father shewed them the Caledonian Bank receipt. (Q.) Did he go to the desk for it? (A.) Yes; he went into the other room. As far as I remember, they went in with him; one of them, at least, did so. It was when they said there must be more that my father shewed them the British Linen Bank receipt. (Q.) Did your father take two receipts out of the chest in the kitchen? (A.) He took out three. One of them belonged to my mother, and was a deposit-receipt for £90 on the British Linen Bank. My father merely lifted it up and put it down again. . . . (Q.) Did your father tell either of your cousins that this deposit-receipt had been gifted to him? (A.) I believe he did. He said it was his own; but I don't know whether he gave them any particulars."

* In a note the Sheriff-substitute stated that the defender's daughter gave her evidence in apparently a very truthful manner, but that the circumstances appearing from the proof, and which are detailed above, were "such as to suggest so much doubt (the Sheriff-substitute is very far from saying it is more than a doubt) regarding the evidence of the defender and his daughter, that he is unable to hold the proof of donation to be sufficient."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—The story No. 138. of the alleged donation as told by the defender and his daughter was consistent and probable in itself. It was quite a probable thing that a man, believing himself to be dying, should give his brother, with whom he was on affectionate terms, a portion of his means. That derived great probability from the fact that the deceased had taken the deposit-receipt in that brother's name as well as his own. That shewed a purpose to benefit his brother which (though it was settled that a deposit-receipt could not receive effect as a testament by virtue of the destination in it) was important in proof of the gift.<sup>1</sup> The evidence of delivery was distinct, and unshaken in cross-examination. The Sheriff-substitute appeared to have thought it credible in itself, but to have held that doubt was raised by certain discrepancies between the evidence of the defender and that of the pursuers. But it was evident that the pursuers might be mistaken in their understanding of what the defender said at the time of their meeting, and as to the precise place from which he took the deposit-receipts when he shewed them. On the other hand, if the defender were not believed, there was no escape from the conclusion that he had clandestinely possessed himself of the receipt, and had along with his daughter invented and told a false story in evidence to conceal that. It was true that the deceased expressed a wish that the defender should take care of Duncan Macdonald, but there had been no attempt to make a verbal trust for administration. It was nothing but a pious wish. It was not proved that the defender had contributed any specific sum to the deposit-receipt, but it was proved that he had contributed something. That, again, made the defender's evidence as to the deceased's conduct the more credible.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The deposit-receipt itself conferred no title.<sup>2</sup> Its terms would not constitute a legacy, nor settle whether part of the contents belonged to each, so long as the deceased kept the receipt, nor give the defender any right by mere survivance as against the other next of kin of the deceased. The terms of the receipt might be explained by the banker having suggested the taking of it in that form for convenience of administration. On the evidence donation was not proved. The defender had a heavy onus of proof to discharge.<sup>3</sup> The presumption was always against donation. It was the heavier from the circumstance that the deceased died in the house of the defender, with no other relatives near him than the defender and his family, though other relatives equally near might have been sent for in time to ensure their being with him at his death. The only evidence adduced to discharge that onus was that of the alleged donee himself and his daughter, and the Judge who had heard it had not held it sufficient. It would be very dangerous to accept the evidence of the donee himself as sufficient to prove the donation even if it was uncontradicted. Here it was contradicted, not indeed as to the fact of the donation, for there were no other witnesses present at the scene he and his daughter alleged to have taken place, but on numerous points as to what had occurred on the first occasion when other people were present. Even assuming the deceased to have used

<sup>1</sup> Crosbie's Trustees v. Wright, May 28, 1880, 7 R. 823 (Lord President's opinion); Sharp v. Paton, June 21, 1883, 10 R. 1000 (Lord Shand's opinion); Connell's Trustees v. Connell's Trustees, July 16, 1886, 13 R. 1175.

<sup>2</sup> Cuthill v. Burns, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849; Watt's Trustees v. Mackenzie, July 1, 1869, 7 Macph. 930.

<sup>3</sup> Ross v. Mellis, Dec. 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 197, 44 Scot. Jur. 119; Sharp v. Paton, 10 R. 1000.

No. 138. defeat the evidence of donation, if it is in itself credible. I believe the defender and his daughter, and the counter evidence has made no substantial impression on my mind. The sort of discrepancy which exists between the evidence of the pursuers and that of the defender on the incidents occurring after the funeral is just such as one would expect to find where parties are at disagreement on money matters, and where one party is suspicious of and endeavours to discredit the other's evidence. Discrepancies as to whether the deposit-receipt was taken out of the deceased's desk or out of the defender's chest are just such discrepancies as will occur in similar circumstances, without there being any wilful falsehood on either side. They do not create any doubt in my mind as to the perfect bona fides of the defender and his daughter.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

I come then to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be altered. I think he has given too much weight to the discrepancies in the evidence which I have noticed.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and generally on the same grounds. I ventured to point out during the course of the argument that though donation was in a sense the question involved here, the case is peculiar in this respect that the true question is whether or not the defender is the lawful holder of this document of debt (which is a deposit-receipt), as the creditor therein. This deposit-receipt is simply a document of debt by a banker to his client.

It has been decided, and I say nothing upon the decision here, that such a document, being taken in terms payable to two persons and the survivor of them, will not operate as a destination in the same way as these words would operate in a money obligation granted by another person who is not a banker.

There is a great deal to be said for and against this decision, and I would only venture to indicate my own opinion that when a proper case arises I think the question may well be reconsidered. I only pause to notice here that the document in question, the lawful possession of which as creditor therein is the question in this case, is a deposit-receipt.

On that question we have the evidence upon which the Sheriff-substitute, whose judgment is entitled to great weight, has decided that the defender is not in lawful possession as the creditor therein.

In considering the evidence, I think it not amiss to inquire in this, as in many other cases, what must have been the judgment in the legal view in the absence of evidence on either side.

The defender is in the possession of the deposit-receipt, and his name is written upon it as creditor therein, and he is the only creditor therein in the circumstances which have occurred. What then, in the absence of all evidence, would have been the legal position? It is true his name happens to be mentioned second in the document. But I look on this as immaterial. Where you have a deposit-receipt granted to two persons for a sum placed to their credit, you must have one name mentioned first. Does it matter which? Therefore, in the absence of all evidence, Alexander Macdonald being the survivor, and being in possession of the deposit-receipt, is in exactly the same position as John Macdonald.

It is said, however, that upon the evidence he cannot be held to have got it lawfully as the creditor therein. How stands the evidence on this matter? It appears, on the only evidence upon which we must determine the question, upon the point. I cannot help thinking that the pursuers here would have known of the practice if it really existed, and could have proved the fact in regard to this particular transaction had the fact been as they alleged in debate.

No. 138.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

We must assume, then, that the terms of the deposit-receipt were those in which John Macdonald requested that it should be drawn up, and in that view the case of Crosbie is of importance, because it is settled that the terms of such a receipt are, in the words of the Lord President, "very important elements of evidence, because they indicate some purpose of the deceased when he took the deposit-receipt in these terms." I may add that in that opinion all the Judges concurred.

Now, the receipt being in these terms, the defender says it was given to him as his own property by his brother John at a time when John believed himself to be dying. The evidence which we have as to what passed is given by the defender and his daughter Margaret, and they substantially concur in the matter. John Macdonald is said in the proof to have addressed the defender thus,—“Sandy, I wish to settle up affairs. I don't think I am going to get rid of my trouble.’ . . . He then opened his desk, and took out the deposit-receipt, and said, ‘That is for you, wholly to yourself.’” This is the evidence given by the defender, and his daughter Margaret confirms it. The words deponed to by her are not exactly the same as those deponed to by the defender, but they are substantially in each case the same words.

It is proved that added to these words there was an expression used by John to the effect that he desired that the defender should take care of another brother Duncan, who was imbecile. I cannot assent to the pursuers' criticism upon this evidence that it evinces a desire on the part of the deceased that the money contained in the deposit-receipt should be administered in trust for Duncan, rather than an intention to hand it over to the defender for his own use, with a pious request that he would look after his weak brother. It appears to me that if the words were used they were used with the latter intention only.

The next question is whether the evidence of the defender and of Margaret, who is the only other witness who could speak to the facts, is to be believed. I for my own part do believe it, and I think that we ought to dispose of the case on that footing.

But then it is said that there is some contradictory evidence, and undoubtedly there is, but not as regards what occurred at the time when the donation was given, but as to what occurred after the funeral.

In my opinion, however, the question is not as to whether there is contradictory evidence. It was suggested in the argument on the proof that unless the evidence of the party supporting the donation stood absolutely uncontradicted it could not be given effect to. But the true question is whether the contradictory evidence casts any doubt on the evidence as to the truth of the proof of donation. It would be impossible in most cases to establish a donation at all, and the donee would be at the mercy of the party interested in disputing the donation, if we were to accept the doctrine that because some evidence could be brought forward in opposition to that of the donee, therefore the donation must necessarily be held not proved. It would be iniquitous to allow the evidence of donation to be set aside merely because there existed some counter evidence. There must be a real doubt made upon the mind by the counter evidence to

No. 138. June 11, 1889. Macdonald v. Macdonald. defeat the evidence of donation, if it is in itself credible. I believe the defender and his daughter, and the counter evidence has made no substantial impression on my mind. The sort of discrepancy which exists between the evidence of the pursuers and that of the defender on the incidents occurring after the funeral is just such as one would expect to find where parties are at disagreement on money matters, and where one party is suspicious of and endeavours to discredit the other's evidence. Discrepancies as to whether the deposit-receipt was taken out of the deceased's desk or out of the defender's chest are just such discrepancies as will occur in similar circumstances, without there being any wilful falsehood on either side. They do not create any doubt in my mind as to the perfect bona fides of the defender and his daughter.

I come then to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be altered. I think he has given too much weight to the discrepancies in the evidence which I have noticed.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and generally on the same grounds. I ventured to point out during the course of the argument that though donation was in a sense the question involved here, the case is peculiar in this respect that the true question is whether or not the defender is the lawful holder of this document of debt (which is a deposit-receipt), as the creditor therein. This deposit-receipt is simply a document of debt by a banker to his client.

It has been decided, and I say nothing upon the decision here, that such a document, being taken in terms payable to two persons and the survivor of them, will not operate as a destination in the same way as these words would operate in a money obligation granted by another person who is not a banker.

There is a great deal to be said for and against this decision, and I would only venture to indicate my own opinion that when a proper case arises I think the question may well be reconsidered. I only pause to notice here that the document in question, the lawful possession of which as creditor therein is the question in this case, is a deposit-receipt.

On that question we have the evidence upon which the Sheriff-substitute, whose judgment is entitled to great weight, has decided that the defender is not in lawful possession as the creditor therein.

In considering the evidence, I think it not amiss to inquire in this, as in many other cases, what must have been the judgment in the legal view in the absence of evidence on either side.

The defender is in the possession of the deposit-receipt, and his name is written upon it as creditor therein, and he is the only creditor therein in the circumstances which have occurred. What then, in the absence of all evidence, would have been the legal position? It is true his name happens to be mentioned second in the document. But I look on this as immaterial. Where you have a deposit-receipt granted to two persons for a sum placed to their credit, you must have one name mentioned first. Does it matter which? Therefore, in the absence of all evidence, Alexander Macdonald being the survivor, and being in possession of the deposit-receipt, is in exactly the same position as John Macdonald.

It is said, however, that upon the evidence he cannot be held to have got it lawfully as the creditor therein. How stands the evidence on this matter? It appears, on the only evidence upon which we must determine the question, that John paid the money into the bank, being accompanied by his brother at the time, on a deposit-receipt in the terms which I have quoted, and that he left it there. I lay aside all consideration at this moment of any evidence we have as to where the money came from, e.g., Alexander depones that to the extent of £100 the money came out of his pocket, and, so far as he knows, the residue came out of John's. I lay all that out of sight, and I assume that John paid the whole money and kept the receipt.

No. 138.
June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v. Macdonald.

I am clearly of opinion that he was creditor on the face of the document, entitled to uplift the money, and under no obligation whatever, on the face of it, to Alexander. He might have gone to the bank, uplifted the money, and put it back again upon another receipt. He kept the money in his power by retaining possession of the deposit-receipt. I reach that conclusion upon the evidence.

How then did it pass into Alexander's hands? The evidence on this matter is that, some days before his death, John handed the document to him, and said, "That is for you entirely," meaning, as Alexander understood, that he was thereafter to be in lawful possession of the document of debt as the creditor therein on his own account in the bank. We may doubt the witnesses, but there is no other evidence. It has been suggested that Alexander, in whose house John died, took advantage of his opportunities of access to John's repositories and took out the document, either in John's lifetime without authority, or after his death. It would, in my opinion, be unwarrantable to deal with the testimony of the appellant and his daughter in that manner. It would be just saying that Alexander and his daughter were guilty of perjury to cover crime. I should not be prepared to do so, even if there were no antecedent probability in their account of the matter. But their account has every antecedent probability. It has, as your Lordship has pointed out, strong antecedent probability from the terms of the deposit-receipt, for these terms signify an intention on John's part when he took the document to act exactly as the two witnesses say he did act. He signified his intention as clearly as if he had said to a friend, "I intend to give the document to Alexander when my end approaches." That will give antecedent probability of his acting conform to his intention expressed in writing or otherwise. I think it is an intention expressed in writing. He had no obligation, but it remained a record of the intention which was in his mind at the date of it.

It is not upon the authority of any rule of law, but because human understanding cannot resist it, that we incline to believe evidence which states what it is likely a man would do with an intention influencing his mind. It is the merest truism to say that an antecedently probable story is more easily proved than a statement which is antecedently improbable. It was highly probable that John would act in conformity with the intention expressed on the face of the deposit-receipt.

The whole evidence is, as I have said, to the effect that he did so act, and in that view Alexander was thereafter in lawful possession of the document as creditor on his own account. I am therefore of opinion that the findings in point of fact in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor ought to be altered, and that we should find that the appellant is in lawful possession of the document as creditor therein.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The sole question in the case is, I think, whether

No. 138. the deposit-receipt given to the appellant was a donation mortis causa. I confess I have felt great difficulty in its decision, but on the whole I think it has been proved that the donation was made. I think therefore that the appellant must succeed.

June 11, 1889.
Macdonald v.
Macdonald.

LORD LEE.—I always feel great difficulty in altering the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, who sees and hears the witnesses. I think, however, that the view taken by him here as to the evidence leaves the case open for us as one of evidence.

I do not find it necessary, as Lord Young does, to give an opinion upon the import and effect of being the holder of such a document as the one before us. I think the question as to what importance is to be given to the possession of such a document always depends upon the title upon which it is held, and that question depends necessarily on evidence. It may be a title of absolute property, or one of ownership by donation inter vivos, or by donation mortis causa. The question upon which of these titles such a document is held can only be decided upon evidence. I do not therefore think we can decide the question on the terms of the document alone and without evidence. I think it is not proved that any of the contents of the deposit-receipt in this case originally belonged to Alexander. The onus lies on the defender to prove this. He must prove donation, and donation mortis causa. It is not the same case as would have been presented if John had called in a witness, and handed over the deposit-receipt to Alexander in his presence. If such were proved, possibly a case of donation inter vivos might be made out, but it would depend on circumstances whether it was a donation inter vivos and revocable. Here it was only a donation mortis causa, and I hold that it lay upon Alexander to prove it. I agree, after an examination of the evidence, that it goes on the whole to favour the allegation that it was a donation mortis causa.

I only wish to add upon the question whether there was or was not donation, I consider it legitimate and reasonable to look at the fact that there was a deposit-receipt in these terms as bearing upon the question of antecedent probability, and therefore as tending to corroborate the evidence on oath of Alexander and his daughter.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the late John Macdonald delivered the deposit-receipt for £286, 19s. mentioned in the record to the defender Alexander Macdonald, to be held by him for his the defender's behoof: Find in law that the defender is in the lawful possession of the same as creditor therein, and that it does not form part of the estate of the said John Macdonald: Therefore recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Sustain the third plea in law for the defender: Find him entitled to expenses in this Court: . . . Remit the cause to the Sheriff, with instructions to proceed therein as accords," &c.

ALEXANDER ROSS, S.S.C.—D. MILNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers (Appellants).—Sol.-Gen. Darling—Murray.

No. 139.

HENRY LAMONT & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Low—C. K. Mackenzie.

June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

Bill of Exchange—When presentment for payment not necessary—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 45, 46.—The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts, by section 45,—“Subject to the provisions of this Act, a bill must be duly presented for payment. If it be not so presented, the drawers and endorsers shall be discharged,” and by section 46, subsec. (2),—“Presentment for payment is dispensed with. . . . (c) As regards the drawer, where the drawee or acceptor is not bound as between himself and the drawer to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented. . . .”

The affairs of a firm being involved, they, in November 1885, entered into an agreement with, inter alios, their principal creditors, including the Bank of Scotland, and L., a trader, who held their acceptance for £700, whereby, on the narrative that the creditors were willing to wait the result of the liquidation after mentioned, the firm conveyed their whole estates to certain persons as attorneys and managers to carry on the business, to ingather the debts due to the firm, and from time to time to make a rateable division of them among the creditors who were parties to the agreement. The attorneys and managers, by virtue of powers in the agreement, renewed from time to time L.'s bill above mentioned until April 1888, when they refused to renew it. In an action for payment against L., the drawer, by the Bank of Scotland, with whom he had discounted it, the defender pleaded that he was discharged from liability in respect of the fact, which was admitted, that the bank had not presented the bill to the acceptors for payment. Held that presentment for payment to the acceptors was not necessary, seeing that by the agreement the acceptors were not bound to pay the bill, and that the drawer had no reason to believe that it would be paid if presented, the acceptors being bound only to make payment rateably among the creditors of the funds in hand.

In November 1885 the affairs of Ferguson, Lamont, & Company, marine insurance brokers, Glasgow, were in a somewhat involved condition. Charles Lamont, the sole partner, entered into an agreement, dated 12th November 1885, for the purpose of having the business of the firm carried on and the debts of the firm gradually liquidated. Charles Lamont, as sole partner of the firm, was the first party to this agreement. The second parties were John M. Lamont and William Dodd, clerks of the firm, who were to act as attorneys and managers for carrying on the business. The third parties were the principal creditors of the firm, viz., Mr James Baill, submanager of the Bank of Scotland, Glasgow, as representing the bank, Henry Lamont, sole partner of H. Lamont & Company, and two other creditors.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

The agreement proceeded on the narrative that it was “expedient that the first party should consent to a transference of his whole estate and effects excepting as after mentioned, and the management and conduct of his business affairs to the attorneys and managers herein named, and that with the view of the same being liquidated and applied towards gradual payment of the claims of the third parties; and whereas the third parties are willing to wait the result of such liquidation, and to grant time to the first party and his said firm, but that on the terms and conditions hereinafter stipulated.” By sundry clauses the first party agreed to abstain from active management of his business, and consented to his affairs being managed by the second parties, subject to the approval of a committee of advice representing the third parties; and he further assigned to the second parties the whole assets belonging to himself or his firm,

No. 139. constituting them managers and attorneys, with full powers to conduct everything relating to his business, and in particular to draw, accept, and negotiate bills.

June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

The eighth purpose of the agreement was as follows,—“As the object of these presents is to ingather the assets of the foresaid businesses, and gradually apply the same towards the reimbursement of the third parties, it is provided and agreed that after paying preferable charges, salaries, allowance to the first party, and other claims as aforesaid, and so soon as the funds received by the second parties as commissions and actual profits shall admit, a rateable division will be made with the concurrence of the said committee of advice to and among the third parties, and from time to time thereafter until their claims are duly paid, the amount of said claims as at the date of these presents being stated in the schedule annexed, and signed as relative hereto.”

A schedule of the debts due to the third parties was appended to the agreement. In this schedule the debt due to Henry Lamont was entered at £1502, 14s. 10d. Part of this sum consisted of a bill for £665, which was to fall due in December 1885, and which Henry Lamont & Company had drawn on Ferguson, Lamont, & Company, and they had accepted.

The affairs of the firm were managed under the arrangement during the years 1886, 1887, and 1888. The bill for £665 was from time to time renewed, the new bills being accepted by the second parties in the name of the firm. The last renewal was on 2d January 1888, when a bill for £720, 4s. 4d. (including interest) was granted. This bill which was accepted by Ferguson, Lamont, and Company, payable at their office, fell due on 6th April 1888.

The acceptors having, owing to some disagreement into which it is unnecessary to inquire, refused to renew the bill, the Bank of Scotland, with whom the bill had been discounted by the drawers, sent notice to the latter that the bill was due, but they refused to pay it, on the ground that it had not been presented to the acceptors for payment.

Prior to the 6th April the bank issued the usual notices to the drawers and acceptors that the bill would become due on that day. It was not however presented to the acceptors for payment, nor noted, as the bank's submanager thought that unnecessary in consequence of the agreement, his view being that the attorneys and managers for the acceptors were bound thereby to pay all the creditors rateably, and could not retire the bill.

The action was in consequence brought by the bank against the drawers for payment of the bill.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having failed duly to present the bill for payment to the acceptors, and also to note the same for nonpayment, the drawers have been discharged.* (2) The pursuers

---

* The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61), sec. 45, enacts,—“Subject to the provisions of this Act, a bill must be duly presented for payment. If it be not so presented, the drawer and indorsers shall be discharged.

“A bill is duly presented for payment which is presented in accordance with the following rules:—

“(1) Where the bill is not payable on demand, presentment must be made on the day it falls due. . . .

“(3) Presentment must be made by the holders or by some person authorised to receive payment on his behalf, at a reasonable hour on a business day, at the proper place, as hereinafter defined, either to the person designated by the bill as payer, or to some person authorised to pay or refuse payment on his behalf. . . .

“(4) A bill is presented at a proper place (a) where a place of payment is specified in the bill and the bill is there presented.”

by their actings and also by their failure duly to negotiate the bill, and to protect the rights of the drawers in accordance with the statutes, have lost recourse against the defenders, and the action ought to be dismissed, with expenses. No. 139.
June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds pursuers are holders for value of the bill in question, of which bill the defenders are the drawers, and Ferguson, Lamont, & Company the acceptors: Finds admittedly said bill was not duly presented: Finds that no binding waiver of presentment on the part of defenders has been proved by pursuers: Finds, therefore, that, under the 45th section of 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61,* defenders are entitled to absolvitor: Sustains accordingly the defences, and assoilzies the defenders," &c.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—Presentment of this bill was not necessary, for the attorneys and managers of the acceptors could not have retired it, consistently with their duty. Their duty was to make "a rateable division, with concurrence of the committee of advice," among the acceptors' creditors. All parties—the pursuers, the defenders, and the acceptors—were parties also to the agreement. The pursuers if they had presented the bill for payment would, as the defenders well knew, have been asking the acceptors to act in the face of the agreement, the purpose of which was a gradual liquidation through a committee. The pursuers would have had no right to take payment in full, if offered, on presenting the bill, and were therefore not bound to present it. It was a case of presentment being excused as provided by the 46th section of the Bills of Exchange Act.† Presentment would, in the circumstances, have been a mere form, and the defenders had no legitimate interest to insist upon it. The participation in the agreement operated as an implied waiver of presentment.

Argued for the defenders;—The liability of the drawer of a bill was conditional on certain proceedings, in case of dishonour, being duly taken.‡ By section 45 (quoted supra) a bill must be "duly presented" for payment under penalty of discharging the drawer and indorsers. The place of presentment must also be attended to, and here it was the office of the acceptors. It was said that presentment would have been futile, and that that liberated the pursuers from the obligation to present the bill. But that section applied to cases in which there was no reason to believe a bill would be paid. But this bill was not worthless. It was to be paid out of the funds of the acceptors by their managers and attorneys, who were conducting a profitable business. With authority of the committee of advice, the bill could quite competently have been paid. If the * Quoted supra, p. 770.

† The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 46, enacts,—"... Presentment for payment is dispensed with,—(a) Where, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, presentment as required by this Act cannot be effected. ...

"(c) As regards the drawer, where the drawee or acceptor is not bound, as between himself and the drawer, to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented.

"(d) As regards an indorser, where the bill was accepted or made for the accommodation of that indorser, and he has no reason to expect that the bill would be paid if presented.

"(e) By waiver of presentment, express or implied."

‡ The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts (sec. 55),—"The drawer of a bill by drawing it (a) engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or any endorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken."

No. 139. bill had been in the hands of another bank they would certainly have been bound to present it, and would have presented it for payment. The question was not whether the drawer had been prejudiced, it was whether presentment had been waived, or rather whether non-presentment had been excused.

June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears that the main question which was argued in this Court was not argued to any extent before the Sheriff-substitute, but we have heard full argument on it, and I think we are now ready to dispose of it. The firm of Ferguson, Lamont, & Company parted in 1885 with the entire control of their own business, and also with their power to uplift the debts due to them and to pay those due by them. They assigned their whole estates and assets to a committee of their creditors to be managed under an agreement by which the committee of management were empowered to transact all the company's business, and collect the debts due to them and make a rateable distribution of the funds among the creditors. At the date of the agreement there were interested in the firm's estates, among others, the Bank of Scotland and Mr Henry Lamont, both of whom were creditors, and both of whom were also parties to the agreement. The debt due to Henry Lamont was about £1500. In connection with part of it he had drawn a bill upon Ferguson, Lamont, & Company for about £700. They accepted that bill, and he then discounted it at the Bank of Scotland and got the proceeds. While that bill, or a renewal of it, was current this agreement was entered into, the bill having been renewed when it fell due, and thereafter from time to time new bills being given to replace it.

Then there came a time when (owing, I think, to some personal disagreement between the brothers Lamont, which is not very clear upon the proof, and the cause of which it is not very material to ascertain) Mr John Lamont, the acceptor, declined to grant an acceptance of a renewed bill. The question then came to be whether the drawer Henry Lamont should be obliged to pay the bill or not.

Henry Lamont's only defence to the demand of the bank for payment of the bill by him as the person who indorsed it for value is that the bank failed in a duty to him as the drawer and indorser. That failure is said to be the non-presentation of the bill for payment to Ferguson, Lamont, & Company as acceptors. The question therefore is whether there was in the circumstances any obligation on the bank to present the bill for payment. The bank was a party to the agreement, and knew that no debt could be paid to individual creditors of the firm, but that on the contrary there must be rateable distribution of all sums payable by the firm among the creditors by the committee who were managing the firm's affairs. The bank therefore knew that to present the bill to the firm for payment would be an idle form. We have been referred to section 46 of the Bills of Exchange Act. That section provides that "presentment for payment is dispensed with . . . (c) as regards the drawer, where the drawee or acceptor is not bound, as between himself and the drawer, to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented." Now, I am quite satisfied on the facts brought out in the proof that the acceptor was not bound to pay the bill, and that the drawer had no reason to expect that the bill would be paid if presented, and if so, the case is within the exception stated in the statute, and the bank must prevail in this action.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case hinges on the agreements of 1885-6, which were subsisting when this bill fell due on 6th April 1888. The agreement was made between Ferguson, Lamont, & Company and their leading creditors, including Henry Lamont, who was a creditor for £1500. Part of that debt was represented by this bill, of which he was the drawer, and which fell due on 6th April. For Henry Lamont's own convenience, it had been kept up by renewals for a considerable time. Now, by the agreement the creditors had obliged themselves to abstain from enforcing their debts against the debtor, the debtor having on his part put his whole affairs into the administration of the liquidation committee for the security and satisfaction of his creditors. Henry Lamont, like the other creditors, had bound himself so to abstain, and to take payment only through a fair administration under the agreement. It is therefore clear that had the bill been in his own hands he could only have intimated his claim to the liquidators. He could not have presented it for payment or noted it for non-payment in the usual sense. Indeed, the liquidation committee knew it to be due. I think the contention untenable that the parties were to act as if there had been no agreement at all. Now, the bill had come into the hands of the bank. They had discounted it, and it was in their hands when it fell due. The bank knew of the agreement between Henry Lamont and Ferguson, Lamont, & Company, for the bank also was a party to it as creditor of that firm. The bank, therefore, knew that Henry Lamont, the drawer, was under an agreement with the acceptor not to exact payment except rateably through the liquidation committee. When the bill was due, and when it was ascertained that there was to be no renewal, the bank applied to Henry Lamont for payment, and his obligation to pay could not be doubted unless there were some exception on the ground that the bill had not been duly negotiated. Now, but for the agreement, the bank would have presented the bill for payment, and noted and protested it if not paid in the ordinary way. But knowing of the agreement they did not do so, and requested payment from Henry Lamont without taking that course. Henry Lamont, who had some difference with the agent of the bank, went to the bank to pay the bill according to his legal obligation, but before he had paid it he determined to take the point of law that the bank had not performed the holder's duty to him in making due presentation of the bill for payment. Now, I should have struggled to avoid giving effect to that plea, had that been necessary. But I think the case falls within the very provision of the Act which your Lordship quoted. I am prepared to find in fact that Henry Lamont, the drawer who states this plea, knew that the bill would not be paid. Indeed, it could not have been paid without a breach of the agreement, a transaction which the other creditors might have reduced. In law, I think, the acceptors were not bound to pay directly to Henry Lamont, and could not have done so without injustice to the other creditors, and violation of the agreement. I think the facts may be expressed in the very language your Lordship quoted from the statute, and therefore Henry Lamont cannot plead that there was not due presentment of the bill. I think the Sheriff-substitute has misapprehended the case, and that we should give decree for the pursuers, with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—Apart from the agreement, it has not been, I think, maintained

No. 139.

June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

No. 139. to us that there was, on the part of Henry Lamont, any waiver of the right to have performed towards him the duty which the holder of a bill owes to the drawer. The reasoning of the Sheriff-substitute is therefore inapplicable to the case as it is now presented.

June 12, 1889.
Bank of
Scotland v.
Lamont & Co.

But the question remains, whether—standing the agreement, and it is not disputed that the agreement remained in force—presentment of the bill for payment was not dispensed with in terms of section 46 of the Bills of Exchange Act, subsection (c), which your Lordship has quoted? Upon that question my opinion concurs with those which have been expressed.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—“Find in fact (1) That by the memorandum of agreement mentioned in the record the parties thereto, creditors of Ferguson, Lamont, & Company, undertook to allow the business of that company to be carried on under the management of a committee, which should collect all assets and distribute the same rateably among the creditors: (2) That the defenders were parties to that agreement, as creditors of the said company, to the amount of £1502, 14s. 10d., and previous to its date had drawn a bill on the company for part of the said sum, which bill was accepted by the company and discounted by the pursuers: (3) That the said bill was renewed from time to time, and discounted by the pursuers, and is now represented by the bill sued for: (4) That when the bill last mentioned fell due, the defenders, being parties to the agreement, knew that the acceptors, being the managers thereby appointed, having no power to pay creditors otherwise than rateably, could not retire it: Find in law that the defenders are not entitled to plead that the bill was not presented to the acceptors for payment: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against; repel the defences; ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £740, 4s. 4d. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum from the 6th day of August 1888 till payment: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court: Remit,” &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 140.

CHARLES CROUCHER, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—Hay.
THE REVEREND WILLIAM MASON INGLIS, Defender (Reclamer).—
Low—C. S. Dickson.

June 14, 1889.
Croucher v.
Ingilis.

Process—Jury trial—Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 40—Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 28.—A Lord Ordinary approved of certain issues, and on the motion of the pursuer, which was not opposed by the defender, by the same interlocutor fixed a day for the trial of the cause. Held (distinguishing from Craig v. Jex Blake, 9 Macph. 715) that a motion by the defender to vary the terms of the issues was not incompetent.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Want of probable cause—Parish minister.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer alleged that the defender, the minister of the parish in which the pursuer resided, had, by letters written by him to the inspector of poor of another parish and to the Board of Supervision, represented the pursuer as grossly unfit to have the charge of pauper children boarded with him by the parochial board of that other parish.

Held that the pursuer was bound to put in issue want of probable cause as well as malice.

CHARLES CROUCHER, general dealer, Kirkton of Auchterhouse, Forfarshire, brought an action of damages for written slander against the Rev. William Mason Inglis, minister of Auchterhouse, in which the following interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 23d May 1889 :—" Approves of the issue as amended, No. 7 of process, as adjusted and settled for the trial of the cause, and appoints the same to be tried by a jury, . . . on Tuesday, the 2d day of July next . . . "

No. 140.
June 14, 1889.
Croucher v. Inglis.
1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.
M.

On 30th May the defender moved the Court to vary the issues as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the motion, on the ground that it came too late, as a day for the trial of the case had been fixed; and that although it had been so fixed at the pursuer's instance, the defender must be taken to have consented to it, as he had not objected.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, upon which this motion is founded, consists of two portions. I must take leave to say that, in the circumstances, I do not think that is a proper interlocutor. An interlocutor approving of an issue as adjusted is one thing, and an interlocutor appointing a day for the trial of the cause is quite a different thing. Accordingly, it appears to me that in order to give a party an opportunity of moving the Inner-House to vary an issue in a cause as settled by the Lord Ordinary, there ought to be an interval of six days between the interlocutor approving of the issue and that appointing a day of trial.

I can quite understand that it may be a convenient matter for both parties that a day of trial should be fixed at the time that the issue is adjusted, because the days which a Lord Ordinary has at his disposal for the trial of jury causes in the course of a session are very few, and parties are generally anxious to have the earliest possible day they can get. Accordingly, in the present case, the parties may have allowed both matters to be included in the one interlocutor in order that they might get the 2d July fixed for the trial. If the six days during which a reclaiming note might have been presented had been allowed to expire before the Lord Ordinary was asked to fix a day for trial, the 2d July might not then have been available, and another day might not have been obtained this session. This probably accounts for the fact that a day for trial was fixed in the same interlocutor in which the issues were approved. It was a matter of convenience to the parties that this should be done.

But I cannot think that the right of moving the Court to vary the issues has thereby been taken away. That right is a very important one, and I should be very sorry to throw any obstacle in the way of its being exercised. In the case of Craig v. Jex Blake the defender's motion to have a day fixed for the trial was made after the issue was adjusted, and a day was fixed in a second interlocutor. The defender then took the case to the Inner-House, and moved the Court to have the issue varied. What the Court held was, that by asking the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for the trial during the time that she might have moved the Court to vary the issue the defender had shown that she was satisfied with the issue as adjusted, and the Court was accordingly of opinion that that constituted a bar to her subsequent application to have the issue varied.

I am therefore for repelling the objection to the competency of this reclaiming note.

<sup>1</sup> Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 40; Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 28; Craig v. Jex Blake, March 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 715.

No. 140.
 June 14, 1889.
Croucher v.
Inglis.

LORD SHAND.—In the case of Craig v. Jex Blake the defender moved the Court to vary the issue as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, but she had already so far adopted the issue herself by moving the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for the trial, which his Lordship did by a subsequent interlocutor. I think the view the Court took there of the motion to vary the issue was that the defender was personally barred by the fact that a day for the trial of the cause had been fixed. In the present case, the motion to have the issues varied is made to us by the defender, whereas it was the pursuer who applied to the Lord Ordinary to have a day of trial fixed.

In regard to the practice, I am not prepared to say that the Lord Ordinary ought not in certain cases to fix a day for the trial of the cause at the same time that he approves of the issues. Where both parties are satisfied that this should be done I see no reason against it. Whether both things should be done in the same interlocutor appears to me to be of little consequence. In the majority of cases the form of issues is now stereotyped, and in such cases at anyrate there seems no reason why a day of trial should not be so fixed.

In the present case I agree with your Lordship that the objection to the competency should be repelled.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT accordingly repelled the objection to the competency of the motion, and sent the case to the Summar Roll.

The alleged slander was contained in two letters written by the defender, the first sent to the Inspector of Poor of the Combination Parochial Board of Dundee, which had boarded certain pauper children with the pursuer, and the second to the Board of Supervision.

The following issues adjusted by the Lord Ordinary sufficiently indicate the nature of the slander complained of by the pursuer :—“(First) Whether the defender, on 16th October 1888, wrote and sent to Mr Thomas Brown, inspector of poor, Dundee, a letter in the terms contained in the schedule No. 1 hereto annexed; and whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously and maliciously represents him to be a man of such brutal character as to be unfit to have charge of children boarded out by the parochial authorities of Dundee under his guardianship, and that it was the duty of the parochial board forthwith to remove them, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (Second) Whether the defender, on 20th November 1888, wrote and sent to the Board of Supervision a letter in the terms contained in the schedule No. 2 hereto annexed; and whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously and maliciously represents him as keeping a baby-farming establishment, and as being a man unfit for the guardianship of parochial children, as systematically ill-treating and starving them, and as being a drunkard and a worthless character, and as being a disgrace to the district, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The defender moved the Court to vary the issues by adding the words “and without probable cause” after the word “maliciously.”

Argued for the defender;—The defender had written the letters complained of in the exercise of his duty as minister of the parish. Consequently he was not to be made liable in damages, even though the statements in the letters were untrue, unless they were made without probable cause.<sup>1</sup> No. 140.

Argued for the pursuer;—A defender was entitled to have the words "without probable cause" added only if he had a right and title to put in motion judicial proceedings. If the case was one of mere privilege, the defender was entitled only to have the word "maliciously" inserted.<sup>2</sup> The present case belonged to the latter and not the former class.

June 14, 1889.
Croucher v.
Inglist.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer is a person residing in the parish of Auchterhouse in Forfarshire, who calls himself a general dealer, by which, I suppose, is meant a hawker, and the defender is the minister of the parish. The ground of the pursuer's complaint is that the defender wrote two letters—one to the inspector of poor of Dundee, and the other to the members of the Board of Supervision—containing certain statements regarding the pursuer, which prima facie are certainly very slanderous. These had reference to the condition of certain children who had been boarded out by the Dundee Parochial Board with the pursuer. These letters are couched in exceedingly strong terms, and, as I have said, are prima facie undoubtedly libellous. As put in issue, they impute to the defender that in the letter to the inspector of poor he represented the pursuer "to be a man of such brutal character as to be unfit to have charge of children boarded out by the parochial authorities of Dundee under his guardianship"; and in the letter to the Board of Supervision he represented him "as keeping a baby-farming establishment, and as being a man unfit for the guardianship of parochial children, as systematically ill-treating and starving them, and as being a drunkard and a worthless character."

These are in substance the issues which must go to the jury, and the Lord Ordinary has determined that the word "maliciously" must be inserted in both of them. But the defender contends that he is entitled to have the words "and without probable cause" also inserted. That is the point which we have now to decide.

It appears to me that the sort of privilege which entitles a defender to have these words inserted in issue in a case like the present depends a good deal upon the character in which the defender was acting when the conduct complained of took place. The most ordinary cases are those of alleged malicious prosecution, or of a person giving information to the police of his belief that a crime has been committed. The present is not an exactly parallel case to these, but I think it falls to be ruled by the same principles. There can be no question that it is a duty incumbent upon every citizen to give information to the police when a crime has been committed, and to impart any knowledge that he has as to the offender, and accordingly every person in so communicating his belief is surrounded by the protection which is involved in the use of the words "want of probable cause" in the issue or issues.

In the present case the defender is a public official. He is the minister

<sup>1</sup> Forbes v. Gibson, Dec. 18, 1850, 13 D. 341; Gibb v. Barron, July 1, 1859, 21 D. 1099; Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, 3 R. 441; Kinnes v. Adam & Sons, March 8, 1882, 9 R. 698; Lightbody v. Gordon, June 15, 1882, 9 R. 934; Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, 14 R. 1057; Shaw v. Morgan, July 11, 1888, 15 R. 865.

<sup>2</sup> Davies v. Brown & Lyell, June 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 842.

No. 140.

June 14, 1889.
Croucher v.
Iuglia.

of the parish, and is charged with its well-being, and with the care of the morals of his parishioners. If, acting in such capacity, he gave information to the proper authorities of facts which came within his knowledge, it appears to me that he must be entitled to the same protection which surrounds those who give information to the police in such circumstances as I have mentioned. The Parochial Board of Dundee was the body under whose guardianship these children were placed, and in the exercise of their administration they boarded out the children with the pursuer. Accordingly, if the defender thought he was called upon to give information as to his knowledge of the state of the children, the parochial board was clearly the proper authority to whom to give it, and, failing them, the Board of Supervision was the appropriate tribunal to which to resort for the same purpose. Accordingly, so far as regards the authorities to whom the minister had recourse in communicating the facts which he states came within his knowledge, the defender did quite rightly.

In communicating the facts, it seems to me that the defender is entitled to the same protection as a person who gives information to the police as to the commission of a criminal offence. The circumstance that it turns out afterwards that the offence was never committed will not deprive the person who has given the information of the protection to which I have referred. So in the present case, it is not necessary for the defender to take an issue of veritas. Apart altogether from that, he may have been justified in giving the information he did to the proper authorities. I am therefore of opinion that he is entitled to have the words he desires put in issue.

It was urged that if a person in the position of a minister was entitled to have want of probable cause put in issue, the same rule must apply equally to every other citizen. That is a question upon which at present I do not offer any opinion. It may or may not be so, for the question must depend upon different considerations. But there can be no doubt of the duty of a parish minister, and I confine my ground of judgment here to that individual case.

LORD SHAND.—In the case of Lightbody v. Gordon, 9 R. 934, the Court had occasion to deal with the principles which fall to be applied in cases where criminal informations have been lodged with the authorities and actions of damages follow. It was there held that the person who seeks damages in such a case must take an issue that the defender acted not only maliciously but without probable cause. The ground of that judgment was that where a public duty is imposed upon a citizen, and prima facie in the exercise of that duty he proceeds to give information to the proper authority, or causes the apprehension of an alleged offender, the person so acting is presumed to have done so in perfect bona fides. If the law were different, the result would be that the ends of justice might often be frustrated. Accordingly, the pursuer in such an action has to prove that the defender acted not only maliciously, but also that the charge was made without any good or probable grounds.

The principle of the judgment in that case applies fully to the present case. When a person has reason to believe that a crime has been committed it is his duty and his right to inform the police. In the present case, the defender states that he had reason to believe that certain children who were out of the charge of their parents and in the custody of strangers were being cruelly used, and he accordingly gave information to the parochial board, and failing action by them he renewed his information in a letter which he wrote to the Board of Supervision. I think that the defender, as minister of the parish, was acting on what was his duty and his right in giving that information. No. 140.

For my own part, I am not prepared to say that I can draw a distinction between the duty of a minister of a parish in such a case and the duty of any other citizen—say a minister of another denomination or anyone else—who may see such things taking place which he feels bound to report to the proper quarter. Where there is a duty or rather a right to do so, the law will assume that the representation is made in bona fide, and that it is made for the protection of society, or, as in the present case, in the interests of the children concerned. The issue which the pursuer takes must therefore embrace malice and want of probable cause. June 14, 1889.
Croucher v.
Inglis.

Whether, if the information were given ultroneously and to other than the proper authorities, the same result would follow, is a different question. But where it has been given to the authorities who are bound to put a stop to it, if the information is correct, I am of opinion that the rule which was laid down in the case of Lightbody must apply.

LORD ADAM.—I think that the words “want of probable cause” ought to be inserted in the issue in a case of this kind, where the person called as defender had a right or duty to do the act complained of, where, for instance, he gave information to the police, or perhaps proceeded to the use of diligence. In the present case, I concur in your Lordship’s view that there was on the part of this defender not only a right, but also a duty to give the information he did to the authorities in question, if he saw that the pauper children who had been put in the pursuer’s custody were being ill-used, as he says they were. If he had that duty, I think he is entitled to have the words “want of probable cause” put in the issue. Whether there is a similar duty upon every member of the community to give such information is a question which does not arise in the present case. I am rather inclined to agree in the view which Lord Shand has taken, but I desire to reserve any definite opinion on the point until the question actually arises.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE words “and without probable cause” were inserted in each issue after the word “maliciously.”

JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—GUILD & SHEPHERD, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS ANNE MARY STEPHEN (Stephen’s Trustee), Appellant (Respondent). No. 141.
—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

ROBERT PALMER JENKINS (Macdougall & Company’s Trustee), Respondent June 14, 1889.
(Appellant).—Gloag—Low—P. J. Blair. Stephen’s
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.’s Trustee.

Partnership—Liability of assumed partner for debts incurred prior to assumption—Bankruptcy.—A creditor lent money to a firm on the security of certain heritable subjects belonging to it—the obligation for repayment being granted by the firm and by its two partners. The money was expended upon the erection of buildings upon the ground, which were used partly as business premises, and partly as a house for the manager. Three years later the two partners proposed to take a new partner, and a new contract of copartnership was executed for carrying on the business in the same firm name as before by the three partners. The contract contained a stipulation that the new firm should have no concern with the debts due to or by the old firm. The right to the security subjects

No. 141. was not transferred to the new firm, which paid a rent to the old firm for the use of the premises occupied by them, and the creditor in the bond knew nothing of the change of partnership. The actings of the new firm were in keeping with the provisions of the contract of copartnership—sets of books being kept for each of the old and new firms, and payments of debts due by the old firm being entered to its debit. On the bankruptcy of the new firm, held that the heritable creditor was not entitled to rank in the sequestration.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Inverness-shire.
M.

By bond and disposition in security, dated 27th and 28th May 1879, “Messrs Macdougall & Company, of the Royal Clan Tartan Warehouse in Inverness and of Sackville Street, London,” and “Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan, both drapers in Inverness, the individual partners of said firm, both as partners thereof and as individuals,” granted them to have borrowed and received from Mrs Anne Mary Stephen, as testamentary trustee of the deceased Reverend Thomas Stephen, of Kinloss, Morayshire, her late husband, the sum of £3500, “which sum we bind ourselves, conjunctly and severally, and the heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever of us, the said individuals, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to repay.” The subjects over which the security extended belonged to and were vested in the two partners individually, for behoof of the firm “as now existing, and to the survivor of them, for himself, and for the representatives of his predeceasing partner in the said firm.”

In 1882 Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan, who up to that date had been the only two partners of the firm of Macdougall & Company, assumed Mr Donald Macbean as a partner under deed of copartnership, dated 15th June and 26th August of that year.*

---

* The contract of copartnership, inter alia, bore,—“Whereas the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan have, for a considerable time, carried on business as drapers in Inverness, with a branch establishment in London under the firm of Macdougall & Company, and it has been arranged that the said Donald Macbean shall be assumed as a partner, and a new firm constituted: Therefore the said parties do contract and agree as follows:—

“1. The said parties agree to be copartners in carrying on a drapery business similar to that now carried on by the existing firm of Macdougall & Company, under the same name or firm of Macdougall & Company.

“2. The partnership shall commence at 1st June 1882, and shall endure for the period of ten years from that date.

“3. The said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan shall grant a lease to the new firm (that is the firm hereby constituted) of the warehouse and premises in High Street, Inverness, occupied by the old firm (that is, the firm of Macdougall & Company heretofore existing), including the dwelling-house presently occupied by the said Robert Grant, for the period of ten years from the said 1st day of June 1882, at the yearly rent of £450 sterling, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday. The said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan shall also assign to the new firm the lease of the shop and premises in Sackville Street, London, occupied by the old firm. The new firm will pay the future rents and assume the whole burden of the lease.

“4. The capital of the company shall be £10,000, of which the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan shall each contribute £3750, and the said Donald Macbean £2500. The shares of the partners in the profits and losses and in the capital shall be—of the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan, three-eighths each, and of the said Donald Macbean, two-eighths.

“5. The new firm shall take over the whole stock and warehouse-fittings and furniture in Inverness and London of the old firm, and pay for goodwill and the London lease. The stock shall be at once taken by the parties themselves, and the value ascertained and fixed. The value of the warehouse-fittings and furniture is agreed to be £2000, of the London lease £2000, and of the goodwill of

On 25th March 1887 the estates of Macdougall & Company and of the three partners were sequestrated by the Sheriff-substitute of Inverness-shire (Blair), and Mr Robert Palmer Jenkins was appointed trustee. No. 141.

Mrs Stephen thereupon lodged a claim in the sequestration for a sum of £583, which she alleged represented the probable deficiency which would arise upon her loan after deducting the value of her security. In her claim she asked to be ranked in the sequestrations of Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellennan. Macbean's name was omitted, but it was afterwards stated that this omission was due to an oversight, and the case was argued on the footing that the claim had been amended to the effect of including Macbean's name as a partner of the firm subsequently to 1882. June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

The security subjects were burdened with heritable bonds amounting in toto to £14,500, and all entitled to a pari passu ranking. They were ultimately sold on 1st May 1888 for £11,600.

The trustee, upon 6th June 1888, pronounced this deliverance on the claim lodged by Mrs Stephen:—" . . . Finds (1) That the heritable property in question belonged at the date of the sequestration to the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellennan, as carrying on business under the firm of Macdougall & Company in the year 1879, and up till 1882. (2) That at 1882, Mr Donald Macbean was taken into partnership by the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellennan, and the new firm of Macdougall & Company, being the firm now under sequestration, was then formed, the three partners being Mr Grant, Mr Maclellennan, and Mr Macbean. (3) That the heritable property in question over which the claimant holds security was never transferred by the said Mr Grant and Mr Maclellennan and the old firm of Macdougall & Company to the firm of Macdougall & Company as in existence at the date of the sequestration, and the three partners thereof, and that further no bond of corroboration was ever granted to the claimant by the firm of Macdougall & Company as existing at the date of the sequestration, or the partners thereof. (4) That in the books of Macdougall & Company, from the date of the formation of the new firm till the date of sequestration, the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellennan, and the old firm of Macdougall & the business, £2500. The sum of £6500 shall therefore be added to the value of the stock in ascertaining the sum payable by the new firm to the members of the old firm.

" 6. As the capital of the new firm will not be sufficient to pay the whole value of the assets taken over from the old firm, including the value of the London lease and goodwill, the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellennan will allow the surplus value, which is hereby declared to be £3927, 17s. 11d., to remain in the hands of the new firm until it can conveniently repay the same, the new firm paying interest thereon (accumulated annually if unpaid) at the rate of five per cent per annum half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday: For all other advances made by any partner to the new firm, and for all sums due to any partner by the new firm, from time to time, interest shall be paid to such partner by the new firm, at the rate of five per cent per annum, and all interest unpaid shall be accumulated annually with the principal advance or debt. . . .

" 8. The new firm shall have no concern with the debts due to or by the old firm. No commission or charge shall be made by the new firm for the collection and payment of the said debts, which will be done in the firm's premises. . . .

" 10. Books shall be kept and balanced annually according to the practice of the late firm. . . ."

No. 141. Company, as in existence prior to 1882, were treated as proprietors of the whole block of property, including the portion over which the claimant holds security, and that the firm of Macdougall & Company as sequestrated was charged annually by the old firm £450 as the rent of the premises occupied by them. (5) That in the claim lodged it is set forth that the property belongs to Mr Grant and Mr Maclellan. (6) That the claimant holds no personal obligation from, and has therefore no claim against the firm of Macdougall & Company, as sequestrated on 25th March 1887, but has a claim against the private estates of the said Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan. (7) Finds that the claim as against the sequestrated firm of Macdougall & Company falls to be rejected in toto. Therefore rejects the claim accordingly."

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

Mrs Stephen appealed to the Sheriff of Inverness-shire.

She stated, inter alia ;—" . . . (3) The appellant's loan was secured upon the heritable property in Lombard Street, Inverness, belonging to Macdougall & Company, and vested in the partners, Messrs Grant and Maclellan. This property was originally purchased by the funds of Macdougall & Company, and was rebuilt with monies raised by the firm. The property was always treated as an asset of the firm, the rents were drawn by the firm, and immixed with the firm's general funds, and the taxes, repairs, and other charges upon the property were from first to last paid out of the general funds of the firm. (4) It is now averred on behalf of the respondent that in the year 1882 Mr Donald Macbean, of Sackville Street, London, was assumed by Messrs Grant and Maclellan as a partner in the firm of Macdougall & Company, and that a new firm was thereby constituted different from the firm of Macdougall & Company which granted the said bond and disposition in security. . . . (5) The assumption of Mr Macbean as a partner was not notified to the public in any way, and in point of fact was practically kept a secret, so far as Inverness was concerned. He appeared to be an assistant in the London business, but in truth the bondholders did not even know of his existence. . . . The firm, it now appears, was hopelessly insolvent before 1882, and it is believed and averred that there never was any real alteration in the firm, and that the so-called assumption of Mr Macbean as a partner was simply a device for procuring money from persons outside the business. Mr Macbean had been for a number of years a shopman in the London shop, and had no means of his own. (6) After 1882 the firm continued as before to draw the rents of, and pay the rates and taxes upon the heritable property just as before, and the interests on the bonds were paid out of the firm's general funds as before. . . . (10) Notwithstanding the alleged change of firm, the debts owing by the firm at the date of the alleged change were paid by the alleged new firm out of the proceeds of their business, and the debts due to the old firm were collected and discharged by the alleged new firm. There was an absolute and entire continuity in the firm's affairs."

She pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The bond and disposition founded on having been granted by Macdougall & Company as a firm, the appeal ought to be sustained. (2) The firm having been carried on after the alleged assumption of Macbean as a partner without any winding-up, or any notification to the appellant or the public of a change, and with the same stock and generally the same assets and liabilities, the firm, even if altered, assumed or continued to be liable for the obligations of the old firm.

Macdougall & Company's trustee pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The bond and disposition in security not having been granted by the bankrupt firm, the appellant has no claim against the estate of that firm. (3) The bankrupt firm not having adopted the debts or obligations of the old firm, or taken over the assets of that firm, the claim now under appeal ought to be rejected. (6) The amount due the appellant not being a trade debt, the bankrupt is, in any event, not liable for the same.

A proof was led, from which it appeared that the bulk of the money which had been advanced upon the security had been spent in the erection of buildings upon the ground; that they were afterwards occupied partly as business premises and partly by Mr Grant, the partner who managed the business, as a dwelling-house, and the buildings so occupied were entered in the rental-books at £450 a-year, and that the rents were credited to the old firm; that no intimation was made to Mrs Stephen of the change in the firm, which had not been made public except by trade advertisements, and in two local newspapers; that two sets of books were kept after the new partnership was entered into, and the transactions of the two firms were thus kept entirely distinct;*

No. 141.
June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustees.

* Mr Grant, one of the partners, who was examined for the appellant, deposed in cross,—“At the time we entered into this new partnership we did so in the full belief that the old firm was perfectly solvent, and no doubt Mr Macbean was of the same opinion. The bond and disposition in security granted by Mr Maclellan and myself in 1879 was prepared by Messrs Stewart, Rule, and Burns, as agents for Mrs Stephen, and they collected the interests on the bond for Mrs Stephen until our sequestration. Messrs Stewart, Rule, and Burns were also my own agents, and they prepared the contract between Mr Macbean, Mr Maclellan, and myself. . . . The provisions in the contract, so far as keeping our books are concerned, were carried out by us. We kept correct books from the date of the contract until the sequestration, and whatever the books shew is, so far as I know, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, correct, and they exhibit a true state of the affairs of both firms from time to time. Although the new firm was started in 1882 the old firm still existed so far as the collecting of the debts and so far also as the paying of the debts was concerned. (Q.) Is it the case that the heritable subjects in High Street and Lombard Street continue to be the property of the old firm? (A.) I believe so. The shop in High Street, where our business was carried on, was let by the old firm to the new firm at a rent of £450. There was no formal lease. If the new firm did not pay this rent year after year to the old firm they would be charged with it in the books; that is, the new firm would be debited, and the old firm credited with the amount. (Q.) In June 1882, after the contract was entered into, did the new firm open an account in their books with the old firm? (A.) I have no doubt they did; but the books will shew it. (Q.) And if the new firm received any money in payment of accounts due to the old firm, how was that money entered? (A.) That money would go into the general funds of the business, and be accounted for by the new firm to the old. It would be placed to the credit of the old firm in the new firm's books. On the other hand, when the new firm paid money on behalf of the old firm the old firm would be debited with the amount, and that continued to be done up to the date of our sequestration. There were also two separate bank accounts.”

The following is an extract from the report of an examination of the books of the firm by Mr R. F. Cameron, C.A. :—“ . . . The books gone over by me shew that following on the contract the new firm was created, and all along recognised as totally different from the old firm, and that the above conditions were in every particular strictly adhered to. So fully was the distinction between the old firm and the new firm drawn that separate cash-books, ledgers, &c., and even a separate bank account were opened and kept for the new firm, these containing the transactions incident on the continuance of the business proper or trading of the new copartnership, while the old firm's books merely record the winding up of the original business, and receipts and charges in connection with the heritable properties and bonds, regular balance-sheets, and

No. 141. that rents derived from the security subjects down to the date of the sequestration were collected by the firm, and receipts given for them, which were written out in the same way before and after June 1882. It appeared that in the original state of affairs in the sequestration the heritable property was included as belonging to the new firm.

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair), on 16th March 1889, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the company of Macdougall & Company, whose estates were sequestrated on 25th March 1887, having taken over at 1st June 1882 the whole business and assets of the going business of the firm of Macdougall & Company, did thereby also assume the liabilities of the said firm, and among others the debt due to the appellant, Mrs Anne Mary Stephen, as a creditor of the said firm: Finds that the sum claimed by the appellant, after deducting the proceeds of the security held by her, amounts to £700, and that the appellant is entitled to be ranked on the sequestrated estate of the said Macdougall & Company on account thereof: Therefore sustains the appeal against the trustee's deliverance, and ordains the trustee to rank the said Anne Mary Stephen, appellant, on the said sequestrated estate accordingly."

Macdougall & Company's trustee appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There were certain facts in this case which distinguished it from previous cases which had been relied upon by the appellant. 1. There was a stipulation in the contract of copartnery of the new firm that it was to have "no concern with the debts due to or by the old firm," and the books of the two firms were kept quite distinct. Although debts due by the old firm were frequently paid by the new firm, the sums so paid were always debited to the old firm. 2. The new company did not take over the property of the old company. 3. The new company were not the owners of the property over which the security was granted. The title to the property, as appearing upon the security title, was in favour of Grant and Maclellan only in trust for the old company. The money advanced by Mrs Stephen was a mere investment, and the lender did not look to the stock in trade as a security. Upon the terms of the bond Macbean was not in any way liable, and the parole evidence was not admissible to construe its terms. It was a strong thing to say that Macbean agreed to become liable for the debt when neither he nor Mrs Stephen were examined as witnesses on either side. Even if the new company profit and loss accounts, copies of which are annexed, were made out yearly for each firm, shewing clearly their non-identity, and it is important to note that neither the heritable properties nor the bonds affecting them ever appear in the balance-sheets of the new firm, while, on the other hand, they are invariably included in the balance-sheets of the old firm, and the relative rents and interest are shewn in the profit and loss accounts of that firm. It may be added, that as provided in the contract, and noted above, the old firm collected the book debts outstanding at June 1882, and retained the sole burden of the liabilities then subsisting, with the exception of an overdraft from the Royal Bank, the responsibility for which was taken over by the new firm in 1885.

---

"Not only were these distinctions between the two firms maintained, but even transactions between them were entered in both sets of books, in the one set as a receipt, and in the other as a payment. Thus when, as was frequently the case, one firm had not available funds to meet a pressing obligation, and the payment was made out of moneys belonging to the other firm, the transaction was regarded as an advance by the one firm to the other, and was passed in the way indicated through both sets of books. Further, interest was periodically charged or allowed to one firm on the balance in favour of or against the other firm. . . ."

had agreed to take over the debt of the old company, there must be an express agreement between the creditor and the new company before the former could have a right of action.<sup>1</sup> 4. This was in no sense of the word a trade debt. If it were possible for a company to incur a debt which was not a trade one, this had been done here.

No. 141.
June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

The fact was that the actings of the new company were entirely in keeping with the provisions of the contract of copartnery. These had been carried out to the letter. Mr Cameron's report upon the books of the firm was uncontradicted.

Argued for Mr Stephen's trustee;—By the terms of the bond there was an obligation upon the company to repay the loan, and accordingly the presumption was that the company as constituted when the obligation came to be put in force was liable.<sup>2</sup> The loan in question was a trade debt of the firm. The money had been employed in the erection of buildings for the firm, a portion of these buildings being used as a manager's house. The debt was in no sense a private debt of the old firm.<sup>3</sup> There was evidence to shew that all the debts of the old firm, with the exception of the bond over the security subjects in question, had either been paid by or ranked upon the estate of the new firm. This was the only debt which the new firm repudiated, and all its other creditors had been paid off, to the prejudice of the respondent. The provision in the contract of copartnery of the new firm that it was to have no concern with the debts of the old firm could not affect the case, for the respondent was in ignorance of the contract and its terms. Further, its terms had not been carried out by the parties. For instance, the old firm had no separate bank account, except for a short period after the new firm came into existence; the new firm always granted receipts for the rents in its own name; and it paid the interest on the bonds. Besides originally, as shewing what the view of the parties themselves was, the heritable property was included in the state of affairs in the sequestration. The same thing had occurred in Heddlie's case.<sup>4</sup> It was no doubt true that sums paid by the new firm were debited to the old firm in their books, but these were mere book entries, and could not affect the substance of the transaction. Lord Chancellor Eldon had stated the law thus:—"If one man having debts takes another into partnership with him, a very little matter respecting those debts will make both liable."<sup>5</sup>

At advising,—

LORD SHAND.—At the term of Whitsunday 1879 Mrs Anne Mary Stephen, the respondent in this appeal, who claims to be ranked in the sequestration, lent the sum of £3500 to Messrs Macdougall & Company, and to Robert Grant and Alexander Maclellan, the individual partners of that firm, obtaining in return a bond and disposition in security in her favour, by which the firm and its two partners bound themselves for payment of the debt, and Grant and Maclellan, being themselves infert in certain heritable property belonging to them for behoof of their firm, of which they were the sole partners, conveyed the property in security in ordinary terms for payment of the debt. The sum advanced was <sup>1</sup> Ex parte Parker, in re Samuel Stocks, 1842, 2 Montagu, Deacon, and De Gex, Bankruptcy Cases, 511; Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed. 208.

<sup>2</sup> M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees, July 9, 1887, 14 R. 918.

<sup>3</sup> Miller v. Thorburn, Jan. 22, 1861, 23 D. 359, 33 Scot. Jur. 180.

<sup>4</sup> Heddlie's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee, June 1, 1888, 15 R. 698; cf. M'Keand v. Laird, March 30, 1861, 23 D. 846.

<sup>5</sup> Ex parte Jackson, 1790, 1 Vesey jr., 130, Lord Chancellor Eldon, p. 132.

No. 141. to a large extent laid out in the erection of buildings on the ground embraced in the security, and, according to the estimated value of the property at the time, the heritable security was ample for the payment of the respondent's debt.

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

Down to 1st June 1882 Grant and Maclellan continued to carry on their business of Macdougall & Company, which had existed for a number of years, both in Inverness and London, and they paid half-yearly the interest on the respondent's security, as well as the interest on other similar securities which they had granted in return for loans on adjoining properties held by them in the same way, and some of which were occupied by them for the purposes of their business down to that time. At that date they agreed to take into partnership Mr Macbean, who had been for about twenty years an assistant in the London business. A regular contract of copartnership was entered into, and from that date the business of Macdougall & Company was carried on under the same name by the three partners—Grant, Maclellan, and Macbean. This new company continued to carry on business for five years, but in March of 1887 the estates of the company and of the three individual partners were sequestrated.

The respondent claims to be ranked as a creditor of this later company for the debt constituted by the bond and disposition in security of 1879 in her favour, and the Sheriff-substitute, reversing the deliverance of the trustee in the sequestration, has sustained the claim to be ranked. After consideration of a full argument, I have come to the conclusion without difficulty that the judgment complained of should be reversed, and that the respondent's claim to be ranked should be refused.

The bond and disposition in security founded on was not granted by the company which came into existence in 1882, or by the partners of that firm, and of course it is incumbent on the respondent to aver and prove either an express undertaking by the later firm and its partners of liability for the debt, or facts and circumstances in the course of dealing of the parties which shew that this firm and its partners undertook such liability. The respondent's affidavit and claim sets forth no ground of liability, for it merely founds on the bond and disposition in security, which of course could contain no obligation by a company which only came into existence three years after that deed was granted. The claim as stated was one which the trustee in the sequestration would have been quite warranted in rejecting simpliciter, because it disclosed no ground of liability of the bankrupt company, but an appeal having been taken against the trustee's deliverance, a record by minutes was made up in the Sheriff Court, from which it appears that the claimant maintained that the bankrupt company "assumed or continued to be liable for the obligations of the old firm," and was therefore liable in payment of her debt. The facts mainly relied on as averred by the respondent were that the money lent by her was received by the firm in 1879, and mixed up with their general funds, and used for the general purpose of their business—that the assumption of Mr Macbean as a partner was not published to the world—that the money which he was said to have put into the business was really got by loans obtained by the firm from third parties, that "there never was any real alteration in the firm, and that there was a mere continuity of the old firm's business"—the new firm taking over the assets of the old firm on the one hand, and assuming liability for its debts and obligations on the other. And the authorities on which the claim was maintained were cases of which the most recent and important were the cases of Hedde, 15 R. 698, and M'Keand, 23 D. 846, in both of which the No. 141. judgments proceeded on the view that there had been no real change in the copartnery beyond the assumption of a partner who obtained a small share of a going business without putting in new capital, and where the new firm went on to trade with the stock and assets of the old firm, taking these over without any arrangement for the winding-up of the old company's affairs, or for an accounting with the old firm or its partners, but undertaking liability for all the old company's debts and obligations.

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

It appears to me to be clear, on a consideration of the proof adduced by both parties, that the respondent has entirely failed to prove her material averments, and that the facts proved are in striking contrast with the facts held to be established in the class of cases to which I have alluded, and which in these cases were the ground of judgment.

1. In the first place, the nature of the debt and obligation are of considerable importance. There was no doubt an obligation for repayment of the loan granted by the old firm, and by Grant and Maclellan. But the transaction was substantially the taking of a heritable security on a permanent loan, and the lender looked mainly to the value of the property conveyed as the means of payment. As to the proceeds of the loan Mr Grant, the claimant's witness, says,—“The bulk of it was paid to the contractors for the buildings as they proceeded.” The debt cannot be regarded as in any sense a proper trade debt, like debts due to merchants supplying stock, or to bankers on a firm's banking transactions, and so is not one of a class for which it is at all probable that a new firm or company would undertake liability.

2. It is quite clear that not only the title to the heritable property which is the subject of the security, but the right to the property itself all along remained with Grant and Maclellan and the old company, of which they were the sole partners. Although immediately after the sequestration there seems to have been some confusion in the minds of certain of the bankrupts, and even of the trustee, or rather perhaps I should say in the minds of their advisers, as to the rights of proprietorship of the heritable properties, which truly belonged to the old firm and its partners, and part of which was occupied by the new firm, there can be no doubt that the right to these properties never was transferred to the new firm or its partners. It would be remarkable in these circumstances if the new firm were found to have accepted or adopted liability for a number of bonds over subjects in which they had no right of property or other interest. In any view, the case is not one in which, as in other leading cases, the new firm took over the whole property of the old firm and its partners, for these heritable properties, valued at upwards of £20,000, were not so taken over.

3. But, perhaps, of more importance still are the provisions of the contract of copartnery of 1882, which distinctly shew that the old company was to be wound up, and was to subsist for the purpose of being wound up, and that the new company was to be started on an entirely new basis, and was not to undertake any liability for the debts of the old company. Mr Macbean, the new partner, undertook to put £2500 into the business, as against £3750, the estimated capital of each of the other partners, and was to have a corresponding share of the profits. It is true that in order to enable him to raise the money his partners assisted him with their credit, but he became the principal obligant for the repayment of the loans, for which they were cautioners only. Then the new company took a lease of their premises from the old firm for the endurance

No. 141. of the partnership, being ten years, at a rent of £450, an arrangement which, in the most distinct manner, shewed how complete was the separation between the interests of the two firms, and that this separation was to be continuing and permanent. Finally and conclusively, the stock of the old firm was only taken over at a valuation made at the time, the amount of which the new firm became liable to pay to the partners of the old firm, interest on the amount to be charged against the new firm until it could conveniently repay the capital. And the contract expressly bore that "the new firm shall have no concern with the debts due to or by the old firm," a stipulation which is of course in its very terms and substance directly opposed to the whole idea on which the present action is based. It is unnecessary to notice the other provisions of the contract of copartnery, further than to say that there are subsidiary clauses providing for the keeping of books to be regularly balanced, that the new firm should make no charge of commission for the collection and payment of the old firm's debts, and, as to the London business, that the new firm should take over the lease of the London premises, and in that instance undertake the responsibility of the future rents. Taking the contract as a whole, I have only to observe that I could scarcely conceive a deed being more carefully framed for the purpose of distinguishing between the business and interests of an old company, and a new one formed to take up the old business, or in which it was made more clear that the new company did not take over the whole assets of the old, and only took over the stock at a price agreed on, and that the new company did not adopt or undertake liability for the debts of the old company.

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall &
Co.'s Trustee.

4. All this, however, might have been stipulated in writing only. The parties might in carrying on their business have disregarded their arrangement so carefully recorded, and have so acted or dealt with all the creditors as to accept universal liability for the old company's debts. But I find nothing in the proof to countenance such a suggestion. The contract was carried out so far as I can see in all its stipulations. From the formation of the new company in 1882 down to the sequestration there were two sets of books kept, one for the old firm and another for the new firm. Of course, it was in the books of the latter that the cash transactions, receipts, and payments were all in the first instance entered, but in every case where money was received or paid on account of debts due to or by the old firm, the amount was transferred to the books of the old firm to the credit or debit of that firm, as the case might be. In short, the old firm was treated as in liquidation of its trade debts and obligations, and as a company being wound up, and which when the debts due to and by the firm were paid would remain possessed only of its heritable property, subject to the bonds over it, the new firm acting as their agents in the winding-up. Mr Grant, the claimant's leading witness, says on this point:—"Messrs Stewart, Rule, & Burns were also my own agents, and they prepared the contract between Mr Macbean, Mr Maclellan, and myself. . . . The provisions in the contract, so far as keeping our books are concerned, were carried out by us. We kept correct books from the date of the contract until the sequestration, and whatever the books shew is, so far as I know, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, correct, and they exhibit a true state of the affairs of both firms from time to time. Although the new firm was started in 1882 the old firm still existed so far as the collecting of the debts and so far also as the paying of the debts was concerned. (Q.) Is it the case that the heritable subjects in High Street and Lombard Street continue to be the property of the old firm? (A.)

I believe so." The rents of the heritable properties collected by the new firm No. 141.
or due by them to the old firm were entered to the old firm's credit, and the interests paid and outgoings for the properties were put to the old firm's debit, June 14, 1889. and these books were balanced annually by Mr Meston, an accountant from Stephen's Aberdeen, who went periodically to Inverness for the purpose. It is needless Trustee v.
to pursue this subject farther than to say that the evidence of Mr Cameron, Macdougall & accountant, including his report on the books, shews that the provisions of the Co.'s Trustee.
contract were carried out in every particular. It is true that in the end a very large amount of the debts due to the old firm proved bad and were not paid, and so the new firm made large advances beyond their receipts for the old firm;
but this result, so far as I can see, was not anticipated, and in any case does not detract from the fact that the contract was acted on.

All this being so, I have really great difficulty in seeing on what grounds the claimant can say that the debt due to her was adopted by the new company, i.e. that the new company, in the face of the agreement to the contrary between the firms, undertook liability for that debt. The claimant and the new company had no dealings or communication relating to any such liability. It is said the firm undertook responsibility for other debts,—for the balance due to the bank, and for the ordinary trade debts,—which were indeed paid off by the new firm. As to the debt to the bank, the mode in which that was dealt with is a very good illustration of what alone will generally give a creditor a legal right or obligation against a new firm. The bank's agent, having learned that a new partner had been assumed and a new company started, became alive to the necessity of having an obligation granted by the new firm for the bank's debt, and having pressed for this—intimating no doubt that a refusal would result in a stoppage of the bank account—he obtained the obligation he desired. The claimant has nothing of the kind in any transaction with her. Then, as to the ordinary trade creditors, most of them had furnished goods to the old firm; and the new firm continued to deal with them. In the course of such dealing the old and new accounts as in a question with the creditors were treated as one continuous series of accounts (though the payments made, in so far as made for the old firm, were placed to their debit); and in this way, as also in the case of bills current when the new firm began and afterwards renewed by them, the new firm by their mode of dealing in each case undertook liability for the old debt. In the result the new firm not only expressly undertook liability for these debts, but, generally speaking, paid them off, incurring new debts which have been ranked on the sequestration, and in the end none of the old firm's trade debts were outstanding unpaid. But in the claimant's case no such dealings occurred.

The only remaining point to which the claimant's counsel attached importance in the argument was that the new firm after 1882 regularly paid the interest on the claimant's bond, generally by the firm's cheques or bills, and the claimant had no notice of the change of partnership, and no knowledge of any change.
But as regards the interest so paid the amount was in fact at once carried to the debit of the old firm by the new firm, who merely acted as their agents in making the payments. It is said that, nevertheless, the claimant is entitled to hold that the new firm became her obligant in the capital sum. I know of no legal principle which can support that view. The failure to intimate to a creditor of the old firm that a new company had been formed cannot infer an undertaking of liability by the new company for the old firm's debts, and the creditor, who knew nothing of the change of partnership, cannot on any principle of law which

No. 141.

June 14, 1889.
Stephen's
Trustee v.
Macdougall
Co.'s Trustee

admits of being stated say that she acquired as a new debtor a partnership of which she knew nothing, because that new partnership paid the interest falling due on her bond under the arrangement between the two firms already fully stated. With such a contract of copartnery, acted on as I have stated, nothing short of a direct undertaking by deed or by dealing unequivocal in its character with the individual creditor could infer an undertaking of liability for a debt of the old firm. There was no such undertaking or dealing here, and therefore no such liability undertaken; and so I am clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute must be recalled, and the claim to rank must be rejected.

LORD ADAM and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and sustained the deliverance of the trustee.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—J. & A. F. ADAM, W.S.—Agents.

No. 142.

June 14, 1889.*
Semple v.
Wilson.

THOMAS SEMPLE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Murray.
JAMES WILSON, Defender (Respondent).—Gloag—J. C. Lorimer.

Sale—Payment—Conditional payment—Repetition.—S., a merchant, agreed to buy sixty tons of potatoes from a farmer. Subsequently he was informed by the seller that his crop and stock had been previously sequestrated at the instance of his landlord. S. thereupon entered into an agreement with the farmer, and with the landlord's factor, by which he agreed to prepay the price of the goods to the factor, to be applied in payment of the farmer's rent. S. sent a cheque for the amount to the factor, which he requested him to acknowledge "by receipt as per copy enclosed." This copy ran thus,—“Received from S. the sum of £120 in full payment of sixty tons of potatoes . . . . which I bind and oblige myself to deliver.” The factor retained and cashed the cheque, but refused to guarantee delivery of the goods. S. thereafter repudiated the contract, and raised an action against him for redelivery of the cheque, or for repayment of the amount thereof.

The Court held that as the pursuer had sent the cheque expressly on the understanding that the defender should guarantee delivery of the goods, the latter was not entitled to retain it or its proceeds, and ordered it to be repaid.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

1.

ON 2d November 1887 Thomas Semple, grain-merchant, Glasgow, bought sixty tons of potatoes from James MacAuslan, Kirkmichael Farm, Helensburgh, at 40s. per ton, for delivery up to 1st March 1888, payment to account to be made in eight days. MacAuslan's crop and stock had in the previous August been sequestrated at the instance of his landlords, who were the trustees of the late Sir James Colquhoun of Luss. He however obtained their permission to carry out the sale on condition that the price was paid to their factor, James Wilson, Helensburgh, to be applied in payment of rent then due.

Shortly after the sale, MacAuslan informed Semple of his position, and an agreement was entered into, to which they and Wilson the factor were parties, to the effect that Semple should pay the price of the potatoes to Wilson.

The account was accordingly sent to Semple, who on 18th November 1887, acting on his understanding of the above agreement, wrote in the following terms to Mr Wilson, enclosing a cheque in his favour for £120:—“Dear Sir,—I beg to enclose you herewith cheque value £120, in payment of potatoes, sixty tons 'Champions,' for which please acknowledge by No. 142. receipt as per copy enclosed.—I am, yours truly, THOMAS SEMPLE."

Copy receipt enclosed in above letter.—"£120.—Received from Mr Thomas Semple, grain-merchant, 57 West Nile Street, Glasgow, the sum of £120 stg., in full payment of sixty tons potatoes,—'Champion,' to be delivered free on rail at Helensburgh, in good order and condition, at time specified, from Mr James MacAuslan, farmer, Kirkmichael, which I bind and oblige myself to deliver. JAMES WILSON, factor for Luss Estate, Helensburgh. 18th November 1887." June 14, 1889.
Semple v.
Wilson.

Next day Wilson forwarded to Semple a receipt in these terms:—"Received by me, as factor for the trustees of the late Sir James Colquhoun, Bart., from Mr Thomas Semple, grain-merchant, 57 West Nile Street, Glasgow, the sum of £120 stg. (per cheque), being the price of sixty tons of 'Champion' potatoes, sold to him by Mr J. MacAuslan, farmer, Kirkmichael, to be delivered as per agreement entered into between the foresaid parties; and which sum of £120 stg. is applied by me towards liquidation of arrears of rent of the farm of Kirkmichael, due at and previous to Whitsunday 1887. JAS. WILSON, 19/11/87."

Semple wrote on the same day to Wilson as follows:—"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of this date, with discharged account for sixty tons potatoes; but would prefer to have something more definite with regard to delivery. They might turn out less than sixty tons, and might also be carelessly handled. I want a guarantee that I will get delivery of sixty tons in good order and condition; otherwise will not run the risk.—I am," &c.

On 30th November 1887 Semple again wrote to Wilson requesting an answer to his letter of the 19th.

On 2d December Wilson wrote to Semple,—"Dear Sir,—In reply to yours of 30th, I beg to say I cannot give a further guarantee regarding the sixty tons of potatoes bought by you from Mr MacAuslan, Kirkmichael.

"Are you afraid he will dispose of them elsewhere?—Yours," &c.

On 3d December Semple wrote to Wilson,—"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of yours of 2d inst. Very sorry if my previous notes should have left any impression that I was afraid of Mr James MacAuslan re-selling the potatoes. I am not in the least afraid of his doing so; but knowing that his stock and crop are under sequestration, I don't see my way to come under his obligation to deliver the potatoes. In other circumstances I would have had no objection. I must, therefore, request the guarantee necessary, as per receipt copy which accompanied my cheque for £120 stg., or to refund the money. Will wait your reply in due course."

No reply was sent to this letter, and Mr Wilson cashed the cheque.

On 22d March Semple wrote to Wilson, saying that he was prepared to take delivery of the potatoes, which he had sold for shipment to New York. As this letter was also ignored by Wilson, Semple repudiated the bargain, and on 5th June 1888 he raised this action against him in the Sheriff Court of Dumbarton for redelivery of the cheque, or failing redelivery, for payment of the amount, with interest.

The pursuer averred that he had only agreed to send the cheque on the understanding that MacAuslan and the defender had arranged that the latter was to become the seller, and was to further guarantee implement of MacAuslan's obligations. He further averred;—(Cond. 8) "The pursuer, assuming and holding the defender as having undertaken liability for implement of the contract, in respect he had retained the cheque on the conditions on which he had received it, wrote defender, on 22d March 1888, to that effect, and that he was ready to take delivery of the potatoes, and sent the defender 800 potato sacks, sufficient for the contract;

No. 142.
June 14, 1889.
Semple v.
Wilson.

and on two different occasions wrote the defender to get them filled with the sixty tons of potatoes, and put on rail at Helensburgh, addressed to the pursuer. But the defender took no notice of said request, and no portion of the said potatoes had been delivered to pursuer; by which failure the pursuer sustained additional loss and damage, for which he reserves his claim." (Cond. 9) "The defender has repeatedly been requested to grant the pursuer the receipt and obligation stipulated for in exchange for the cheque, or return it or the money to the pursuer, or to fulfil the contract; but he refuses or delays to do so; hence the present action has been rendered necessary."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having delivered to the defender the bank cheque for a specified purpose, and on special conditions, he was bound either to implement the contract and conditions, or to return the cheque to pursuer. (2) The defender having received the sum of £120 from the pursuer on the faith of his guaranteeing implement of the contract of sale, and having failed to do so, pursuer is entitled to repayment, with interest.

The defender averred that all he had undertaken was to guarantee that the pursuer should not be called upon to repeat payment of the £120, and that the sequestration should not be enforced in so far as the money was applied towards payment of the rent.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender having received pursuer's cheque, and applied its contents as arranged between the parties, is not liable in repetition thereof to the pursuer.

A proof was allowed, but it is unnecessary to give the evidence in detail, as the Court were of opinion that it was proved that the pursuer in sending the cheque to the defender understood the arrangement between MacAuslan and the defender to be such as entitled him to attach the condition to the cheque that the defender was to undertake responsibility for the delivery of the potatoes.

On 1st August 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) assoilzied the defender from the prayer of the petition.

On appeal, on 10th September, the Sheriff (Muirhead) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—When the contract of sale with MacAuslan was originally made, the pursuer was ignorant of the sequestration. The effect of that sequestration was to nullify the contract.<sup>1</sup> A new bargain was consequently made, and that was, not that the defender was to become the payee under the old bargain, but was to become payee under a new bargain. The new bargain, as the pursuer understood it, was that the defender was to become the seller, and to guarantee delivery in that capacity. It was on this understanding that the pursuer had sent the cheque with its relative obligation. When the defender was informed that such was the pursuer's intention in sending that cheque, he was not entitled to reject the condition and still retain the cheque.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the defender;—After the pursuer learned that the landlord had sequestered for rent, he did not annul the original contract of sale. All that he attempted to do was to get the defender to undertake obligations which were perfectly unreasonable. The alleged new bargain was simply, as far as the defender was concerned, an obligation on his part to remove any impediments which might be caused by the sequestration to the sale being properly carried out. The pursuer was aware that part of the arrangement was that the money was to be paid to the defender, to be applied in payment of rent due by MacAuslan. MacAuslan remained entitled to demand payment of the price, having made no assignation to the defender. In these circumstances the defender was quite entitled to keep the cheque and apply it in payment of MacAuslan's rent. No. 142.

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Prins. sec. 1244; Rankine on Leases, p. 355, and cases there cited.

<sup>2</sup> M'Gregor v. Alley & M'Lellan, March 4, 1887, 14 R. 535; Dominion Bank of Toronto v. Anderson, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. 408.

After the hearing, the Court ordered the case to be re-argued before five Judges.

June 14, 1889.
Semple v.
Wilson.

At advising,—

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK delivered the following opinion as the opinion of the Court:—

The Court having had the benefit of a re-hearing of this case, and the assistance of Lord Wellwood in considering it, are all of opinion that although the contract between MacAuslan and the pursuer may have continued to subsist, and might, with the consent of the defender, have warranted an assignation by MacAuslan of the right to demand payment of the price of the potatoes, it is proved that the pursuer, in sending his cheque to the defender, understood the arrangement between MacAuslan and the defender to be such as entitled him to attach the condition that the defender was to undertake responsibility for the delivery of the potatoes.

This being so, the Court is further of opinion that the defender, being informed that such was the pursuer's understanding, was not entitled both to reject the condition and to retain the cheque, but was only entitled, on discovering the misunderstanding, to withdraw his consent to the sale of the potatoes, and to fall back on his rights under the landlord's sequestration.

The judgment of the Court therefore will be to recall the interlocutors appealed from, and to decern in favour of the pursuer, with expenses.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the pursuer purchased the potatoes in question from James MacAuslan, and agreed to pay cash to account, subject to the condition that the defender, as representing the landlord, at whose instance MacAuslan had been sequestrated, should guarantee delivery of the same, and in sending the defender a cheque for the price stipulated that such guarantee should be granted; (2) that the defender retained and cashed the cheque, but refused to guarantee delivery of the potatoes: Find in law that the defender was not entitled to retain the cheque except upon the condition attached by the pursuer, and find accordingly that he is bound to repay to the pursuer the amount of the cheque, with interest, as concluded for: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against," &c.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—TAWSE & BONAR, W.S.—Agents.

ASSESSOR FOR COUNTY OF ARGYLL, Appellant.—Low.
MARQUIS OF BREADALBANE, Respondent.—Asher.

No. 143.

Valuation Acts—Remit to obtain further information—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), sec. 9.—The power conferred upon the Court by section 9† of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) June 14, 1889.*
Assessor for County of Argyll v.
Marquis of Breadalbane.

* Decided Jan. 30, 1889.

† The Act 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 42, sec. 9, inter alia, provides,—“ . . . .
The said Judges . . . may, if they think fit to do so, remit the case to the Commissioners or Magistrates by whom it was stated, with such instructions as the said Judges may consider necessary for having the case more fully stated.”

No. 143. Amendment Act, 1879, to remit a case, for further information, to the Commissioners or Magistrates by whom it has been stated, is limited to such matters as a mistake committed in the statement of the case, the setting forth specific details of matters stated generally, or the correction of a judgment of the Valuation Committee refusing to allow competent, or admitting incompetent, evidence.

June 14, 1889.
Assessor for County of Argyll v.
Marquis of Breadalbane.

An appellant in a valuation appeal moved the Court, in terms of the 9th section of the above Act, to remit the case to the Valuation Committee to take further evidence. Information of the facts which he desired to prove was in his possession when the case was before the Commissioners, and he failed to lead evidence thereof, or to move for an adjournment of the case to another diet to enable him to prove them.

The Court refused the motion.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Fraser.
Lord Trayner.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County of Argyll, held at Oban on 13th September 1888, to dispose of appeals against the valuation of lands and heritages by the county assessor, for the year ending Whitsunday 1889, the Marquis of Breadalbane appealed against the following entries:—

Case No. 96.

No.	Description of Subject.	Proprietor.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
9,678	Blackmount Deer Forest and Lodge Shooting and Grazing	PARISH OF ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN. The Marquis of Breadalbane	Proprietor	£720
10,132	Do.	PARISH OF GLENORCHY AND INNISHAEL. The Marquis of Breadalbane	Do.	£1860

The appellant contended that the present case was ruled by the case of Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart (the Dalness case),<sup>1</sup> and that accordingly £15 for each stag which might be killed should be adopted as the basis of the value of the forest. This value had proceeded upon a report submitted to the Committee of the values placed upon deer forests in Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland.

The Assessor contended that the Dalness case could not establish, and was not intended to establish, any general rule. The valuation was arrived at on the evidence of Mr N. B. Mackenzie, solicitor, Fort-William, as to what had been done in the counties of Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland, and was entirely incorrect. No such rule had been adopted in these counties, and, as matter of fact, in no case was there a forest valued at less than £20 per stag, while certain forests were let at much higher rates. He proposed to read and put in letters he had received from the Assessors of the counties in question. Counsel for the appellant objected on the ground that the writers could have been obtained as witnesses. The Committee sustained the objection to the reading of the letters, but agreed to admit the Assessor's statement as a witness as to material facts which he had ascertained. No other evidence was adduced by the Assessor in support of his statement, and the material facts relied on by him were denied by the appellant.

<sup>1</sup> Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart, March 15, 1888, 15 R. 588.

The Committee found the number of stags the forest was capable of producing, one year with another, to be 100, and fixed the valuation at £15 per stag for 100 stags = £1500, with £2 per head for 40 cattle grazed in the forest. They therefore directed the valuation of £720 in the parish of Ardhattan and Muckairn to be reduced to £440, and the valuation of £1860 in the parish of Glenorchy and Innishael to be reduced to £1140. The Assessor took a case, from which the above narrative of facts is taken.

No. 143.

June 14, 1889.
Assessor for County of Argyll v.
Marquis of Breadalbane.

Counsel for the Assessor moved the Court to remit the case back to the Valuation Committee to hear further evidence.

LORD FRASER.—In this case, which deals with the valuation of the Black-mountain Deer Forest and Lodge, and the shooting and the grazing belonging to the Marquis of Breadalbane, the parties are at issue in regard to simply the amount at which each should be stated in the Valuation-roll. In the case of Dalness (Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart, 15th March 1888, 15 R. 588), the Valuation Committee held that the value of that forest must be estimated at £15 per stag for 17 stags, making in all £255. This value proceeded upon a report submitted to the Committee of the values put upon deer forests in Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland shires. The Committee adopted this valuation, and although the Judges in this Court were divided in opinion, there was no division between them as to £15 being the proper valuation for a stag. We have now been told that the Valuation Committee in the case of Dalness were misled, and that instead of £15 being the rate per stag in the neighbouring counties, there was no case where a forest was let at less than £20 per stag. Now, it is relevant to attack the Dalness decision, as an authority, and to urge that it proceeded upon imperfect information; and if the appellant, the Assessor, had gone rightly about it he might, if he succeeded in his attack, have increased the valuation of each stag. But instead of this, what he proposed to do was to read and put in letters which he had received from the Assessors of Inverness, Ross, and Sutherland shires, to which the objection was taken that these letters could not be read, the writers of them being available as witnesses; and the Committee very properly rejected the evidence. Then the whole ground of challenge of the Dalness decision rested upon the Assessor's own statement, which the Committee agreed to receive, which certainly was very meagre proof; and it is mentioned that "no other evidence was adduced by the Assessor in support of his statement, and the material facts relied on by him were denied by the appellant."

The Committee rejected the contention of the appellant. He had an opportunity, if his witnesses were not present, of getting the case delayed to another diet, but this he objected to. It was moved on behalf of the Marquis to adjourn the case if further evidence was to be adduced, but this not being agreed to, the Valuation Committee could only pronounce judgment on the evidence before them. We are now moved by the counsel for the appellant to remit the case back to the Valuation Committee to hear the evidence that had not been forthcoming at the first meeting. I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to do so. The power of making a remit granted by statute to this Court in order to obtain further information must be limited in its character to such matters as a mistake committed in the statement of the case; the setting forth specific details of matters which are stated quite generally; or to correct a judgment of the Committee refusing to allow competent, or admitting incompetent, proof, and matters of a similar character. But it was never intended that, when the remit

No. 143. is asked for the purpose of beginning to make out a case ab ovo, and of leading evidence which could have been properly led before, a similar indulgence should be allowed. In all probability this case will come up again next year, if the information which the Assessor says he has got is in his possession.

June 14, 1889.*
Assessor for County of Argyll v.
Marquis of Breadalbane.

LORD TRAYNER.—I take quite the same view. The appellant should have been ready with his proof before the Committee, to shew that the decision in the Dalness case had proceeded upon information which was erroneous. He now wants a remit to enable him to make a better case than he presented to the Committee. I think that is not one of the purposes for which we are authorised by the statute to send a case back to the Committee.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 144. DOUGLAS FRASER & SONS, Appellants.—R. V. Campbell.
ASSESSOR FOR THE BURGH OF ARBROATH, Respondent.—Hay.
June 14, 1889.*
Fraser & Sons
v. Assessor for Burgh of Arbroath.

Valuation Acts—Weaving factory—Spinning-mill temporarily silent.—The proprietor of a weaving factory kept a spinning-mill, which formed part of the factory, standing from reasons of temporary expediency, and made no attempt to obtain a return from the mill by letting it, or otherwise.

Held that it was properly entered in the Valuation-roll by the Assessor at its full yearly value as a going mill.

Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.
Lord Fraser.
Lord Trayner.

AT a Court, held by the Magistrates of the Burgh of Arbroath on 11th September 1888, for hearing appeals against valuations made by the Assessor for the burgh, Messrs Douglas Fraser & Sons, flax-spinners and manufacturers there, appealed against an entry in the Valuation-roll by which the Wellgate Works, of which they were proprietors and tenants, were entered at the yearly rent of £855.

They claimed that the works should be entered as follows:—

Weaving Factory, . . . .	£427 10 0
Spinning-mill, . . . .	£213 15 0

They stated that the spinning-mill, which formed a distinct and separate part of the several subjects embraced under the designation of Wellgate Works, had been unworked since Whitsunday previously, and would not be restarted till Whitsunday 1889. It should, therefore, be entered as a warehouse for machinery at half of its valuation as a going mill. They also expressed their willingness to give a guarantee that the mill would remain unworked till Whitsunday 1889.

The Assessor maintained that the spinning-mill was part of the Wellgate Works, that the Wellgate Works fell to be valued as a whole, and that the mill was silent for temporary purposes merely.

The Magistrates unanimously found that Messrs Fraser were keeping part of their works standing from reasons of temporary expediency, and had made no attempt to obtain a return from the mill by letting it or otherwise; that £427, 10s., being one half of the whole valuation of the Wellgate Works, fairly represented the proportion applicable to the spinning-mill, and that the same sum of £427, 10s. was the yearly worth or value of the spinning-mill, taking one year with another. They therefore refused the appeal, and sustained the valuation made by the Assessor.

The appellants took a case, from which the above narrative is taken.

At the hearing of the appeal, they cited the undernoted authorities.<sup>1</sup> No. 144.

LORD FRASER.—I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. The June 14, 1889. case sets forth that “the Magistrates unanimously decided that Messrs Fraser & Sons v. Assessor for Burgh of Arbroath. were keeping part of their works standing from reasons of temporary expediency, and had made no attempt to obtain a return from the mill by letting it or otherwise.” We must deal with the case assuming that to be the fact. Now, if the owner or tenant of premises, from reasons of temporary expediency, or from caprice, chooses not to carry on business as usual, that is no reason for reducing the valuation.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT sustained the valuation.

W. HARRIS, L.A.—PARTY—Agents.

THE FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appellants.—Asher—J. C. Thomson. No. 145.
THE ASSESSOR FOR THE BURGH OF QUEENSFERRY, Respondent.—J. Wilson.

Valuation Acts—Lands acquired for railway—Embankment—Whether valuation by burgh or by railway assessor—The Forth Bridge Railway Company, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. cxiv.), sec. 16—Lands Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), secs. 3, 20, and 21—Unfinished Railway.—A plot of ground lying within a burgh had been acquired by a railway company, whose Act of Parliament provided that the lands from time to time acquired by the company should, “for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges, and for all purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company.” Part of the ground had been used in the construction of a railway embankment, the remainder being covered with the débris caused by the formation of the embankment.

The burgh assessor included the subjects in his valuation on the ground that they were not “wholly occupied by the railway and works,” and that the railway was still unfinished.

In an appeal against the determination of the Valuation Committee sustaining the assessment, the Court held that, as the ground in question formed part of the undertaking of a railway company within the meaning of sections 20 and 21 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, the burgh assessor had no duty in regard to it, and that the determination was wrong.

At the Lands Valuation Court of the Royal Burgh of Queensferry held by the Magistrates and Town-Council of that burgh, upon Monday, the 10th day of September 1888, for the purpose of hearing and disposing of appeals against valuations made by the Assessor of the said burgh, for the year from Whitsunday 1888 to Whitsunday 1889, the Forth Bridge Railway Company appealed against an entry in the Valuation-roll, the ground valued in that entry being situated in the parish of Dalmeny and county of Linlithgow, but within the parliamentary boundaries of the burgh of Queensferry, and so included in the area falling to be valued by the Burgh Assessor.

The ground in question, which formed part of the lands of Bankhead, near South Queensferry, had been acquired by the company for the purposes and under the powers of the “Forth Bridge Railway Act, 1882.” Part of it was used in the construction of a railway embankment, and <sup>1</sup> Barbour, March 7, 1878, 9 R. 1236; Staley v. Overseers of Castleton, June 8, 1864, 33 Law Jour. Mag. Cases, 178; Harter v. Overseers of Salford, June 3, 1865, 34 Law Jour. Mag. Cases, 206.

* Decided Jan. 31, 1889.

No. 145

June 14, 1889.
Forth Bridge
Railway Co. v.
Assessor for
Burgh of Queensferry.

the remainder of it was covered with the débris and loose material caused by the construction of the embankment. This was admitted by the Assessor.

The railway company stated that the land in question formed part of the undertaking of the Forth Bridge Railway Company,* whose railway thereon had been for some time in course of construction, and was now approaching completion, the area in dispute being at the present time wholly occupied by the said railway and works. They stated further that "the land in question being wholly occupied by an unfinished railway, having as yet no connection with any portion of railway by means of which it could be in any way whatever utilised, was incapable of being let or yielding rent. If the land is to appear in the Valuation-roll at all it should be entered at nil." They accordingly maintained that the ground ought to be valued (if at all) as a part of their undertaking by the Assessor of Railways and Canals under section 21 † of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, and not by the Burgh Assessor under section 3. ‡

The Assessor stated, that prior to its being acquired by the company the land had formed part of the arable farm of Bankhead, and was then valued at £4, and he maintained that its value had been increased on account of its convenient proximity to the Forth Bridge. He denied that at present, at anyrate, it formed a part of the railway company's undertaking, it being only, as stated by them, "a portion of an unfinished railway, having as yet no connection with any other portion of railway by means of which it could be in any way whatever utilised." He accordingly maintained that, in terms of sec. 21 of the Act, the land in question was not, and could not competently be, valued by the Assessor of Railways and Canals, and that, in the discharge of his duty, he was bound, in terms of sec. 3 of the Act, to enter it in the Valuation-roll for the burgh.

The Magistrates dismissed the appeal, and the railway company took a case, from which the foregoing narrative is taken. At the hearing of the appeal the undernoted authorities were referred to.<sup>1</sup>

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The Assessor of the burgh of Queensferry has placed the land in question on the Valuation-roll of the burgh, on the ground that it "was

* The Forth Bridge Railway Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. cxiv.), sec. 16, enacted that, "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the lands and property from time to time acquired by the company under this Act, and the railway and works by this Act authorised, shall for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges, and for all other purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company, as if the company had by the Act of 1873 been authorised to acquire, make, and maintain the same."

† The Lands Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), section 21, enacted that "the Assessor of Railways and Canals under this Act shall, on or before the 15th day of August 1854, and on or before the 15th day of August in every subsequent year, inquire into and fix in cumulo the yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, of all lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by each railway and canal company, and forming part of its undertaking."

‡ Section 3 of the same Act enacted, that it shall be the duty of the various County and Burgh Assessors "annually to ascertain and assess the yearly rent or value of the several lands or heritages within the county or burgh respectively, other than the lands and heritages of railway and canal companies, which are hereinafter specially provided for."

<sup>1</sup> Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Co. v. Arthur, Dec. 22, 1854, 17 D. 252, 27 Scot. Jur. 99; North British Railway Co. v. Greig, March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 645, 38 Scot. Jur. 333; Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line Committee. Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 396; Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor of the County of Linlithgow, Feb. 10, 1888, 15 R. 595.

not, and could not competently be, valued by" the Railway Assessor, and that he was bound, in the discharge of his duty, under section 3 of the Valuation Act, to enter it on the Valuation-roll of the burgh within which it is situated. I think the Assessor has taken an erroneous view of his duty under the section he refers to. By that section he is required to ascertain and assess the yearly rent or value of the several lands and heritages within the burgh, "other than the lands and heritages of railway and canal companies, which are hereinafter specially provided for." He is not required to see whether the lands and heritages of railway companies have been valued or placed on any Valuation-roll; with that he has no concern. His only duty in reference to such properties is to see that they are not entered in the Burgh-roll. But before he excludes them from the Burgh-roll he must be satisfied that the lands and heritages so excluded are (as described in section 20 of the Valuation Act) "belonging to, or leased by, railway or canal companies, and forming part of the undertakings of such companies." If the lands are of this description, the Burgh Assessor has no duty with regard to their valuation whatever.

No. 145.
June 14, 1889.
Forth Bridge
Railway Co. v.
Assessor for
Burgh of Queensferry.

The question now to be determined is whether the land, concerning which this appeal has been brought, falls within the description of section 20; and I am of opinion that it does. That land was acquired by the appellants for the purposes of their railway under the powers conferred by their Act of 1882, which provides that land acquired under that Act shall, for all "purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company." But, in addition to that, it is the fact, admitted by the Assessor, that part of the land in question has been already applied to the purposes of the railway, and been embodied in the appellants' undertaking by being used in the construction of a railway embankment. The remainder of it is covered with the débris and loose material which necessarily accompany the formation of such an embankment. The whole ground, therefore, in my opinion, is at present occupied by the railway works, and forms part of the appellants' undertaking. If it is the view of the Assessor that nothing can form part of an undertaking until the undertaking is completed, and in such a state that it may competently be valued, that is a view in which I cannot concur.

LORD FRASER.—I concur.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates and Town-Council was wrong.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agents.

WILLIAM MARTIN (Factor for George Stewart), Appellant.—
C. K. Mackenzie.

No. 146.

ASSESSOR FOR BURGH OF LEITH, Respondent.—Guthrie Smith—Salvesen.

June 14, 1889.
Martin v.
Assessor for Burgh of Leith.

Valuation Acts—Value—Consideration other than the rent—Obligation to erect a wooden circus removable by tenant.—A lease of a plot of ground at a fixed rent contained an obligation on the tenant, within two months of his entry, to erect and complete a wooden circus upon the ground. The tenant was further to be entitled to remove his buildings at the termination of his lease, but he was bound to leave the site clear and free from all rubbish and débris.

Held that the obligation to erect the circus was not a "consideration other than the rent" within the meaning of the 6th section of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854.

No. 146. ALFRED EUGENE COOKE, circus proprietor, occupied a piece of ground in Great Junction Street, Leith, belonging to George Stewart of Thornhill, Lasswade, under and in virtue of a missive offer and acceptance dated June 14, 1889.

Martin v.
Assessor for Burgh of Leith.

The missive offer was in these terms:—

“Andrew Wallace, Esq., S.S.C.

Chambers, No. 68 George Street,
Edinburgh, 12th October 1887.

Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.

Lord Fraser.

Lord Trayner.

Case No. 95.

“Dear Sir,—On behalf of George Stewart, Esq., of Thornhill, Lasswade, I hereby offer to lease to your client, Mr Alfred Eugene Cooke, circus proprietor, that piece of ground in Great Junction Street, Leith, . . . and that upon the following conditions, viz:—1. The rent to be £115 sterling per annum, payable half-yearly in advance, at the usual terms, and in equal portions, and you will personally guarantee payment of the first half year's rent at Martinmas first. 2. The lease to be for five years from Martinmas first 1887, but after, or on the expiry of the first two years thereof, the proprietor of the ground to have the right to resume possession of the ground for building purposes upon giving twelve months' notice in writing to the tenant. 3. Mr Cooke shall be bound, within two months from the date of his entry, to erect and complete a substantial wooden circus building in terms of the plans which he has submitted to me, and which I approve of, and the said building to be completed to my reasonable satisfaction. 6. Mr Cooke shall be entitled to remove his buildings at the natural or earlier termination of the lease, and shall be bound to leave the site clear and free from all rubbish or débris, and fenced in as at present towards the public street and east lane.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

W. HAMILTON BEATTIE.”

Thereafter Mr Cooke erected a circus on the ground in terms of his obligation.

The Assessor for the Burgh of Leith entered the subjects in the Valuation-roll for the year 1888 in the following manner:—

Nature of Subjects.	Situation.	Proprietor.	Occupier or Tenant.	Value.
Circus,	Gt. Junction Street,	G. Stewart, Lasswade,	A. E. Cooke,	£300 0 0

At a Valuation Court for the Burgh of Leith, held on 11th September 1888, William Martin, factor for and on behalf of Mr Stewart, appealed against the Assessor's valuation, craving that it should be altered to the extent and effect of describing the subjects as ground and not as a circus, and of stating the value thereof at £115.

The Magistrates and Council having adopted the Assessor's view, Martin took a case, in which the foregoing facts appeared.

Argued for appellant;—(1) The lease was a bona fide lease, and the rent payable under it was conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects thereby let. Such rent must therefore in terms of the statute be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value thereof. (2) The stipulations contained in the lease were only matter of regulation as to the use of the property, and did not amount to a grassum or consideration other than the rent,<sup>1</sup> within the meaning of the 6th section of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854.

<sup>1</sup> North British Railway Co. v. Assessor for Leith, Feb. 9, 1884, 11 R. 558; Gosnell, &c., v. Assessor for Edinburgh, Jan. 27, 1885, 12 R. 571; Trustees of Dundee Harbour, &c., v. Assessor for Dundee, March 19, 1886, 13 R. 829.

Argued for the Assessor;—(1) The obligation upon the tenant to build the circus was as much a consideration and condition of granting the lease as the promise of payment of the money rent. (2) The circus having been erected, the nature of the subject was entirely changed, and the lands and heritages in question were not a mere piece of ground, but a house or building known as a circus, and must be valued accordingly.

No. 146.

June 14, 1889.
Martin v.
Assessor for Burgh of Leith.

At advising,—

LORD FRASER.—This case presents a question for decision which comes up at every sittings of this Appeal Court. The 6th section of the Valuation Act enacts that where the lands to be valued “are bona fide let for a yearly rent, conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages, in terms of this Act.” The clause for construction is “consideration other than the rent.” It has presented itself in a variety of forms, as is illustrated by many decisions since the statute was passed. I adhere to all that I have said in the case of the Trustees of the Dundee Harbour, &c., v. Assessor for Dundee (19th March 1886, 13 Ret. 831), viz, that the consideration must be valuable, and not a mere matter of regulation as to how a tenant shall use the property; that the stipulation in favour of the landlord shall not be such as the common law implies apart from the conditions in the lease; and that the tenant shall be bound to do something which redounds to the advantage of the landlord.

The present case presents a point of difference from all the cases which have hitherto been decided. It is stipulated by the lease that the tenant “shall be bound, within two months from the date of his entry, to erect and complete a substantial wooden circus building, in terms of the plans which he has submitted to me, and which I approve of; and the said building to be completed to my reasonable satisfaction.” Now, if the lease had gone on further to stipulate that the building so to be erected should belong to the landlord at the termination of the lease, there would clearly have been a consideration other than the rent of £115, and that rent in consequence could not have been taken as the annual value of the subjects. But the contrary has been stipulated, for it is agreed that the tenant “shall be entitled to remove his buildings at the natural or earlier termination of the lease, and shall be bound to leave the site clear and free from all rubbish or débris, and fenced in as at present towards the public street and east lane”; that is to say, the tenant has right to leave the circus which he has built, or to take it away, at his pleasure; but if he does take it away, he must remove all débris. The landlord thus receives no advantage whatever from the erection of the circus, except to this extent, that during the subsistence of the lease it is a security to him to the extent of its value for payment of the rent, and the question then comes to be, whether this security is a consideration other than the rent.

Now, let us test this by the ordinary security of caution. In the present case, the landlord does get a cautionary obligation for the tenant, because it is a condition of the lease that the tenant’s agent “will personally guarantee payment of the first half year’s rent at Martinmas first.” Is this any consideration other than the rent? It clearly is not. It simply is a precaution taken by the landlord that the rent shall be paid, but this is not a consideration other than the rent. It makes the payment more secure, but that is all. Now, is the security afforded by the existence of the wooden circus in anyways different?

No. 146. It appears to me that it is not. I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates in this case was wrong, and that the value in the roll should be reduced to £115.

June 14, 1889.
Martin v.
Assessor for Burgh of Leith.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the opinion which your Lordship has delivered. The 6th section of the Act requires the Assessor (speaking in general terms) to take as the yearly rent or value of a subject actually let the rent expressed in the lease, but it adds that the rent expressed in the lease shall not be taken to be the yearly rent or value of the subject where the lease confers upon the landlord a grassum or consideration other than rent, that being an enhancement of the advantage which the landlord receives. In this case, the landlord gets a rent fixed by the lease, and he gets no advantage or consideration whatever for the land beyond the stipulated rent. It is true that there is an obligation to build a circus within two months, and, as your Lordship has pointed out, that may afford a security to the landlord for payment of his rent beyond what he would have had if the circus had not been built. But that is not a consideration which enhances the value of the subject to the landlord. When tested by the case of a cautionary obligation, as your Lordship has tested it, the argument of the respondent fails—the existence of the cautioner makes the landlord's chance of recovery greater, but, after all, whether he recovers from the cautioner or the debtor, he only gets the amount of rent stipulated. And so, in this case, whatever the landlord's security may be, he gets no more than the rent stipulated in the lease. It seems to me plain, therefore, that there is here no grassum or consideration other than the rent, and that under section 6 of the Act, the rent fixed by the lease must be entered in the roll as the yearly rent or value of the subjects.

THE following was the opinion :—" We are of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates and Town-Council is wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £115."

D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—J. CAMPBELL IRONS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 147. THE CRAIGTON CEMETERY COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—W. Campbell.
THE ASSESSOR FOR LOWER WARD OF LANARKSHIRE.

June 14, 1889.*
Craigton
Cemetery Co.,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanark-
shire.

Valuation Acts—Principle of valuation—Cemetery.—A cemetery company bought land which they laid out as a burial-ground. They derived an annual income from giving off lots for burial purposes, the right of the allottees being one of perpetual use.

Held that the valuation of the land ought to be based upon the rent at which in its actual state it might be expected to let to a tenant to be used by him as it had been used by the company, and not at its agricultural value.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the Commissioners of Supply for the Lower Ward of the County of Lanark on 12th September 1888, the Craigton Cemetery Company, Limited, appealed against the entry made by the Assessor in the Valuation-roll of £500 as the yearly value of the lands belonging to the company, situated in the parish of Govan.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Fraser.
Lord Trayner.

Case No. 98.

In 1873 the appellants had acquired 29½ acres of land, and partly enclosed the same with a wall, and built an entrance lodge, and laid off part of the ground for burial purposes. The property was then entered No. 147. in the Valuation-roll at £100.

At the date of the valuation in 1888 the company had disposed of nine acres or thereby for burial purposes, and the whole of these nine acres had practically been used for interments. The remaining portion of twenty-one acres had been laid off partly in carriage-drives and footpaths, and also for giving out for burial purposes. Of recent years the appellants had had a considerable surplus of revenue over expenditure, which they had divided amongst their shareholders. This revenue was principally derived from the sale of the land to lairholders. The income for the year at 31st December 1887 shewed a profit of £1395, 16s. 6d.

June 14, 1889.
Craigton Cemetery Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanarkshire.

The Assessor contended that this revenue ought to form the basis of the yearly value of the ground. In other words, he considered the revenue from sales of ground as profits of a business, and argued that a business yielding such a profit to the proprietor would let to a tenant at a rental of £500.

The appellants maintained,—(First) The revenue made by them arose from the sale of the corpus of their property, and was not rent or yearly produce of the lands. (Second) The principle adopted by the Assessor of ascertaining the annual value from a comparison of income and expenditure was an erroneous one. If strictly applied, it led to the anomaly that only such lands and heritages as yielded a surplus of income over expenditure would be treated as having an annual value. There were cemeteries in Glasgow which did not yield a surplus of revenue over expenditure, and which consequently did not yield any return to the proprietors, and in these cases the subjects were entered in the Valuation-roll at the agricultural value. In these circumstances the appellants maintained that if a valuation was to be placed upon burial-grounds, it must be the value at which the ground would in its actual state let from year to year; and that that value could only be the agricultural value. The amount of revenue derived from the disposal of land to lairholders could not affect in any way the question of the yearly value of the lands, in the sense of the Valuation Acts.<sup>1</sup> (Third) Ground disposed of or set apart for the burial of the dead was not a rent-producing subject. It was never utilised for any other purpose, and it had therefore no annual value. In point of fact the appellants' ground was not used in any other way than as a burial-place for the dead, and it yielded no annual return.

The appellants stated that £100 was a full estimate of the yearly value of their land.

The Committee sustained the appeal to the extent of £100, and fixed the valuation at £400.

The appellants took a case, from which the foregoing narrative is taken. At advising,—

LORD FRASER.—The appellants in this case are a joint stock company, who carry on a perfectly legitimate business. They have become owners of 29½ acres of land, which they have devoted to the purpose of a cemetery for the interment of the dead. Nine acres of this land have been already given off for burial purposes, and the remaining twenty-one acres have been laid off with carriage-drives and footpaths, and made suitable for the same purpose. The income of the company is derived from the grant of burial-stances and other fees; and the income for the year at 31st December 1887 shewed a profit of £1395, 16s.

<sup>1</sup> Assessor for Falkirk v. Falkirk Gas Co., Limited, Feb. 24, 1883, 10 R. 651.

No. 147. 6d. No information is given in the case as to the conditions on which lairs have been granted to the persons whose relatives are buried therein. The grants to these persons are called "sales." But this term is clearly inapplicable, for there can be no sale of heritage in Scotland except by disposition, which it is not said any of the grantees of the lairs ever received. Nor is there any information given as to what are the obligations of the company in reference to keeping in good order the plots of ground, nor as to any right of access to or control over the lairs allocated. I suppose it must be taken for granted that the cemetery is to be kept in order by the company, and that the nature of the transaction is a grant of perpetual use for the purpose of interment to the allottee, without any transference of the right of property from the company to the allottee. As explained to us at the debate, this was the nature of the right which the allottee claimed.

June 14, 1889.
Craigton
Cemetery Co.,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanark-
shire.

Now, then, what rent would a hypothetical tenant give for such a subject? If the joint stock company let the cemetery to a tenant, the latter would have all the powers which they possessed of utilising the cemetery for the purpose for which it was created, viz., a place for interment. The only way in which he could so utilise it would be simply by giving off lairs and receiving the price therefor from the allottees. The tenant could not be restrained from the use of the cemetery by the landlords, because such use was that to which it was devoted. The appellants contend as follows:—"That if a valuation is to be placed upon burial-grounds, it must be the value at which the ground would in its actual state let from year to year; and that that value can only be the agricultural value." Why should it be an agricultural value when the land has been laid out as a burial-ground, enclosed with a wall, and with the carriage-drives and footpaths suitable for a burial-ground? It must be dealt with as in its actual state as such burial-ground, and not as agricultural land.

In the next place, what is the income derivable from this cemetery? The only income which it yields is the sums paid for the lairs that are given off. That income will no doubt cease in time, when the whole area of this cemetery has been allocated, but in the meantime that must be treated as income; and, according to the balance-sheet annexed to the case, the profit on the year ending 31st December 1887 is £1395, 16s. 6d. Surely a tenant of the subject, whose expenditure would be very little,—only that of keeping the cemetery in good order,—could, upon receiving £1395, afford to pay a rent of £400, at which sum the Valuation Committee have fixed it. I observe that the case has been made the matter of decision by the Queen's Bench in England in the case of The Queen v. Abney Park Cemetery Co., 1873 (L. R., 8 Q. B. 515), where the Court determined that the sums received for lairs were just income that must be taken into account. I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee in this case was right.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE following was the opinion:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right."

JAMES DRUMMOND, W.S.—GORDON, SMITH, & PARKER, Writers—Agents.

SIR ROBERT MENZIES, Bart., Appellant.—C. S. Dickson.
ASSESSOR FOR COUNTY OF PERTH, Respondent.—Low.

No. 148.

June 19, 1889.

Valuation Acts—Lease—Voluntary reduction of rent.—A landlord is not entitled to have a farm entered in the Valuation-roll at a lower rent than that stipulated for on the ground that he has granted a reduction of the rent, unless he can produce conclusive evidence to shew that he has bound himself to grant the reduction.

Menzies v.
Assessor for County of Perth.

THIS was an appeal by Sir Robert Menzies of that ilk, Baronet, against a decision of the Valuation Committee of the Commissioners of Supply of the County of Perth confirming the valuation of the Assessor of the county of certain farms belonging to the appellant for the year ending Whitsunday 1889.

Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.
Lord Trayner.
Ld. Wellwood.

The farms were occupied by tenants, and were held in four ways, viz., by (1) formal completed leases; (2) missives of lease, in which rent and endurance of lease were specified; (3) expired leases, but tenants continuing in possession on tacit relocation; (4) missives of lease in which the rent was specified, but no endurance of possession, and where the tenants continued to possess on tacit relocation.

Case No.
101.

The entry to all these farms was at Whitsunday and at separation of crop, and the rents were payable at Candlemas and Lammas after entry.

Prior to the collection of rents due at Lammas 1887 the appellant wrote this letter to his factor,—“You can grant ten per cent reduction on the year's rent for the half year to the tenants in Appin for the half year's rent now due, except . . . This will be twenty per cent on the year's rent. ROBERT MENZIES.”

The Assessor entered the farms at the rents contained in the leases and missives of lease.

The Valuation Committee confirmed his valuation. They were of opinion that, in order to give effect to a deduction from the rent stipulated in a formal lease, such rent must be set aside either by writing on the lease or by some formal obligation under which the tenant could operate relief, and that neither of these methods had been adopted in the present case, the appellant's letter containing no obligation in favour of the tenants binding against him or his successors for future years.

The appellant took a case, from which the foregoing narrative is taken.

On 2d February 1889 the Court remitted to the Valuation Committee to “inquire and report whether the names of the tenants are entered in the rental-book of the estate at rents specified, and the duration of the tenancy, and to report whether there are any indorsations on the leases or entries in the rental-books of permanent deduction from the specified rents, and authorise the committee to take evidence and call for books and other documents to enable them to carry out this remit.”

The Committee reported as follows :—“There are no endorsements on the leases or missives of any farms shewing the deduction of rent given, and no writing on any of them shewing that deductions had been agreed upon in any case.

“The only books produced to the Committee under the call were the estate cash-book kept by the factor, shewing rents received, and the tenants' pass-books. According to the practice of the estate each tenant has a pass-book, in which there was entered on the one side the half-year's rent and the date at which it is due, and on the opposite side the payments made, with their dates. The pass-books are never in the hands of the proprietor or his factor, except when presented on a payment of rent about to be made, which as a rule is every half year about Candlemas

No. 148. and Lammas. No entry of a rent due is made in the pass-book until the tenant brings his book to the factor on making a payment, when the half year's rent is entered as at the date when due, and the payment made is entered on the other side.

June 19, 1889.
Menzies v.
Assessor for County of Perth.

"The abatements allowed under the letter of the appellant were given at Lammas 1887 and Candlemas 1888 in the form of repayment, i.e., the rent was entered in the pass-book at the full rent as under the lease or missive, but the abatement was allowed off and a receipt taken from the tenant therefor. At Lammas 1888 the reduced rents are entered on the debtor side of the pass-book, but, except in two cases to be afterwards mentioned, no explanation is given and no entries made in the book shewing permanent reduction.

"The two excepted cases are—245, Tirinie and Wester Tegarmuchd; 249, Easter Tegarmuchd.

"In these a deduction of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the half year, or 25 per cent for the year, is given, commencing at Candlemas 1888, and there is an entry in the tenant's pass-book in each case, 'rents reduced for three years to £.' The factor's explanation of this difference is as follows:— 'Interrogated, What is the reason that in some of the tenants' books there is an entry of the reduction in the rent, and not in the others? Answer, There are only two of these, Tirinie and Easter Tegarmuchd, and in both cases the reduction is more than 20 per cent. The books of tenants holding under lease are kept on the same principle as the others which have been already exhibited, the rents in each of these being entered at the rents under the lease until August 1888, when the half year's rent is entered at the amount, less 20 per cent deduction. No entries have been made shewing permanent reductions.'"

LORD TRAYNER.—With regard to the two leases mentioned in the Committee's report as Nos. 245 and 249, I think there is sufficient written evidence to shew that the rent has been reduced as therein stated, and that accordingly effect must be given to the reduction in the Valuation-roll.

With regard to all the others, I am of opinion that the Commissioners are right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

There are two groups of cases, the first consisting of formal current leases and missives of lease, which are in the same position as formal leases.

With regard to the rent stated in these, there is absolutely no evidence whatever that the rent stipulated has been reduced. In saying that, I am not ignoring the statements of Sir Robert Menzies and his factor, nor doubting their statements. But I think it is impossible to accept from them an explanation or statement that rents have been reduced, unless some formal mode be adopted of setting that forth so as to bind the landlord, and not make it a matter of goodwill merely.

The second group of cases consists of expired leases where the tenants continue to hold on tacit relocation. The only particulars in regard to these cases are to be found in the tenants' pass-books. Now here, except in the two cases I have referred to, where there are notes of the deduction, there is no evidence whatever of any intention or obligation on the part of Sir Robert Menzies to give the deduction referred to. I repeat that where the landlord wishes to get the apparent rent of his tenant reduced upon the Valuation-roll for the purposes of assessment, he must take such proceedings as will put it beyond all doubt that he is bound to give the deduction.

LORD WELLWOOD concurred.

THE following was the opinion:—"The Judges having considered the report of the Valuation Committee and heard counsel, are of opinion as regards Nos. 245 and 249, Tirinie and Wester Tegarmuchd, and Easter Tegarmuchd, that effect should be given to the reduction noted in the tenants' pass-books; and in regard to the other entries complained of, they are of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right."

No. 148.
June 19, 1889.
Menzies v.
Assessor for County of Perth.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

MRS AGNES JAMIESON AND ANOTHER, First Parties.—Strachan.
JAMES LESSLIE AND OTHERS (Mrs Lesslie's Trustees), Second Parties.—Adam.

No. 149.

June 19, 1889.*
Jamieson v.
Lesslie's Trustees.

Succession—Trust—Alimentary provision—Fee and liferent—Power of fiat to demand payment.—A testatrix by her settlement directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate equally between her two daughters, who were married, "and to their respective heirs and assignees, but declaring that the provision hereby made . . . is an alimentary provision for their own separate use and behoof, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration or management of their husbands, . . . but my trustees shall be bound to see to the investment of the said residue for my said daughters in such way and manner as shall to them appear best to secure and give effect to the foresaid declarations and conditions."

Held that the fee of the residue was vested in the daughters, and that they were entitled to have the residue paid over to them upon their own receipts, the receipts to bear the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration.

Allan v. Allan's Trustees, Dec. 12, 1872, 11 Macph. 216, followed.

MRS JANE LESSLIE died on 9th January 1881, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, and codicil thereto. By the third purpose of the settlement she directed her trustees "at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death, or as soon after such term as my trustees shall be able to realise my estate, to divide the whole rest and residue of my said estates and effects equally between my two daughters Mrs Agnes Lesslie or Jamieson, wife of William Henry Jamieson, farmer, residing at Mayshade aforesaid, and Mrs Jane Lesslie or Dawson, wife of Adam Dawson, residing at Bonnytown, Linlithgow, share and share alike, and to their respective heirs and assignees; but declaring that the provision hereby made to my said two daughters is an alimentary provision for their own separate use and behoof, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration or management of their present husbands, or any future husbands they may marry, nor shall the same be assignable by them or by their said husbands, nor be liable to the deeds or subject to the legal diligence of the creditors, either of themselves or of their said husbands, for payment or in security of debts contracted by them; but my trustees shall be bound to see to the investment of the said residue for my said daughters in such way and manner as shall to them appear best to secure and give effect to the foresaid declarations and conditions, [with power to my trustees, notwithstanding what is hereinbefore written, and provided they be required so to do by my said daughters, or either of them, to pay to my said daughters, or either of them, the whole or such part of their respective provisions foresaid as they may request so to be paid to them, leaving my said daughters themselves to see to the application, use, or investment thereof, and without my trustees incurring any responsibility therefor:]

No. 149. and I declare that the receipts and all other writings with reference to the said provision, or to the interest or produce thereof, to be granted by my said daughters, shall be granted by themselves alone, and shall be good, valid, and sufficient to the receivers thereof, though the consent of their husband be not given thereto.”

June 19, 1889.
Jamieson v.
Lesslie's Trustees.

By the codicil Mrs Lesslie revoked that part of the settlement printed above within brackets.

The primary purposes of the trust having been implemented, and questions having arisen as to the rights and interest of the residuary legatees in the residue under the third purpose of the trust-disposition and codicil, a special case was presented by (1) Mrs Jamieson and Mrs Dawson, and (2) the trustees of the late Mrs Lesslie, submitting the following questions of law:—“(1) Whether the fee of the residue of the said estate is vested in the said Mrs Agnes Lesslie or Jamieson and Mrs Jane Lesslie or Dawson? (2) Whether they are entitled to have the capital of the said residue conveyed and made over to them, or any, and if so, what part thereof? Or (3) Whether the trustees are bound to retain the capital invested in their own names during the lifetime of the said legatees?”

Mrs Jamieson and Mrs Dawson both had children, who were all in minority.

The first parties maintained that the case was ruled by that of Allan's Trustees v. Allan and Others.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the second parties;—They were willing to pay over the residue to the first parties, who probably had the fee, if they could do so with safety, but there was here no direction to pay as in Allan's case, and the conditional power “to pay” had been cancelled by the codicil. In order “to divide” and “to see to the investment” of the residue, so as to protect it for the first parties, as the testatrix desired it to be protected, it was necessary to keep up the trust during their lifetime. Payment could be made only to “their respective heirs and assignees.”<sup>2</sup>

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The testatrix in this case, Mrs Jane Lesslie, by her will left the residue of her estate to her two daughters by a destination in these terms:—“I direct my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death, or as soon after such term as my trustees shall be able to realise my estate, to divide the whole rest and residue of my said estates and effects equally between my two daughters, Mrs Agnes Lesslie or Jamieson, wife of William Henry Jamieson, farmer, residing at Mayshade aforesaid, and Mrs Jane Lesslie or Dawson, wife of Adam Dawson, residing at Bonnytown, Linlithgow, share and share alike, and to their respective heirs and assignees.” But she qualified these general words by a clause of declaration to the effect that what she thus gave to her daughters was an alimentary provision, and that the ius mariti and right of administration of their husbands were to be excluded, and that they should not be liable for the deeds or subject to the legal diligence of their own or their husband's creditors, and the trustees were directed “to see to the investment of the said residue for my said daughters in such way and manner as shall to them appear best to secure and give effect to the foressaid declarations and conditions” so as to carry out these intentions of the testatrix.

<sup>1</sup> Dec. 12, 1872, 11 Macph. 216.

<sup>2</sup> Balderston v. Fulton, Jan. 23, 1857, 19 D. 293; Lady Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, 11 Macph. 173; Whyte's Trustees v. Whyte, June 1, 1877, 4 R. 786.

I think there can be no doubt that by the first provision which I have quoted No. 149. the daughters of the testatrix became entitled each to one-half of the fee of the estate. The trustees are directed to divide it between them, and although there is no direction in words to pay their halves over to them, there is no other way in which a division between them of the fee could be made, and unless the deed has that meaning there is no disposal of the estate of Mrs Jane Lesslie by it. But while it is thus certain that the testatrix disposed of her estate in favour of her daughters she had evidently a desire that it should as much as possible be protected for them, and accordingly she gave the special direction which I have quoted as to the investment of the funds. I am unable to see how that direction can be carried out. To invest the funds in such a way as to make them alimentary only would be practically the creation of a new trust, and the restriction of the rights of the daughters to a liferent. For unless they were restricted to a liferent, it would be impossible to protect the property given to them by the will from the claims of creditors or the deeds of the ladies themselves. But there is no power to create a new trust of this description, and even if it could be created, power could not be given to it to turn the gift to these ladies into a mere alimentary provision, protected from attack in the event of the beneficiaries incurring liabilities and from the acts of the ladies themselves.

I am therefore of opinion that the questions put to us must be answered, the first and second in the affirmative generally, and the third in the negative. As regards the exclusion by the testatrix of the husbands' jus mariti and right of administration, it appears to me that the precedent set by the decision in the case of Allan should be followed, and that the receipts for the shares of the ladies who take the fee should bear that the jus mariti and right of administration of their husbands are excluded.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD LEE.—I was anxious to look into the case of Balderston v. Fulton and the other cases of that class before coming to a decision, but having now had the opportunity of examining them I have no doubt that the opinion expressed by your Lordship is the correct one.

There is no question now about the fee. The only question is, whether payment is to be postponed, whether in fact the trust is to be kept up.

The peculiarity of this case is that there is no ulterior destination beyond the two ladies. There is therefore nothing to be protected by keeping up the trust. The direction is that the money is to be divided between the daughters of the testatrix. In these circumstances Balderston v. Fulton cannot be founded upon as an authority for keeping up the trust. The cases of Smith and Campbell, May 30, 1873, 11 Macph. 639, and Rennie v. Ritchie, April 25, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 221, are quite distinguishable, because they are cases of annuity. I therefore concur with your Lordship's opinion.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer in the affirmative the first and second questions, and the third in the negative, and find and declare accordingly."

J. LOGAN MACK, S.S.C.—MACK & GRANT, S.S.C.—Agents.

June 19, 1889.
Jamieson v.
Lesslie's Trustees.

No. 150.

THOMAS PHILIP PARR, Pursuer (Respondent).—*Sir Charles Pearson—Murray.*June 19, 1889.
Parr v. Maclean.HUGH MACLEAN, Defender (Appellant).—C. S. Dickson—Salvesen.

Crofter—Right to cut peats—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29).—The yearly tenant of a croft, with the right to cut peats in the moss of A, in 1867 obtained permission from the landlord to cut peats from the moss of B, said permission to continue during the pleasure of the landlord. The crofter thereafter got his peats from B and not from A. In 1887 the landlord withdrew the permission to cut peats in B. The crofter having continued to take peats from B, the landlord applied for interdict against him. The defender maintained that the right to cut peats from B formed part of his holding in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and that the application for interdict was therefore incompetent. Held that the landlord was entitled to withdraw the permission to cut peats conditionally given, and that interdict fell to be granted.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
1.

THOMAS PHILIP PARR, of Killichronan, Mull, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Oban against Hugh Maclean, crofter under him at Kellon, for interdict against the defender taking peats from a moss at Killichronan.

The defender succeeded to the croft in 1877 on the death of his father, who had possessed it from 1865. The holding carried with it a right of cutting peats at Killimore, a moss on the pursuer's estate, about a mile and a-half from the defender's croft. In 1867 the defender's father obtained permission, during the landlord's pleasure and without payment of any rent, to cut peats at Killichronan Moss, which, though three miles from the croft, was accessible by a cart, while Killimore was not. The defender's father and the defender himself continued to take peats from Killichronan until December 1887, when the pursuer sent the defender a letter withdrawing the permission.

The pursuer admitted the defender's right to get peats, but denied that he had any right to take them from Killichronan.

The defender contended that his right to cut peats at Killichronan was part of his holding in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and that the present action for interdict was therefore incompetent.*

On 7th November 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Maclachlan), after a proof, from which the foregoing facts appeared, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (first) that the defender's father, Donald Maclean, became tenant of a croft at Kellon, on the estate of Killichronan, at that time the property of the pursuer's father, on or about the year 1865; (second) that the holding of which the said Donald Maclean became tenant included the right of cutting peats on a moss on Killimore Hill, part of said estate; (third) that the said Donald Maclean exercised the said right of cutting peats on said moss for two years or thereby, and thereafter applied to the

* The Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 12, enacts,—" . . . It shall be competent for the Crofters Commission to draw up a scheme regulating the use by crofters on the same estate of seaweed for the reasonable purposes of their holdings, peat-bogs, and heather or grass used for thatching purposes, and to include the charge for all these in the fixed rent."

Sec. 34 enacts,—" . . . 'Holding' means any piece of land held by a crofter consisting of arable or pasture land, or of land partly arable and partly pasture, and which has been occupied and used as arable or pasture land (whether such pasture land is held by the crofter alone or in common with others) immediately preceding the passing of this Act, including the site of his dwelling-house and any offices, or other conveniences connected therewith, but does not include garden ground only appurtenant to a house."

pursuer, who had then succeeded to said estate, and obtained permission from him to cut peats on a moss at Killichronan, on another part of said estate, but that said permission was granted by the pursuer during his pleasure only, and no rent was exacted therefor, and that said permission has now been withdrawn: Finds that the pursuer was entitled to withdraw said permission, and therefore decerns in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.

No. 150.
June 19, 1889.
PART v. Mac-lean.

On appeal the Sheriff (Forbes Irvine) adhered.

The defender appealed.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The evidence has satisfied the Sheriffs that the change from Killiemore to Killichronan was a piece of grace on the landlord's part, and not a right of the tenant. There is no evidence to the contrary. It was argued that the tenant had no right to get peats except from Killichronan. Such an argument is quite inconsistent with the universal rule and practice as we know it to exist, and would involve a hardship to crofters in the event of the peat at any particular place becoming exhausted. The privilege of being allowed to cut peats is not attached to any particular place. Crofters have a right to get peats, but the landlord has a right to point out where they are to go for them. If the landlord subjected the crofter to gross injustice by asking him to go to an extremely out-of-the-way place for his peats, a Court of law might interfere. Here, the distance he is asked to go is less than the distance he has hitherto gone. That advantage is, no doubt, counter-balanced by the fact that he can only use a horse, and must make more journeys than when he was able to employ a cart, but I think the Sheriffs were right in holding that this was within the landlord's discretion.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact

(1) that the pursuer is proprietor of the lands of Killichronan in the Island of Mull, which includes the farm of Killiemore; (2) that the defender is tenant, under the pursuer, of a croft, part of said lands, with right to cut peats on the lands of Killiemore; (3) that in or about the year 1867 the pursuer gave leave to the defender's father, then tenant of the said croft, to cut peats during his, the pursuer's, pleasure, on the home farm of Killichronan instead of the farm of Killiemore, and that the tenants of the croft availed themselves of the privilege from that time till shortly before the institution of the present action, when the pursuer recalled the leave thus conditionally given: Find in law that the pursuer was entitled to recall the permission granted as aforesaid: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Affirm the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Find and declare, interdict, prohibit, and discharge in terms of the prayer of the petition: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court," &c.

F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 151.

ALEXANDER CORMACK, Pursuer (Appellant).—Low—M'Lennan.

SCHOOL BOARD OF WICK AND PULTENEYTOWN, Defenders (Respondents).

—J. C. Thomson—Watt.

June 21, 1889.

Cormack v.

School Board

of Wick and

Pulteneytown.

Reparation—Dangerous condition of Premises—Child—Liability of School Board for condition of school premises.—A child of seven years attending a public school was injured through the fall of an iron gate, which formed part of the school premises. The gate was in a defective condition, and fell in consequence of the school children swinging on it. Held that it was the duty of the school board to keep the gate in a safe condition, and that they were liable in damages for the injury.

2d DIVISION.

Sheriff of

Caithness-

shire.

I.

ON 9th March 1888 Robert Cumming Cormack, a boy seven years of age, attending the public school, Pulteneytown, was injured by the fall of an iron gate at the entrance to the school premises.

An action was brought by his father, Alexander Cormack, as his tutor and administrator-in-law, in the Sheriff Court at Wick, against "the School Board of the burgh of Wick and Pulteneytown" for damages, on the ground that the accident had been caused by the negligence of the defenders in having the gate in an insecure condition.

The defenders denied fault, and further pleaded contributory negligence.

A proof was led, from which the following facts appeared.

The gate, which was a heavy iron one, opened in two halves inwards, towards the school grounds. In the middle of the gateway there was a stop which was intended to prevent either half from swinging outwards. This stop was not in good order, and on one occasion when the gate was thrown open one of the halves of the gate had swung outwards beyond the stop and had struck the pillar of the gateway, wrenching the gate off its hinges. It was subsequently re-hung by a blacksmith, who fastened the hinges by two bolts, which, however, were not screwed up closely. The boys attending the school had been in the habit of swinging on the gate, and when the accident happened some of them were swinging upon the half of the gate which fell. There was some evidence that the pursuer's son had been swinging on it at the time. Other witnesses said he was merely passing. The swinging on the gate and the consequent pressure upon the hinges, as above explained, loosened the hinges, and the gate fell upon him, with the result that he was severely injured.

The Sheriff-substitute (Harper), on 24th December 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact the accident to the pursuer's boy occurred in consequence of the defenders' gate being insufficiently hung, and not provided with a stop: Finds in law the defenders were negligent and in fault in having the gate in that condition, that the boy did not by any negligence contribute to the accident, and that the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuer: Assesses the said damages at £40 sterling, and decerns against the defenders for that amount: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Thoms), who, on 30th January 1889, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to instruct such negligence on the part of the defenders, as regards the condition of the gate at the entrance to the school mentioned in the petition, as to make them liable as concluded for: Separatim, Finds that if there was such negligence, there was contributory negligence on the part of the minor pursuer: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of this action," &c.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—It was proved that the gate was defective, and that the accident arose from the defect. It was not proved that the boy was swinging on the gate, but even if it had been, the defenders would be liable, because it might naturally be expected that children would swing on the gate, and it was the defenders' duty to make it reasonably safe against such usage.<sup>1</sup> There was a statutory duty on the defenders to keep the premises in good condition,* for failure in which such a statutory corporation could be made liable in damages.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the defenders;—No fault in the condition of the gate was established. The accident was due to the boy and his schoolfellows swinging on it, a use it was not intended for. In any view, that was contributory negligence, and a child could be barred by such negligence<sup>3</sup> from recovering damages. If a child meddled for no lawful purpose with what, if he left it alone, would not have hurt him, and received injury, no action of damages would lie for that injury.<sup>3</sup> The defenders had had the gate hung by a competent tradesman a short time before the accident. They could not therefore be liable in this action.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer has raised this action to obtain damages in respect of an accident to his son Robert, who is a boy about seven years of age. The boy was injured by the fall of a gate at the school known as the Pulteneytown Academy. At the time it fell upon him he was either passing close to the gate,—which is what was maintained upon the one side,—or was swinging on it,—which is the case maintained on the other. In the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary to decide which of these two contentions is correct.

Now, the gate by which the boy was injured was not itself an efficient or satisfactory one as regarded either its structure or the manner in which it was hung. It is proved that for some time previous to the accident the south half of it—that which fell—had no “stop” to catch it when shut, and that it could be swung round in the direction in which it was not intended to swing, with the effect that the gate acted as a lever, of which the fulcrum was the gate-post. The effect of children swinging upon the gate and bringing it round in this manner was to wrench the fastenings by which it was hung and so to bring it down. It was in this way that the accident occurred. The fastenings were also, it is said, defective, in consequence of the screw-pins not being sufficiently screwed home, but I have not thought it necessary to attach importance to that part of the case. It is sufficient, in my view, that the fastenings were liable to be wrenched in the manner which I have described.

Now the question is whether the School Board are responsible for the state of the gate, and for the accident that happened in consequence. I am of opinion that they are. It was their duty to have the gate, if they wished to have a gate at the place in question at all, in a condition reasonably safe having regard to the surrounding circumstances, and it is no answer for them to say that no

<sup>1</sup> Beveridge v. Kinnear, Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 387; Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 312; Brady v. Parker, June 7, 1887, 14 R. 783.

* The Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), provides that “the school board of every parish and burgh shall maintain and keep efficient every school under their management . . .”

<sup>2</sup> Mersey Dock Commissioners v. Gibbs, 1864, L. R., 1 E. and I. Apps. 93; Marshall v. School Board of Ardrossan, Dec. 10, 1879, 7 R. 359, Lord Deas at p. 374.

<sup>3</sup> Fraser v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Dec. 2, 1882, 10 R. 264; Hughes v. Macfie, Dec. 7, 1863, 2 Hurlstone and Coltman, 744.

No. 151. accident would have occurred if children had not been swinging upon it. It is matter of common experience that young children do swing upon gates so placed, and the fact that in this case they did so is therefore just what the School Board had every reason to expect. I think that we ought to recall the judgment of the Sheriff, and revert to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

June 21, 1889.
Cormack v.
School Board of Wick and Pulteneytown.

I should like to add that the proof laid before us seems far too long for the proper presentation of such a question, and that it is hardly creditable that it should have been allowed to extend to forty-three or forty-four large size pages of print.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I also concur. The Sheriff took the view that the boy had no right to swing on the gate, and "the defenders were not bound to provide a gate on which all or any of the boys attending the school could amuse themselves by swinging. Had a swing been provided, and it had fallen through the defenders' negligence, the case would have been different." But the evidence shews that the defenders allowed the children to use the gate in this manner. They had control of the boys in school hours, and they were under an obligation to see to the sufficiency of their premises. In this they failed, and the accident occurred in consequence.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact (1) that the pursuer's son, while a pupil at the Pulteneytown Academy, a school belonging to the defenders, was injured by the falling of part of the gate of entrance to the school; (2) that the gate was insufficiently hung, was not provided with a stop, and consequently on the occasion libelled swung outwards against a pillar, thereby breaking the hinge, and causing part of the gate to fall on the boy; (3) that he did not by negligence contribute to the accident: Find in law that it was the duty of the defenders to keep the gate in a safe condition, and that they are liable in damages to the pursuer as guardian of his son for the injury done to him: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against: Affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute: Of new assess the damages at £40 sterling: Ordain the defenders to make payment of that sum to the pursuer," &c.

THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C.—WILLIAM GUNN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 152. CICERI & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Asher—Young.
SUTTON & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—R. V. Campbell—Ure.

June 21, 1889.*
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

Contract—Carriage—"Statuary."—C. & Co., Edinburgh, wrote to S. & Co., London,—“We have a large quantity of goods for shipment, both at Venice and Leghorn, consisting of wooden figures, old cases, marble and terra cotta busts, marble columns, wood frames, &c. Will you kindly let us know your rates for such goods from both the above ports to Glasgow by steamer, and the name of your agents at both places?” S. & Co. replied,—“We have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot. Certain large terra cotta figures, of the value of £7, 10s. each, and small figures of men and animals, the property of C. & Co., were carried from Leghorn to Edinburgh on these terms through S. & Co., who contracted with steamship and railway companies for the carriage of goods, and charged through rates to the owners of the goods. The goods having been damaged in transitu, C. & Co. brought an action against S. & Co. for damages as having failed to carry the goods in safety, in implement of their contract. S. & Co. defended the action on the grounds (1) that their contract with C. & Co. was not that of carriage but of agency, in contracting on C. & Co.'s behalf with the actual carriers of the goods, and that they had committed no breach of the contract of agency; (2) that the damaged goods were "statuary," and so not within the contract. Held (1) that the defenders were liable as carriers for the safety of goods within their contract, and (2) (diss. Lord Lee, rev. judgment of Lord Trayner), that the terra cotta busts did not fall within the exception of "statuary."

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

ON 26th October 1887, Ciceri & Company, carvers and gilders, Edinburgh, wrote to Sutton & Company, general carriers and forwarding agents, London,—“We have a large quantity of goods for shipment, both at Venice and Leghorn, consisting of wooden figures, old cases, marble and terra cotta busts, marble columns, wood frames, &c. Will you kindly let us know your rate for such goods from both the above ports to Glasgow by steamer, and the name of your agents at both places?”

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
C.

On 12th November (after some intermediate correspondence) Sutton & Company replied,—“Confirming our letter of the 5th inst., we have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot, plus the usual primage for freight Leghorn to Edinburgh via Glasgow. . . . These rates are for freight only. . . .”

On the 18th Ciceri & Company replied,—“You quote 1s. per cubic foot, but if steamer's option should be by weight, what then? You seem to make a difference between marble busts, and columns, and alabaster, while our other quotation is for both cubic and ton weight, 1000 kils., for marble busts and columns. Please let us know about this, and also what your usual primage is. . . .”

On the 21st Sutton & Company replied,—“. . . . If the goods would yield the steamship company more per 20 cwt. than per 40 cubic feet, then the charge will be 30s. per ton weight instead of per ton measurement. . . .”

On the 25th Ciceri & Company replied,—“Enclosed please find three orders signed on the understanding that the same are as per quotation last sent or at ship's option, as the case may be.”

Ciceri & Company's goods were accordingly dispatched by the steamer “Zena” from Leghorn to Liverpool, on a through bill of lading to Glasgow, and thence per rail to Edinburgh.

They consisted in all of twenty-three cases, eight of terra cotta goods from Pisa, and fifteen of alabaster goods from Florence.

On their arrival in Edinburgh the terra cotta goods were found to be more or less injured.

Ciceri & Company accordingly raised an action against Sutton & Company, concluding for £54, 3s. 4d., as the value of the injured goods.

Sutton & Company defended on the grounds a, (which need not be further considered here) that the injury was due to the improper packing of the goods; b, that the defenders not being common carriers were not liable for the faults of those who actually carried the goods, but only for their own fault, which they denied; c, that the injured goods were statuary, and so expressly excluded from the contract.

A proof was allowed. From the evidence it appeared that Sutton & Company, although they described themselves as “general carriers” as well as “forwarding agents,” did not themselves carry goods. They had agencies in most of the business centres of the world, through whom they

No. 152. contracted for the carriage of goods offered to them, arranging with railway and steamship companies and other carriers, and quoting through rates. Their agents at Leghorn were Alfred Lemon & Company, through whom the contracts for the carriage of Ciceri & Company's goods were made.* The goods were described in the bill of lading as "twenty-three packages alabaster works, terra cotta, frames," &c., and in the waybill from Lemon & Company the eight cases were described as containing "terra cotta." The receipt granted by Lemon & Company to Gabbanini & Ghiloni, the makers of the goods, was in these terms:—"We, the undersigned, received from Messrs Gabbanini & Ghiloni, of Pisa, No. 8 (eight) cases of terra cotta bronzes consigned to be forwarded to Messrs Ciceri & Company of Edinburgh," and on the same day Lemon & Company sent this post-card to Ciceri & Company:—"We beg to advise you that to-day Messrs Gabbanini & Ghiloni, of Pisa, have consigned to us eight cases terra cotta, which we will ship to you by first steamer."

The goods were moulded figures in terra cotta, bronzed, and were in detail,—Four large figures, "Summer," "Winter," "A Lady," and "A Man Drinking Wine" (of the value of £7, 10s. each); four bas reliefs, "The Poulterer," "Hurrah for the Cook," "The Professor's Spectacles," and "The Dairy"; two groups, "After Dinner," and "In the Wine Cellar"; two small figures, "A figure petting a dog," and "A figure petting a cat."

The parole proof consisted mainly of the evidence of artists and of traders directed to the question whether such goods were or were not statuary. The evidence on this point was very conflicting; its general import sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

The excerpts quoted below from the publication issued by the railway clearing-house, entitled "General Classification of Goods by Merchandise Trains on Railways, January 1888," and having written thereon "Foreign Department," was also put in evidence.†

* On 28th October 1887 Sutton & Company wrote to Lemon & Company, enclosing Ciceri & Company's letter of the 26th October, and asking Lemon & Company to quote a rate.

Lemon & Company replied on 2d November,—“We beg to inform you that the freights from this port to Liverpool and Glasgow for statuary, alabaster goods, furniture, and similar, are as follows, viz :—

To Glasgow by direct steamer (monthly)—

Statuary,	45s. and 15 per cent	} per ton or 40 cft.
Alabaster, furniture, &c.,	30s. and 15 per cent

To Glasgow via Liverpool (transhipment)—

Statuary, alabaster, furniture, &c.,	40s. and 15 per cent	do.
--------------------------------------	----------------------	-----

To Liverpool—

Statuary, alabaster, furniture, &c.,	30s. and 15 per cent	do."
--------------------------------------	----------------------	------

Sutton & Company replied on 5th November,—“Will you please look into the matter, and see if you have not made a mistake, as your rates should be lower rather than higher than those from Venice. You had better quote actual cost price, as we understand the quantity is considerable, and Ciceri & Company are exactly the people to get the lowest possible price.”

	Clas.	Page.
† “Alabaster,	4	5
Alabaster ornaments and figures, packed,	5	"
Bronze figures, packed,	5	13
Casts terra cotta,	2	16
Casts and figures, plaster (except plaster casts, common, for ornamenting ceilings or stucco) packed,	5	"
China in boxes or cases,	4	17
Earthenware in boxes or cases, import or export, foreign, direct from or to ship,	2	24

On 6th November 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) assoilzied the No. 152. defenders.*

	Class.	Page.	June 21, 1889. Ciceri & Co. v. Sutton & Co.
Figures, bronze, packed, . . . . .	5	25
Figures, terra cotta, packed, . . . . .	5	"
Figures and casts, plaster or stucco, . . . . .	5	"
Figures and ornaments, alabaster, packed, . . . . .	5	"
Frames, picture, . . . . .	5	28
Furniture packed in cases, . . . . .	5	"
Marble in cases, . . . . .	3	45
Ornaments and figures, alabaster, packed, . . . . .	5	50
Porcelain (as china), . . . . .		55
Statuary (including terra cotta statuary), as per agreement only,
Terra cotta,—
Casts, . . . . .	2	70
Figures, packed, . . . . .	5	"
Statuary, as per agreement only."

* "OPINION.—In October 1887 the pursuers wrote to the defenders informing them that they had a large quantity of goods for shipment, both at Venice and Leghorn, 'consisting of wooden figures, old cases, marble and terra cotta busts, marble columns, wood frames, &c.,' and adding, 'Will you kindly let us know your rate for such goods from both the above ports to Glasgow by steamer?' The defenders replied on 12th November following:—'We have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot,' &c. Some correspondence followed, which I do not regard as very material: the contract between the parties as to the carriage of the goods is contained in the letters I have quoted. Following upon those letters, the pursuers granted orders on the sellers and holders of the goods to deliver the same to the defenders for shipment. Among other things, eight cases of goods were delivered by a firm in Pisa to the defenders' agents in Leghorn, Messrs Alfred Lemon & Co., who (under orders by or arrangement with the defenders) shipped these cases on board a steamer bound for Liverpool, where they were to be reshipped to Glasgow. When these cases were delivered to the pursuers in Edinburgh, it was found that the contents of several of them had been so seriously broken and damaged as to be practically worthless. For the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers through the breakage of their said goods they now seek decree; and they do so on the ground that the damage arose through the defenders' failure duly to implement the contract of carriage into which they had entered with the pursuers. The defenders resist the pursuers' claim on three grounds:—(1) That the damage arose, or was materially contributed to, by the defective and improper manner in which the goods had been packed, which was not discoverable from an examination of the exterior of the cases; (2) that the defenders, not being common carriers, are not liable for the faults of those who actually carried the goods, but only for culpa on their own part, which has not been proved; and (3) that the damaged goods were statuary, a class of goods which the defenders never contracted to carry, but, on the contrary, expressly excluded from their contract.

"My opinion is against the defenders on the first and second of these grounds of defence. I am prepared to hold it proved that the goods in question were packed in the ordinary way, and quite sufficiently packed for safe transit to this country if treated by the carrier with ordinary and reasonable care. Farther, I am of opinion that the defenders (dealing with them not as common carriers, but as special carriers) are responsible for the fault of those who, on their employment, actually carried the goods, as being their agents. But I do not think it necessary to do more than merely state these views, because I am of opinion that the defenders have made good the third ground of defence I have referred to, and that this affords a sufficient answer to the pursuers' claim.

"The defenders did not contract to carry statuary for the pursuers—it was, indeed, expressly excluded from the contract.

"Were the goods which were damaged 'statuary'? Conflicting opinions upon

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—Statuary was sculptured work. It might have a wider signification, which would include the goods in question, but this would also include all terra cotta work except bricks and chimney-cans, and it was out of the question to suppose that the pursuers, whose trade was known to the defenders, were contracting for the carriage of bricks and chimney-cans from Italy. Neither in an artistic nor in a trade sense were the goods in question statuary. At all events, the correspondence made it perfectly plain that the defenders were fully informed as to the class of goods which the pursuers wished to have carried. The Railway Clearing-house List did not treat terra cotta work as being necessarily statuary, though it might be. The defenders were common carriers; at anyrate they had contracted with the pursuers to carry the goods in question, and were liable as such in a question with the pursuers for loss in transitu.

Argued for the defenders;—They were not common carriers, or carriers of any sort. Their contract with the pursuers was not that of carriage but of agency. They were the agents of the pursuers in contracting for the carriage of the goods by the various steamship and railway companies. They had committed no breach of the contract of agency: that at least was not the ground of action: they therefore were not liable. The goods in question were statuary, and so exempted from the contract. That was the fair result of the evidence.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers in this case, Messrs Ciceri, sue a firm of the name of Sutton & Company in respect of injury done to goods in transit from the Continent to Edinburgh. Messrs Sutton & Company undertook as agents to have the goods delivered to their agents abroad transmitted to this country at a certain rate, and they took delivery of the goods without objection, as being in good condition, at a particular place abroad to which they had been carted. After considering the evidence, I think there is no ground for holding that any objection could be made on their part with success on the allegation that the goods were not delivered to them properly packed. They seem to have been packed in the ordinary way suitable for such goods. On the arrival of the goods in Edinburgh, and on their being put down in front of the pursuers' premises, a certain number of cases were found to have received violent injury upon the outside. It is now disputed by the witnesses from the railway company.

this matter were expressed by the witnesses adduced by the parties respectively, but in my opinion the evidence in support of the defenders' view decidedly preponderates. The chief reason assigned by the pursuers' witnesses for their opinion that the goods in question are not statuary is, that the goods were cast or moulded, and not sculptured. That appears to me to be an inadequate reason or ground for their opinion. A plaster cast or a metal moulding may be, and is constantly, classed in art exhibitions as statuary, and the witness for the pursuers best able probably to give an opinion on this subject (Mr Hamilton) admits that such a classification is right. I find (in the best dictionaries I know) that statuary is defined as including figures which have been cast or moulded as well as sculptured. In addition to this, there is evidence to shew that the goods in question are what railway and other carriers regard as 'statuary,' which they only carry on special terms. The pursuers, on the other hand, have not attempted to shew that they ever got similar goods carried for them on ordinary terms as ordinary case goods, although they must frequently have had importations of the same kind of goods as those in question.

"The defenders not having contracted to carry statuary, it appears to me that they are not liable for the value of the statuary which was damaged."

which had them last in their custody, that they were damaged while in their hands; but I think the evidence is conclusive upon that matter. Both the pursuer and his manager say that when they were delivered one of them was badly injured at the corner, and that some of them had the end smashed in. I think it is not in the mouth of the railway company's servants to say that this was not the case, because we find that their own inspector reported to his superiors, "I find the cases in which the figures were packed all broken at ends, having evidently been roughly handled." Now he says himself in his evidence that that was the state of the boxes he saw himself at the door of Mr Ciceri's shop. He desired to alter his report upon that matter afterwards, because he thought he had been misinformed, but it is brought out conclusively in the evidence that he himself saw them in that state, and he states, in answer to a question put to him, that the report which he gave in was a true report. What the defenders endeavoured to make out at the proof was that he had been merely told by the pursuer that they were broken; but he himself admits in his evidence that he saw them broken there. It is put against this that the carters say they were not broken, but we know what evidence of that kind is worth. Carters, by their own account of themselves, always handle cases carefully. Whether they actually looked to see if the damage took place before they were delivered or not, it is not remarkable that they should deny having noticed any damage outside to the boxes. But it is sworn conclusively that they were injured, and it is unlikely that the ends of five or six boxes should have been smashed at Mr Ciceri's door if they were in perfectly sound condition when they arrived there. And as regards what was inside the cases, as I said before, I think it is conclusively proved that they were packed in the proper and ordinary manner. Well, the cases are opened, and Mr Ciceri very properly sends for Mr Bell, the representative of Messrs Sutton & Company in Edinburgh, in order that delivery may be taken of the goods when they are unpacked and taken out of their cases. When they are unpacked, several lots of terra cotta goods are found to be so seriously damaged that their value is practically reduced to a mere fraction of what it was originally.

The next thing which we have to consider is, what is the contract between the parties; because, in ordinary circumstances, if a carrier smashes goods in transit which he had received properly packed, there can be no question whatever about the liability for the damage. And therefore we must now go back to see what was the footing upon which these cases were in the hands of Sutton & Company and those whom they employed between the time that they got them at Leghorn and the time they were opened at Mr Ciceri's door.

It appears that Mr Ciceri, who is described in one of the letters as just the person to get the lowest possible price, had been endeavouring to get a quotation from different persons who undertook carrying, for the purpose of taking what was the lowest rate at which he could have his goods conveyed, and accordingly he asks for a quotation from the defenders. He asks for their quotation for wooden figures, old cases, marble and terra cotta busts, marble columns, wood frames, &c., and the answer that he gets is, "Confirming our letter"—they had written previously to 12th November—"of 5th inst., we have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot." Now Ciceri in reply to that writes,—“You seem,”—and whether he is right in his judgment of what they seem to be doing does not matter,—“You seem to make a difference between

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.

Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

No. 152. marble busts and columns and alabaster." Now, taking the two letters together, I think they can only be read as meaning,—“You seem to make a difference between marble busts and marble columns on the one hand, and alabaster goods upon the other,” “while our other quotation”—that is to say, the quotation from other people—“is for both cubic and ton weight, 1000 kils., for marble busts and columns. Please let us know about this” Now, it is quite plain from that letter that Ciceri wished to know what the difference was between goods described as marble busts and columns and other goods; and apparently in this view, that in addition to any question about safety of transit of such more expensive articles, marble being necessarily much heavier than either terra cotta or alabaster, he wished to know what was to be their rate, because shippers of such goods have a right either to charge per ton measurement or per ton weight, according to the different classes of goods. Now, Sutton & Company in their reply made no allusion whatever to the difference. They answer only as regards the difference of rate in respect of goods which, whatever they consist of, the shipper is entitled to charge according to a tonnage weight charge instead of a tonnage measurement charge; for they say—“If the goods would yield the steamship company more per 20 cwt. than per 40 cubic feet, then the charge will be 30s. per ton weight instead of per ton measurement”; but they give no answer to the question which he had asked about the difference between marble busts and columns and alabaster, in any other respect than that. Therefore I think, as regards all that had passed up to that time, there was no particularisation by either party to indicate clearly what fell under one rate or another, as regards the quality of the goods as distinguished from the weight. Well, what happens is this—The goods are handed to the defenders, distinctly described by the agent who delivers them to their representatives in Leghorn as eight cases of terra cotta bronzes; and those eight cases of terra cotta bronzes are received by the representatives of Sutton & Company in the knowledge of what they contain. Then the post-card which the defenders’ representatives in Leghorn sent to the pursuers is to the same effect—“We beg to advise you that to-day Messrs Gabbanini & Ghiloni, of Pisa, have consigned to us eight cases terra cotta.” And the bill of lading lumps the whole which were sent to Ciceri together, there being some from Pisa, which were terra cotta, and some from Florence, which were alabaster. They are lumped together in the bill of lading with this general description, “Twenty-three packages alabaster works, terra cotta, frames, &c.” Therefore, Messrs Sutton & Company are distinctly informed that there are terra cotta bronzes in the cases coming from Pisa. Information is distinctly given that the eight cases contain terra cotta, and the bill of lading makes no distinction of class whatever. And again in the way-bill from Leghorn the contents of these eight cases are stated as being terra cotta.

Now, the next question is, under which class does terra cotta fall, because if terra cotta, as such, falls into the broad class which requires to be notified in a particular way, then of course that would have a material bearing upon the question. And in regard to that we have some very extraordinary evidence indeed. In the first place, of course, we have the evidence of skilled persons upon the question of what is statuary, and we are referred back to the first letter of Messrs Sutton & Company, in which in quoting their rate they say, “Not for goods described as statuary.” Now, the word “described” rather suggests that it must be described definitely in some carrying list regulating such matters in the business of carrying, because there cannot be the slightest doubt—and the evidence in this case has proved most conclusively—that you can get the most divergent descriptions of statuary from different people, and can get the most divergent descriptions of statuary from the same person within five minutes in the course of his examination. One gentleman tells us that all work in terra cotta is statuary practically, except chimney-pots and things of that kind. Another gentleman tells us that there is no statuary unless you have an entire figure life size. Some people say that statuary must always be sculptured with the hand. Other people maintain that although it is moulded it is still statuary. Some people say that statuary must be in the solid—a representative of the figure in the solid—and others, that bas-reliefs are statuary. Others think that either a plaque or a medallion which represents anything human is statuary also. I think it was even suggested in the debate that representations of leaves or branches of trees might be statuary. Ultimately it was confined to this, that any representation in any material of man, woman, beast, or animal of any kind was statuary. I am unable to accept any of these statements, because if I accept any of them I necessarily come into conflict with others. If you give an abstract literal definition of statuary, it is a thing standing by itself. A column, a simple marble column, or a marble column for the purpose of carrying a bust, is in that sense a statue. But when we come to examine the matter a little more closely we find that in the trade of carrying there is a distinction drawn between statuary made of different materials; and I think if we get to an understanding of what is generally understood in the trade upon that matter, we get at a means of solving this difficult question. I do not think it is a question at all for artists like Mr M'Bride or Mr Hamilton. It is a question of what carriers class as statuary, as distinguished from other goods which they will carry at ordinary rates, and not at a special rate.

Now, in looking at this evidence, I think the most practical thing I can go to for the purpose of testing what is the truth in this case, is the best publication I can find upon the subject, issued by the largest carrying establishment I suppose in the world; it is not indeed a carrying establishment in itself, but an establishment which issues a publication for the general guidance of the vast number of carriers with whom it has to do—the railway clearing-house in London. Now the railway clearing-house publication—upon which, be it observed, the defenders themselves found—I think gives us a practical solution of this matter. It first gives a number of articles and classes of material for which it gives certain specified and fixed rates, and then, after having given all these materials and classes of articles at certain fixed rates, it states this,—“Statuary (including terra cotta statuary) as per agreement only.” I think it is perfectly plain that “statuary” there does not mean every article that is made of the material of which statues are made. It would be a ridiculous interpretation of “statuary” to say that every manufactured article made of marble was statuary. In the same way I am quite clear that it would be a ridiculous interpretation of the word “terra cotta statuary” to hold that it meant every article that is made of terra cotta. That cannot be the meaning of it, even if there were nothing else than that. The word “statuary” must have some meaning attached to it to distinguish a material converted into statuary from other articles made of the same material. It is perfectly plain, I think, that “statuary (including terra cotta statuary) as per agreement only” applies to some special work, either in marble or in terra cotta, or in any other material,

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

No. 152. out of which, according to certain conditions, statuary can be made. And therefore we must now look at the rest of the list to see whether it gives us any aid.

June 21, 1889. What I gather from the rest of the list is this, that ordinary figures in terra cotta Ciceri & Co. v. Sutton & Co. are not statuary. I find that "bronze figures packed" are classified in practically the same class as "terra cotta figures packed," "figures and casts, plaster or stucco," and "figures and ornaments in alabaster packed," and that "casts and figures, plaster (except plaster casts)," are in the same class, and that "alabaster ornaments and figures packed" are in the same class,—the same classification as regards carriage price. Now, what are figures in terra cotta? According to the defenders' contention through their witnesses of skill, figures in terra cotta must mean earthenware pots and chimney-pots, and things of that kind. Surely upon the face of it this description would never apply. Whatever may be the meaning of "statuary," the meaning of the word "figure" is well understood. A "figure" necessarily applies to a representation of some living creature or creature that has had life. It may represent dead figures, human or animal, but still it represents a creature which had animal life when alive. Now, where am I to draw the line between terra cotta statuary and terra cotta figures? The natural line to draw is that terra cotta statuary, like marble statuary, is statuary upon which the hand of the skilled workman or artist has been put to produce the kind of figure and the artistic effect which is desired; an original production, as distinguished from a mere moulded copy. Such are to be conveyed at a higher rate than others. And here it is to be observed that the case of statuary is a very different case from the case of pictures, as regards reproduction by copies. It is rather curious that in the bill of lading of the "Zena," shippers are not allowed to make a claim for greater value than £50 per package—"paintings, pictures, or statuary." In the case of pictures, if you wish to have a copy of a picture, you cannot take the picture and spread it over another piece of canvas, and so make a copy. You are obliged to have another artist's hand to make a copy, and therefore a copy of a picture may have a very high value as compared with a copy of a statue, for a cast copy of a statue is a mere mechanical production. Nobody doubts that these terra cotta figures sent to Mr Ciceri, and which arrived broken, were all of them mere copies of the original work of an artist, produced by the mechanical means of moulding only. They were not in themselves works of art, and the only claim they had to represent art was that they bore the same relation to a work of art as a photograph does to a picture. I think the reasonable interpretation of the clearing-house publication, upon which the defenders themselves found, is that "statuary, including terra cotta statuary," means real works of art. A marble statue that can only be made by another hand is a work of art, although it be a replica only, because it requires the finishing touch of an artist's hand to produce the artistic effect, which cannot be produced in marble without an artistic hand being applied. Of course, if a statue cut in marble is sent by an agent or carrier, and that statue becomes damaged, it is a far greater loss, even though it be only a copy of an original, than if it were merely a plaster cast. It is a greater loss, both in the material of which the statue is made, and also in the artistic finish which is given by the chisel of the artist. Now, I am unable to see what terra cotta articles of the nature of figures could be intended in class five in that publication of the railway clearing-house, if these which were sent to the pursuers are not. The tables making an express distinction between "terra cotta statuary" and "terra cotta figures," I am unable to see any ground for holding that the articles to which this case relates, being, as they were, articles of an inferior kind, can be held to be included in the former definition, rather than in the latter.

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

The conclusion I have come to on the whole matter is this—These articles are simply terra cotta bronzes and terra cotta figures, as described in the railway clearing-house list to be carried at the lower rates; and the pursuers having had their goods injured in transit, the carriers are liable for the loss. I am therefore for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and decerning in favour of the pursuers.

LORD YOUNG.—I arrive at the same conclusion. The question is upon a contract of carriage—as to the liability of the carriers for damage done to goods in transit. It is pointedly put before us in the record, and we had a good deal of argument upon the subject, that the defenders are not common carriers,—that they are not owners of steamships or other means of conveyance, and only undertake to act as agents for those who apply to them to make contracts as agents for behoof of their customers as principals—not common carriers for the carriage of goods. I cannot accept that view of the case. I think it is of no interest to inquire whether the word “common” is applicable to the defenders or not. They are certainly not common carriers with reference to this incident, that they shall be compelled to take any goods that are offered to them if they have room in their vehicles. They have no vehicles, and therefore that incident does not apply to them. It is probably practically the most uninteresting of all incidents touching the common carrier, for I suppose instances are rare of carriers with room in their vehicles refusing to carry goods at the ordinary rates. The incident, however—of no practical importance—is not applicable to the defenders. Whether the edict nautæ, caupones, stabularii is applicable or not, I think is equally uninteresting. They are carriers, whether common carriers or not; and I shall give them the benefit, if they think it any, of saying that they are not common carriers, but only carriers. They design themselves “general carriers,” which I suppose means that they are open to contract with the public for the carriage of goods, not between specified places only, but generally between all places between which goods are carried, or the convenience of the public requires that goods should be carried. They enter into contracts for the carriage of goods, not performing these services with their own vehicles, steamships, or horses, but by others who have vehicles and motive power, and who render their services to them upon terms agreed on. They contract for the carriage of goods, and make their own arrangements for fulfilling their undertaking by that contract.

Now, when anyone undertakes by contract to carry goods between two places, he is bound, as a common incident of the contract, if there be no stipulation to the contrary—for parties may lawfully bargain as they please—to carry them safely, and if he receives them in good order and condition, to deliver them in good order and condition at the place that he has contracted to carry them to; and if he fails in that, he is liable under his contract for the consequences. If a man who has never carried goods before, or contracted to carry goods before, contracts with me to carry my goods from this to London or anywhere else, he receiving them in good order and condition, he is bound by that contract to deliver them at the place of destination in the like good order and condition, unless he has guarded himself against that by a special contract.

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

Now, I think it is proved that there was a contract between the pursuers and the defenders to carry certain goods from Italy (to be exported at Leghorn) to Edinburgh. I shall attend to the question raised immediately, whether that contract excluded all or any of the goods which were damaged in transit. The defenders knew very well the kind of goods which the pursuers imported from Italy. We find that before making the contract with them the defenders made inquiries as to what the carriage of such goods would cost themselves, for the profit of their business is just the charge which they make to their customers for carrying their goods beyond what it will cost them to have the goods carried. That is their profit on their business. And it appears from the documents before us that they made inquiry as to what it would cost them to carry just such goods as the pursuers here import from Italy. By no means exhausting the evidence in the matter, you will find that Lemon & Company write to them, in answer to their inquiries, on 2d November, just before their final answer to the pursuers as to their rates, sending their terms for statuary, alabaster, furniture, &c., and then, in asking a question to see whether the rates could not be reduced, the defenders say,—“Will you please look into the matter and see if you have not made a mistake, as your rates should be lower rather than higher than those from Venice. You had better quote actual cost price, as we understand the quantity is considerable,”—that is of such goods as the pursuers are going to import,—“and Ciceri & Company are exactly the people to get the lowest possible price,”—that is to say, “If your terms are not the lowest, Ciceri & Company are exactly the people to find out the lowest and to go elsewhere; and therefore you had better be as low as possible, as the quantity is considerable.” Well, having got that information, they write to the pursuer on the 12th November,—“We have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot, plus” so and so. “These rates are for freight only.” Of course they were for freight only. There is no insurance. There is only the ordinary liability of carriers who undertake to carry goods without any express stipulation upon the subject. They would not be answerable for “perils of the sea, the act of God, and the Queen’s enemies”—carriers undertaking to carry in safety are not responsible for these consequences. You must resort to insurance in order to cover such risks. The contract was completed upon that footing. They got an answer on the 25th November,—“Enclosed please find three orders, signed on the understanding that the same are as per quotation last sent or at ship’s option, as the case may be.”

It is upon this that the goods are sent—twenty-three cases, including the ten particular articles which were damaged on the way, an inconsiderable part of the whole. Twenty-three cases were shipped, and these twenty-three cases were carried by the defenders, not in vehicles of their own, or ships of their own; but they were carried by them under their contract and upon their responsibility. They made such contracts as they saw fit with other people to perform the actual conveyance, but they were the contractors to the pursuers to convey them. And they did carry these twenty-three cases, and charged for the carriage of them. They sent in their bill as the carriers. They charge £39, 14s. 8d. for carrying these goods, and then they say they never contracted to carry them at all. They were sent to them in good order and condition,—properly packed, for I agree with the Lord Ordinary in that,—and were carried by them, and the account for the carriage was sent in, and they say,—“We were not carriers at all; we never contracted to carry them.” I quite understand the contention, that under the contract which was made the pursuers were not at liberty to include in the packages these particular goods which were damaged, these being described as statuary; and that in including these in any of the boxes they were guilty of deception, and did not merely render themselves liable to the higher charge, but acted in such a manner that if the goods were smashed they were the wrongdoers anent them, and have no claim against the party who carried them and who charged for carrying them. I quite understand that statuary goods properly described as statuary are carried at a higher rate, because they require in the carriage more care and attention and involve greater liability, there being more damage to pay for if anything occurs, for which the carrier is liable, on the journey.

I have looked in vain in the evidence here for anything to suggest the notion that if these goods, with a full description of them such as we have in this record and in the evidence, had been delivered for carriage, the packages containing them would have been dealt with in any other way than they were. There is no case therefore, I think, of this kind,—“We were misled into not taking the care which we should have done if we had known the nature of the goods, and you who so misled us shall not be entitled to compensation for the damage done.” But I think, upon the evidence before us, and I must of course judge upon that, that the pursuers were in perfect good faith in including these goods in the packages. They might quite reasonably, although it might be matter for controversy, take the view that they were not statuary. The pursuer, examined as a witness, swears that in his opinion they were not of that character, and he is in the trade. Of course that might have been contradicted conclusively by other evidence, but I think it is not. I think it is doing him no more than justice to say that he caused these goods to be delivered well packed and in good order to the defenders as carriers, in the belief that they were under the contract for carriage at the specified rate, and that they were not to be properly described as statuary. The Lord Ordinary says in his note what is quite true,—“Conflicting opinions upon this matter were expressed by the witnesses adduced by the parties respectively.” His Lordship is of opinion that the evidence that the goods are statuary preponderates. Now, let me take the view—which I think is perhaps the moderate and reasonable view to take here—that the question whether they are statuary, properly described as such or not, is a question upon which there might reasonably be a difference of opinion,—upon which conflicting opinions may reasonably exist. Even in a question—which I am assuming this to be—where there may be an honest and reasonable conflict of opinion, there will be a preponderance one way or the other. The Lord Ordinary thinks that there is a preponderance in favour of the view that they are statuary. Your Lordship thinks that the preponderance is the other way. I incline to agree with your Lordship. Let us put it as a doubtful matter; what, then, is to be the result of that? No want of good faith on the part of the pursuer; no deception practised by him in order to get the goods carried at a cheaper rate than they would have been had he made a full disclosure; no suggestion that if any further information had been given, the goods would have been treated in a different way in transit. The pursuer honestly believes that the goods are shipped under the contract to carry them in the like good order in which they were received in Italy, and to be delivered in the like good order in Edinburgh. What is the result of their being damaged? According to the defenders, it is that the carriage is to be paid for, but there is no responsibility in respect of them. I am not able to assent to that view. I think if

No. 152.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

No. 152. there had been no damage done to them, and the only question before us was whether the carriers were entitled to a higher rate in respect of these goods, June 21, 1889. I should have thought the question doubtful; but to contend that a carrier Ciceri & Co. v. was under no liability for their safety at all is in my opinion not maintainable. Sutton & Co.

I shall not pursue this matter further. I think I have substantially exhausted all I desire to say. I may, however, notice the bill of lading which was granted by the master, I shall take it really of the defenders' ship, for the ship was the agency employed by them to perform their contract, and they are responsible for it. It is that these twenty-three cases were shipped in good order and condition, and they are described as "twenty-three packages alabaster works, terra cotta, frames, &c." I think that is an extremely applicable description of the very goods we have here in question. If the evidence were all one way, I might be bound to proceed upon it; but it is so contrary to common understanding and language that with the conflict of evidence I cannot accept that which goes to the result that bas-reliefs are statuary, that stucco busts are statuary, that all terra cotta goods are statuary, unless they are in the form of bricks or chimney-pots. It is extravagant to suggest that the pursuers here, whose trade was known to the defenders, were importing terra cotta bricks and chimney-pots, and that that was what was meant by terra cotta figures. They deal in this cheap sort of ornamentation, imitation bronze goods, which are imitation bronze busts, and figures of dogs and cats. A cast or moulding in terra cotta is bronzed over to be so like bronze, that except by lifting it and feeling its weight, or breaking it, and seeing the material, one would hardly know the difference. These are the kind of goods in which they deal,—alabaster ornaments too, just such as fall within the description in this bill of lading given to the defenders' own agents at Leghorn, upon the shipment of the goods.

My opinion upon the whole is in conformity with that which your Lordship has delivered, that there is liability here for not delivering these goods in Edinburgh, which the defenders received well packed, and in good order and condition, in the like good order and condition, but in the broken state which is described. Then there is the question of damages. We are told that the cost price of the goods was £38, the goods in their broken state being worth, the evidence varies, from £2 to £6. I should be disposed here—they are very common-place goods indeed, and can be got, I suppose, in any quantity—to give no more in the way of damages than the cost price, that is, £38; the defenders, if they will have them, getting the broken goods, which are said to be worth from £2 to £6.

LORD LEE.—The claim in this case is for the loss of certain goods which it is said the defenders undertook to carry at the rate of 1s. per cubic foot from Leghorn to Edinburgh, via Glasgow; and the first question is whether they ever undertook to carry any such goods at that rate; and the other question, and that which the Lord Ordinary has decided, is whether the goods in question were within the description of goods which they so undertook to carry. My opinion is that they were not within the description of goods which the defenders undertook to carry at 1s. per foot, and that they cannot be responsible for the loss of them, whether the pursuer was in good faith or not. I am rather disposed to assume that both parties may be in good faith; but one thing is perfectly clear to my mind, that unless these goods were within the description of goods which they contracted to receive in Leghorn and deliver in Glasgow, No. 152. they cannot be responsible for the loss of them. Now the description of goods is contained in the evidence of Mr Ghiloni, Pisa, where the goods were furnished. They consisted of four large busts—"Summer," "Winter," a "Lady," a "Man drinking Wine," and various smaller articles, not very small, but certainly they were to a great extent large busts of the kind described. Now let us see for a moment what was the position of the contract. I must say I have difficulty in seeing that the carriers were made aware that when this contract was accepted there was anything of the nature of statuary—anything that could be described as statuary among them. The letter asks prices to be quoted for "marble and terra cotta busts." Now, if good faith is to be gone into, we must see the defence of Sutton & Company. Their letters to Lemon & Company are conclusive to my mind as to their understanding as to what was included in their offer of 1s. per cubic foot; because, although the letter of the pursuers specially mentions marble and terra cotta busts,—when the defenders come to inquire of Lemon & Company their rates, they deal with both marble and terra cotta busts as statuary:—"Please see enclosed" (i.e., Ciceri's letter of inquiry), "and let us know the rates"; and the answer is, "We beg to inform you that the freights from this port to Liverpool and Glasgow, for statuary, alabaster goods, furniture, and similar, are," &c.—the word "statuary" there being plainly used as including terra cotta busts. There are separate rates for statuary—45s. and 15 per cent per ton or 40 cubic feet, and for alabaster, furniture, &c., 30s. and 15 per cent per ton or 40 cubic feet; accordingly, when the defenders quote 1s. per cubic foot for alabaster goods, they add, "but not for goods described as statuary." Now I agree with the Lord Ordinary that under this contract Messrs Sutton & Company did not undertake for 1s. per cubic foot to carry anything that fell fairly within the description of statuary. The question is whether the goods which are contained in the description are statuary or not.

There is undoubtedly a conflict of evidence upon that matter. I agree that it is not to be settled as a question of skill by artists; but as artists' evidence has been referred to, I think it may possibly be not improper to notice that the pursuers' artist, Mr Hamilton, expressly said that a plaster cast of a human figure is statuary as much as if it were cut out of marble. I rather agree with your Lordship that it is not a question for artists. The question is, what was the meaning of this contract as between a trader in such goods and a carrier. Here again I think the evidence is in favour of the Lord Ordinary's view. I think that even the clearing-house classification which your Lordship referred to is in favour of the Lord Ordinary's view. It distinctly mentions terra cotta as a subject of separate classification. It divides terra cotta into three heads—casts, figures, and statuary; and statuary has no class,—it is carried only per special agreement. The evidence of the pursuer upon the subject, I must say, is not very distinct, because it varies. Anybody who will read it will see that it is not by any means distinct. But his witness Wanda, who is a man who speaks in a carrier sense, says—"We would call them statuary." Palmer, says—"I would consider such goods statuary, but not in a literal sense," but "in a general sense," which I take to mean in a carrier's sense, and not in a trader's sense. The witness Bell says—"I call the broken goods in question statuary." The artist M'Bride, if the defenders' artist is to be considered at all, says—"I would describe the goods as terra cotta statuary"—that is, as falling within class 3 of the terra cotta class of the railway clearing-house classification.

No. 152. There is a man Alfred James who also is interested in the carrying trade.

June 21, 1889.
Ciceri & Co. v.
Sutton & Co.

He says, "I have seen the articles damaged; they are unquestionably statutory." I must say I think the weight of the evidence—and in dealing with the weight of the evidence I have in view the letters of the parties, the list of the goods, and the evidence both of the skilled witnesses of the pursuer and of the trading witnesses—is that these four life size terra cotta busts can only be regarded as terra cotta statuary within the meaning of this contract.

What is the result? It has been suggested that as the goods were carried they must be paid for. I cannot agree with that. They were put into the defenders' custody as ordinary case goods falling under the class payable at the rate of 1s. per cubic foot. They were not ordinary case goods. The result in my opinion is that no liability can attach to the carrier, for there was no contract. I think the carriers, in that view, if they were statuary, ought to have had the opportunity of rejecting them, and I think it would have been prudent on the part of Ciceri and Company to give them an opportunity of rejecting them. I do not suggest that there is any want of good faith on the part of Ciceri and Company. I do not say they intended to cheat; but it was for them to shew that they made a contract of carriage with regard to these articles under which they can recover if the articles were broken. I think they have failed in that, and therefore, although I admit that there is a good deal of conflict, I think the weight of the evidence is in support of the Lord Ordinary's view of the proof, and also of the question of fact—were the goods injured "statuary" or not? I state my opinion with great diffidence. Your Lordships have decided otherwise. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship upon the other question upon which he has given an opinion, that the damage is not proved to have arisen from defective packing. I agree that the defenders are liable as carriers for injury under a contract of carriage with regard to goods of the class payable at 1s. per cubic foot.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £38; declaring, with reference to the proportion of freight claimed by the pursuers as effeiring to damaged goods, that said proportion forms a proper deduction from the defenders' account for carriage: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses; remit, &c."

GORDON PETRIE & SHAND, S.S.C.—WYLIE & ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 153. LAMING & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Lord-Adv. Robertson—Murray.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.*

JOHN WHITE SEATER AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—C. S. Dickson—Salvesen.

Ship—Right of Mortgagees—Charter-party.—The owner of a ship, over which he has granted a mortgage, is not entitled to deal with the ship as owner, in such way as may materially prejudice the mortgagee's security.

The owner of a ship, who had granted a mortgage and had agreed to insure the vessel, subsequently chartered her. In a question between the mortgagee and the charterer, held that the mortgagee was entitled to prevent her from sailing uninsured.

Process—Amendment of Summons—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. No. 153. cap. 100), sec. 29.—An action was raised to have a steamship forthwith delivered to the pursuers, “or alternatively, in the event of the defender . . . failing so to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship,” to have the whole defenders found liable in damages. After evidence had been led, which dealt with damage sustained before the raising of the action as well as after, and judgment had been pronounced in the Outer-House, the pursuers and reclaimers moved to be allowed to substitute for the words quoted above, the words “and in any event.” Held (1) (diss. Lord Lee) that the summons as laid did not conclude for damage from non-delivery prior to the date of the action, and (2) that as the effect of the amendment would be to include such damage, the amendment was incompetent.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

By charter-party dated 9th October 1886, William Hunter & Company, shipowners, 12 Waterloo Street, Glasgow, chartered the steamship “Mula,” of which William Hunter was the registered owner, to Alfred Laming & Company, steam-shipping agents, 8 Leadenhall Street, London, for a voyage from the United Kingdom to the Mediterranean and back, the voyage to commence on 25th October 1886. The ship was not delivered to the charterers in terms of the charter-party, but by agreement dated 15th April 1887, endorsed on the charter-party, the parties thereto agreed that it should remain in force for a further period.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

Hunter & Company had in September 1886 mortgaged the ship to Thomas Barr, John Forrester, and David Inglis Urquhart, merchants in Glasgow, in security of a loan for £1350. In the following month (October 1886) she was put by her owners into the hands of Ramage & Ferguson, shipbuilders, Leith, for repair. Hunter & Company being unable to pay the shipbuilders' account, an agreement was in February 1887 entered into between Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart, of the first, second, and third parts respectively, Ramage & Ferguson of the fourth part, and Hunter of the fifth part, by which it was arranged that the first, second, and third parties should increase their total advances to £2650, and receive a first mortgage over the ship for that amount; that the fourth parties should receive £1300 in cash, and promissory-notes and a second mortgage for the balance of their account; and that the fifth party should keep the ship insured at Lloyd's for the sum of £4000 at least in name of the first, second, third, and fourth parties. The fourth parties further renounced and discharged “any claim for a lien present or future over the said vessel in connection with or arising out of said repairs, and undertake and bind and oblige themselves fully to execute and complete all repairs on said vessel which may be required to make her fit and ready for sea in every respect, and they further undertake and bind and oblige themselves that the said vessel shall, when said repairs are executed, pass the Board of Trade's Surveyor at Leith, and that all within the space of one month from the last date hereof (9th February). . . .”

Upon 22d April 1887 Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart entered into possession of the ship as mortgagees. Upon 28th April they obtained an interim interdict forbidding her removal, and on the following day they raised an action of payment, declarator, and sale in the Court of Session against Hunter.

Laming & Company were not called as parties to this action, but the first advertisement of the sale contained the following:—“ . . . The articles and conditions of sale, the inventory of the steamer and her stores, and a copy of the charter-party or contract betwixt the late managing owners and Alfred Laming & Co., can be seen. . . .”

The subsequent advertisements contained no reference to Laming & Company's charter-party.

The interdict was declared perpetual upon 9th May.

No. 153.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

Upon 14th June an agreement was entered into between Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart of the first part, and Ramage & Ferguson of the second part, to have the ship bought in if no one bid more than the upset price of £4500. By said agreement Messrs Ramage & Ferguson also undertook " (first) that they shall bear the whole maintenance, risk, and expense as aforesaid of the vessel in implementing the said charters entered into by the owner until after the completion of the first voyage under the charter-party with Laming & Company as aforesaid; and (second) that they shall bear and pay the whole claims against the ship, including as aforesaid up to the date of raising the said action (29th April 1887), and the expense of disputing such claims if they elect to do so, all charges and expenses subsequent to said 29th April being borne by the parties hereto, according to their respective interests as aforesaid, until the vessel sails on her first voyage from Leith: It being the meaning and intention of the parties that until the ship is freed from all obligations entered into by, or incurred on behalf of, the owner, in so far as enforceable against the vessel, as preferable to the mortgagees, under Laming & Company's charter up to the end of the first voyage and she is in a position to earn clear freight for the whole parties, any charges or expenses enforceable against the vessel preferably to the mortgagees shall be borne solely by the second party."

On 20th June the ship was sold under decree of the Court to John White Seater, shipbroker, Leith, who proved to be the nominee or agent of Ramage & Ferguson.

Laming & Company, after repeatedly pressing Hunter & Company for delivery of the "Mula," and after writing to them and to the mortgagees that they would hold them liable for any loss they might sustain through the ship not having been delivered in terms of the charter-party, on 27th June intimated that they would bring proceedings in Court, and then raised an action against J. W. Seater, Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart, and Ramage & Ferguson, and also against Hunter & Company and their sole partner William Hunter.

The summons, which was signeted upon 4th July 1887, concluded for declarator "that the defender John White Seater is bound forthwith to deliver to the pursuers the iron screw-steamship or vessel called the 'Mula,' of which he is now the registered owner, in the state, for the purposes, and under the terms and conditions expressed in a charter-party entered into between the defenders William Hunter & Company and the pursuers, dated the 9th day of October 1886, and agreement endorsed thereon between the defenders William Hunter & Company and the pursuers, dated the 15th day of April 1887, together with the bunker coals, belonging to the pursuers, on board of the said steamship or vessel, amounting to 215 tons or thereby: And it being so found and declared, the defender John White Seater ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, forthwith to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship or vessel in the state, for the purposes, and under the terms and conditions expressed in the said charter-party and agreement endorsed thereon, together with the said bunker coals belonging to the pursuers as aforesaid: Or alternatively, in the event of the defender John White Seater failing so to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship or vessel, and coals therein, the whole defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, conjunctly and severally, to make payment to the pursuers (1) of the sum of £1000 in name of damages; and (2) of the sum of £100 as the value of the said bunker coals, with interest on these two sums at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation hereon until payment: Together with the sum of £100, or such other sum as our said Lords shall modify, as the expenses of the process to follow hereon. . . .” No. 153.

Delivery of the “Mula” was given to the pursuers in August 1887, and they, on 15th November 1887, by minute, restricted “the conclusions of the summons to a conclusion against the whole defenders, conjunctly and severally, for the sum of £500, in name of damages sustained by the pursuers prior to the delivery of the said vessel, with interest thereon and expenses as concluded for.” June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent sued for in consequence of the defenders’ failure to deliver to them the said steamship “Mula,” in terms of the charter-party and relative agreement founded on, decree should in the circumstances be pronounced against the whole defenders, in terms of the conclusions of the summons as amended, with expenses. (2) The defenders Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart having wrongfully taken possession of the vessel, and having unwarrantably refused to deliver her to the pursuers, and the pursuers having suffered thereby loss and damage to the extent concluded for, the said defenders are liable in damages therefor. (3) The defenders Seater and Ramage & Ferguson having purchased the said vessel subject to the pursuers’ rights, and having refused to deliver her to the pursuers for fulfilment of the said charter-party, are liable in damages for the loss which the pursuers have thereby sustained.

The defenders (other than Messrs William Hunter & Company and William Hunter, who did not appear in the action) pleaded—(1) The pursuers’ statements are irrelevant. (5) The pursuers having got delivery of the vessel from the defenders whenever she was ready for sea, the defenders are not liable for any loss or damage the pursuers may have suffered.

A proof was allowed. It appeared that the whole or almost the whole damage caused by the non-delivery of the “Mula” to the pursuers occurred between 27th June and the raising of the action. They had subchartered the vessel to a Mr Dasnieres, and he would have taken delivery up to the end of June 1887, but he had then to hire another steamer, and the pursuers had to pay him the increased freight which he had to pay for the new vessel.

There was evidence that the “Mula” was not fit for sea until August 1887. She never was insured in terms of the agreement of February 1887.

There was evidence (quoted in the opinion of Lord Lee) that the non-delivery of the “Mula” was due to the action of Ramage & Ferguson, and not to that of Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart.

On 17th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (M’Laren) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds that the mortgagees, Barr and others, when they entered into possession of the ship ‘Mula’ were not entitled to disaffirm the contract of affreightment into which the owners had entered while they were, with the mortgagees’ consent, retaining the possession of the ship, such contract being of a usual and reasonable description: Finds also that the said mortgagees were entitled to insist on the fulfilment of conditions necessary for their protection, and in particular that they were entitled to prevent the ‘Mula’ from sailing until a policy of marine insurance had been effected available for their protection against sea risks: Finds that the owners were not able to effect such an insurance and that the detention of the ship by the mortgagees was justifiable: Finds further, that the defenders Ramage & Ferguson were entitled to detain the said ship under their right of lien until their account for repairs should be paid or satisfied: Therefore assoilzies all the defenders who are parties to the closed record from the conclusions of

No. 153. the action, and decerns: Finds these defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

* "OPINION.—In this case the pursuers, the hirers, under a charter-party of the steamship 'Mula,' sue for damages for breach of charter-party, in respect that the vessel was not delivered to them as stipulated. The parties immediately interested as defenders are (1) Barr and others, mortgagees, and (2) Ramage & Ferguson, claiming on the customary shipbuilders' lien for repairs, by whose acts it is alleged the vessel was prevented from sailing. The question is as to the nature and limitations of the rights of a mortgagee and holder of a lien against a charterer or hirer. These are to be considered separately.

"First, As to the right of a mortgagee. This is to be determined with reference to the quality of the subject of the mortgage. It is not the same as that of a pledgee of ordinary corporeal moveables, because actual possession is not necessary to the efficacy of the mortgage of a ship. The mortgagee has civil possession of a qualified kind by the registration of his mortgage, and if it be necessary that he should enter into actual possession to secure his rights, he must use his rights with a due regard to the interests of the owners. Neither is the right of a mortgagee in all respects the same as that of a heritable creditor. The latter on entering into possession may by known methods secure that the rents shall be payable to himself, and he has no power to interfere with the tenant's right under an existing lease. But the mortgagee of a ship holds a security over a floating subject which in the very act of use is liable to be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Courts of the country in which the right of mortgage is constituted, and which also in the act of use is exposed to the perils of the sea.

"My general view of the mortgagee's rights may be stated under two heads—(1) As to the right of the mortgagee in a question with the owner—supposing he does not desire to bring the ship to sale, the mortgagee, if he finds the ship in a British port, may at once enter into actual possession, ousting the owner from the management. He may dismiss the master, and appoint another responsible to himself, or he may re-engage the master, making the master responsible to himself, and may thus acquire all the assurance which is possible in the nature of the case that the ship will be returned to him on the completion of her voyage. (2) As to the mortgagee's rights in a question with the charterer or hirer of the ship, it is evident that if the mortgagee does not enter into possession at the time of making the advance, he does, as a matter of fact, assent to the owner exercising all ordinary powers for the joint benefit of owner and mortgagee. Accordingly, if the owner enters into a reasonable charter-party for the purpose of enabling the ship to earn freight, this must be held to be done with the mortgagee's consent. One of the conditions of a reasonable charter-party is that the ship shall be insured against sea risks for the voyage by one of the parties to the contract, usually by the owner. From the point of view of the mortgagee's interest it is not enough that there shall be an agreement to insure. A suitable insurance must be effected, failing which the mortgagee is, as I conceive, entitled to prevent the ship from sailing. He is also entitled to prevent the ship from putting to sea in an unseaworthy condition. Generalising, the mortgagee must recognise existing contracts of affreightment, subject to this, that he can insist on the preliminary fulfilment of all conditions which are necessary for the safety of the subject and for his own indemnification against sea risks. He is not bound to advance money for such purposes.

"According to these conditions, the case against Messrs Barr and others will in my judgment entirely fail, and that for two reasons—(1) The mortgagees were not in possession at the date of the original charter-party, but possession was finally taken on 22d April, and the agreement was renewed on 27th May; (2) the ship was not in seaworthy condition at the time when the voyage ought to have commenced. She was in the hands of Messrs Ramage & Ferguson for repair, and the work of repairing had proceeded slowly because instalments of the cost were not forthcoming. Eventually certain of the mortgagees advanced a sum towards the completion of the repairs. They were not bound to do so, and

The pursuers reclaimed, and moved to be allowed to amend their summons under the Court of Session Act, 1868, section 29,* by substituting for the words "or alternatively, in the event of the defender John White Seater failing so to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship or vessel, and coals therein," the words "and in any event."

No. 153.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

Argued for the reclaimers ;—The proposed amendment was competent. The question under the statute was,—“What was the real question in controversy between the parties?” The purpose and result of the proposed amendment was—not to alter the question here in controversy, but merely to bring out that question more clearly. Not one word of the pursuers’ condescendence required to be altered, and the proof related almost exclusively to the loss which had accrued before the date of the action. The amendment was formal, not substantial.

Ramage & Ferguson had no right of lien. The ship never was in their private yard, but only in the public dock. Such possession therefore did not give rise to a right of lien. The right of lien must be proved to have been given.<sup>1</sup> But in any case Ramage & Ferguson could have no right of lien after the agreement of February 1887. The mortgagees were bound to if they had not made the advance the ‘Mula’ would probably have remained in the shipwrights’ hands subject to their lien for repairs until she came to be sold under judicial authority in the action of sale referred to on record. When the ‘Mula’ was eventually got ready for a voyage the owners were not in a position to satisfy the mortgagees that the ship was covered by insurances. The owners had instructed their brokers to insure her, but the brokers would only insure subject to their own lien for a balance due to them on past transactions. Consequently any insurance that might be effected in this way would be valueless to the mortgagees as an indemnity to them against the loss of the ship. They accordingly took up the position that they would not allow the ‘Mula’ to proceed to sea until policies were delivered or assigned to them to the extent of their debt. This could not be done, and my opinion is that Barr and others were within their rights when they refused to allow the ‘Mula’ to commence her voyage.

“The case of Messrs Ramage & Ferguson is stronger. I consider that they had a lien for their repairs which was not lost by the ship going out of their yard to a pier or harbour where the work of repairing was continued, but which would have been lost if the ship had commenced her voyage. Their right then was to detain the ship until their account should be paid or provided for.

“It is true that through the exercise of the rights of the mortgagees and the builders the pursuers have lost money. But this is through the fault of the owners, and does not, as the case presents itself to me, render the parties who are responsible for the detention of the ship responsible in damages.

“It follows from this opinion that the defenders Barr and others, and the defenders Ramage & Ferguson, are entitled to be assolizied from the action. If a different view were taken I think that damage has been proved (approximately) to the extent claimed in the proof.”

* The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29, enacts, —“The Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session, upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper ; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made : Provided always, that it shall not be competent, by amendment of the record or issues under this Act, to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading, unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment.”

<sup>1</sup> Barr & Shearer v. Cooper, June 6, 1873, 11 Macph. 651, Feb. 26, 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 14.

No. 153. respect the rights of the charterers.<sup>1</sup> They had no right to prevent the ship earning freight, at least on an ordinary charter-party, such as this was. Now, Barr, Forrester, and Urquhart, had no objection to allowing the ship to sail. The real opposition came from Ramage & Ferguson, whose mortgage was after the date of the charter-party, and who were not at that date in possession. They maintained that as mortgagees they had an interest to prevent the ship from sailing in an unseaworthy condition, and that might be so. But it was on Ramage & Ferguson that the duty lay of putting her into a seaworthy condition; and the evidence shewed plainly that they were in breach of that obligation. It was not in their mouths, therefore, to plead her unseaworthy condition. In so acting they were not respecting the rights of the charterer. As mortgagees they were not indeed bound to fulfil the contract of the mortgager, but they were bound to do all in their power to permit of its fulfilment, provided their own rights were not prejudiced. Then it was said that the owners had undertaken to insure, and had failed to do so. But that obligation was between the owners and the mortgagees; it did not affect the charterers. The fulfilment of a personal obligation by the owners to pay money could not be made a condition precedent of the charterer's being allowed to exercise his rights. Besides it was plain on the evidence that the failure to have the ship insured was not the cause of her detention.

Argued for the defenders;—The proposed amendment was incompetent. The summons as framed plainly contemplated damages only as an alternative to future non-delivery, i.e., damages arising after the date of the summons. The effect of the amendment would be to include damages arising before the date of the summons. The only real damage, if any, arose before the date of the action.

The charterer of a ship had no higher rights than the owner.<sup>2</sup> Now, here the owner had undertaken to the mortgagees to insure, and certainly could not have withdrawn the ship from their possession without insuring; neither therefore could the charterer. Further, the rights of the mortgagees would be materially prejudiced if the ship were allowed to sail in an unseaworthy condition, and they were therefore entitled to prevent that. It was no answer that Ramage & Ferguson were under obligation to repair her. They were, in the first place, not the only mortgagees; but, even if they had been, their breach of their obligation to the owners to repair the vessel was no answer to their defence, as mortgagees, to the charterers, who had no title to enforce contracts between the owners and third parties. In short, the pursuers' remedy was against the owners, they had no privity of contract with the mortgagees.

At advising,—

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK read the following opinion of LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK (with which he concurred):—

The pursuers entered into a charter-party with Messrs Hunter & Company, the owners of the steamship "Mula," dated 15th April 1887, and founding on that contract they have raised this action, which is directed against (1) John White Seater, who at the date of the action was the registered owner of the vessel; (2) Thomas Barr, John Forrester, and David Inglis Urquhart, who were mortgagees; (3) Ramage & Ferguson, who were mortgagees, and had also been employed to repair the "Mula"; and (lastly) William Hunter, the sole partner of William Hunter & Company, the original owners. No appearance has been entered for Hunter, who is said to be insolvent, and it is admitted that Seater is no more than the nominee of the mortgagees, who are the real defenders in the case. No. 153.

<sup>1</sup> Collins v. Lamport, Dec. 1864, 4 De G. J. and S. 500, 34 L. J. Chan. Div. 196 (Lord Chancellor Westbury); "The Maxima," June 18, 1878, 39 L. T. (N.S.) 112; "The Fanchon," April 21, 1880, L. R. 5 Prob. Div. 173; Cory & Company v. Stewart, April 7, 1886, Times L. R. vol. 2, 508; "The Innisfallen," June 15, 1866, L. R. 1 Ad. and Eccle. 72; Keith v. Burrows, July 1877, L. R. 2 Ap. Ca. 636.

<sup>2</sup> Collins v. Lamport, supra.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

The pursuers seek declarator that the defender Seater is bound forthwith to deliver to the pursuers the steamship "Mula" in the state, for the purposes, and under the terms and conditions of the above-mentioned charter-party, and decree to enforce the declarator. And after that conclusion the summons proceeds,— "Or alternatively, in the event of the defender John White Seater failing so to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship or vessel and coals therein, the whole defenders ought and should be decreed and ordained by decree foresaid, conjunctly and severally, to make payment to the pursuers (1) of the sum of £1000 in name of damages, and (2) of the sum of £100 as the value of the said bunker coals." I omit any reference to the coals which are mentioned, because they were delivered to the pursuers, and no question arises in regard to them.

The steamer was delivered to the pursuers in August 1887, and on 15th November 1887 the pursuers lodged a minute of restriction of their summons, which is No. 8 of process. It restricts the conclusions of the summons to a conclusion for damages sustained by the pursuers prior to the delivery of the vessel.

The first question which presents itself for consideration is, what damages can be recovered under that conclusion? The conclusion for damages being expressly dependent on the failure of the defender Seater to deliver the ship, the result seems to be that if Seater delivered the ship in terms of the pursuers' demand there is no conclusion for damages. In other words, the damages concluded for are the damages which will result from the failure to deliver, which of course can only be damages arising after the date of the action. The pursuers proposed an amendment of the summons so as to enable them to recover the damages incurred by them between the date of the charter-party and the date of the action. The motion was made under the 29th section of the Act of 1868; but, in my opinion, we cannot sustain it, for if we did, we should, I think, be violating the express declaration of the statute to the effect that it shall not be competent by amendment "to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum, or any other fund or property, than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading." Under the summons, as it now stands, we can only, in my opinion, give a decree for such damages as arise after the date of the action. To allow the summons to be altered to the effect of enabling us to give a decree for damages which have arisen prior to the date of the action, would be to enlarge the subject-matter of the action, and would, in my opinion, be contrary to the provision of the statute which I have just quoted. The pursuers urged that the proof was, inter alia, led with a view to seeing the damages which had arisen prior to the action, and that it was led without objection on the part of the defenders. That is true; but I do not think that by reason of that fact we are the less bound to act in conformity with the statute, for I cannot hold that the failure of the defenders to object is equivalent to that consent which the statute requires before we can enlarge the conclusions of the summons. The case as it stands could not be disposed of without an inquiry into the conduct of the parties prior to the date of the action. If evidence as to damage arising before that date was introduced, all that can be said of it is that it

No. 153. was irrelevant. To admit irrelevant evidence is not the same thing as to consent that the Court shall adjudicate upon it. If I am right, so far there is an end, or almost an end, to the case. I think the greater part of the damage, if not the whole of it, arose prior to the date of the action. But various questions of importance have been argued to us, and I think it right to consider these, all the more as another view may be taken of the summons than that which I have adopted.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

As I have said, the pursuers' charter-party is dated 15th April 1887. They had a prior charter-party, which they cancelled in terms of a power therein contained. It is not necessary to refer to the prior charter-party further. The "Mula" was mortgaged to the defenders Barr & Forrester for £1350, conform to mortgages dated September 1886. In October of that year she was placed in the hands of the defenders Ramage & Ferguson for extensive repairs, which were proceeded with, but it became evident that Hunter & Company were unable to meet the cost. Ultimately an agreement was entered into between them and (1) Barr & Forrester and Urquhart, and (2) Ramage & Ferguson, dated February 1887, the effect of which was (1) that Barr & Forrester, in conjunction with Urquhart, advanced to Hunter & Company £1300, and obtained a mortgage for £2650, which included the sum contained in the prior mortgage for £1350; and (2) that Ramage & Ferguson obtained £1300 towards payment of their account and a mortgage for £500. These mortgages were dated in February 1887. Ramage & Ferguson further bound themselves to have the vessel fit for sea by 9th March, and they renounced all claim for lien for the repairs which they had made. By the same agreement Hunter, the owner, undertook to have the vessel insured in the name of the other parties to the agreement. It is admitted that no such insurance was ever effected. On 22d April 1887 Barr & Forrester and Urquhart entered into possession of the ship as mortgagees. On 28th April they raised a note of suspension and interdict to prevent its removal, and obtained interim interdict, which was declared perpetual on the 9th of May. Further, on 29th April they raised an action of declarator and sale, and under decree of the Court the ship was sold on 20th June to Seater, who, as I have already said, was the mere nominee of the mortgagees. The pursuers were not called to this action, as the raisers of it were not aware of the charter-party. But when they came to be aware of it, it was at first proposed that the sale should be made under burden of the charter-party, but this proposal was not carried out. The pursuers did not intervene in the proceedings, for the reason that they expected the sale to proceed under the burden of the charter-party as it stood. The ship was detained till August, when, as I have said, she was delivered to the pursuers.

It is in these circumstances that the pursuers bring their action of damages. It is to be observed that they do not maintain that the defenders were bound by the charter-party, or that they could sue the defenders in virtue of any contract. Their case is that the defenders were bound to respect the rights of the charterers, and to deliver the vessel to them in implement of the charter-party, that they wrongfully failed to do so, and that they are therefore liable in damages. The pursuers referred to the case of Collins v. Lamport as determining the rights of mortgagees in a question with the charterers. The defenders admit its authority. The passage in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) on which the pursuers rely is as follows:—"As long therefore as the dealings of the mortgagor with the ship are consistent with the mortgagee's security, so long as these dealings do not materially prejudice and detract from or impair the sufficiency of the security of the vessel, as comprised in the mortgage, so long as there parliamentary authority given to the mortgagor to act in all respects as owner of the vessel, and if he has authority to act as owner he has of necessity authority to enter into all these contracts touching the disposition of the ship which may be necessary for enabling him to get the full value and the full benefit of his property." I accept that declaration of the law to its full extent. The limit of the owner's right to deal with the ship is to be found in the prejudice of the security of the mortgagees. So long as the mortgage is not materially prejudiced or detracted from, the owner may deal with the ship as he pleases. Where the security is prejudiced—or to keep to the language of the Lord Chancellor more closely, is materially prejudiced—he may not. It is, I think, obvious that the right of the charterer cannot be higher than the right of the owner. That right is to obtain delivery of the ship from the owner for implement of the charter-party. If the owner cannot in a question with the mortgagees legally give delivery, the charterer cannot claim it, and if the mortgagees have a right to withhold the use of the ship from the owner they have an equal right against the charterer.

We have thus to consider the position in which the mortgagees were placed in regard to the owners. It is plain enough that their mortgage was in jeopardy. The owners were in great pecuniary embarrassment, and could not meet the cost of repairing the ship. Further, the owners had become bound to effect an insurance over the ship in the name of the mortgagees, which they did not do, and which, so far as I judge from the evidence, they were never in a condition to do. The mortgagees thereupon took the ordinary steps for realising their security. They first prevented the removal of the ship by interdict, and thereafter proceeded with an action for a sale. In all this they were, I think, quite justified. But the pursuers demanded that the ship should be given to them in order to implement the charter-party. Could the owners have insisted on this? I do not think that they could. The conclusive answer of the mortgagees would be that their security would be thereby materially prejudiced. If the ship had been sent to sea without being insured, it is hardly necessary to say that the mortgagees would have been put into serious peril, and that a sale could only have been effected at great disadvantage. It is true that the charterer had nothing to do with the insurance of the ship, but that is in my opinion beside the question. The owners had undertaken to insure it in the name of the mortgagees, and they could not in a question with the mortgagees have insisted on sending the ship to sea while that obligation remained unfulfilled. The charterers are in the same position, and in my judgment they cannot have a higher right than the owners. For these reasons I am of opinion that the defenders did not act wrongfully in failing to deliver the ship to the pursuers.

But the defenders have a further defence. They say that the ship was not in a seaworthy condition up to the date of the action, and in my opinion that is proved. It is said that very little remained to be done, but I think it is proved that there were serious defects. The pursuers' witness, Jones, admits that it would not have been judicious to allow her to sail without the necessary alterations being made. I entirely agree with him, and I think that where it is judicious to have repairs made in port the mortgagees were not at all wrong in preventing the ship from going away till these repairs were made. It is true that Ramage & Ferguson undertook to have the repairs completed by the middle of

No. 153.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

No. 153. March. I do not think that that is material. This contract was with the owners. The pursuers as charterers were not in right of it. The owners could not have insisted to the prejudice of the mortgagees in sending the ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and it follows from what I have said that the charterers were under the same disability.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

It was urged that Ramage & Ferguson could not found on the breach of their obligation to complete the repairs; but as the charterers were not in right of their obligation they cannot, I think, found upon it, neither can the owners in this question. For beyond doubt Ramage & Ferguson have committed a breach of contract as shipwrights, but they could not compel them because of such a breach to surrender their rights as mortgagees. Besides, the other mortgagees were not affected by this breach, and they had an independent right to retain the ship.

I do not think that Ramage & Ferguson had any lien for the repairs, and I cannot concur with the Lord Ordinary on that point.

The result is, in my opinion, that the defenders should be assolized.

LORD LEE.—I have the misfortune to differ from the opinion which has been delivered, and from the Lord Ordinary; but I do not find it at all necessary to question the proposition in law upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeds, viz., that the first mortgagees were entitled to refuse to allow the ship to go without delivery of a policy of assurance. They did so in the month of April; but the ground upon which I arrive at the conclusion that there was a wrongful detention of the vessel, and that Ramage & Ferguson are responsible, is that the delay of the ship—the refusal to allow it to go when it was demanded ultimately—was not caused by Barr & Urquhart, the first mortgagees, I think, but was caused entirely by the conduct of Ramage & Ferguson. I think that they acted not only contrary to their legal rights, but contrary to their obligations, in refusing to allow the ship to go, as I shall endeavour to explain.

The action was originally an action for delivery of the ship. It was raised upon the 4th of July 1887, but it had been intimated on the 27th of June. It was subsequently converted into an action of damages by an arrangement to which Ramage & Ferguson were parties, and which is contained in a minute of the 15th November, as the ship had been given up, and the only question that was left was the question of damages. The conclusion for delivery was directed against Seater, as the registered owner. He had been put forward by Ramage & Ferguson as the purchaser of the ship at a public sale, as a person quite independent of them, as a person who held the ship by his judicial title, and under conditions fixed by the Court, and which freed him from the charter-party. That appears from the joint print, where they meet the demand which was made upon them by the pursuers at that time for delivery of the ship. They had on the 25th June put forward Seater as a person with whom they had nothing to do, saying,—“You are in error in supposing that the charter-party was referred to in the advertisement of the ship, or that she was sold subject to the fulfilment of any charter-party which her former owner had entered into,” and so on. Now, Seater admittedly turns out not to have been an independent party at all. He was a mere agent or trustee for Ramage & Ferguson. But the conclusion for delivery was quite properly and sufficiently directed against him as the registered owner. And the question of damages which is now alone in the case in my view depends upon this question, whether Ramage & Ferguson, and their nominee or agent Seater, were not bound to deliver the ship at the time when that action was raised. No. 153.

I say my view is, that the question of damages depends upon the question whether they were not bound to make delivery at that date, for this reason, that I hold it to be clearly proved that the whole damage which was actually suffered arose after the 27th of June and ended with the 4th of July. Even down to the 4th of July, when the summons was signeted, no damage would have been suffered if delivery had been made upon that day according to the evidence. I say that is proved, in the first place, because I think the oral testimony is clear upon that point. In the proof Mr Laming says distinctly that Dasnieres, the person who had chartered the "Mula" for a cargo of pitch out to the Mediterranean, "could still have taken the vessel up to the end of June." And he says No. 69 of process is the charter-party which he entered into; and I think it was explained that the charter-party is subsequent in date to the end of June. Further, there is real evidence in the correspondence at the time that the whole damage arose after 27th June,—in the letter written by the pursuers to Seater, Ramage & Ferguson's nominee,—and which is printed. For in that letter, or rather telegram, by the pursuers to Seater they say,—"Charterers of 'Mula,' Dasnieres, pitch-merchant, just given us notice we must tender 'Mula' at once or he will charter steamer 'Greta' at 4s. increased freight, and claim difference, namely, £160. Says must decide immediately. Telegraph you will deliver 'Mula,' and when." So that on the 27th of June Messrs Ramage & Ferguson had an opportunity to deliver the "Mula," and to avoid any damage. They refused to deliver the vessel in terms of their letter which follows, saying,—"Our client, Mr J. W. Seater, has handed to us your telegram of date, and with reference thereto we beg to send annexed copy of a letter which we addressed to your representatives in Glasgow on Saturday on the same subject, and to which we beg to refer you. Our client is not in a position to take up the charter to which you refer, and the parties to whom you allude in your telegram must just take their own course." That is followed by a letter upon the same day, which ends by the agents of the pursuers intimating that "our clients, in the face of your clients' refusal to implement the charter-party, will now proceed with an action," and so on. So that the whole damage was suffered after the 27th of June, the date when the action was intimated. If delivery had been made even on the 4th of July, when the summons was signeted, there is little reason to doubt, so far as I can see, that the damage might have been avoided. Therefore the question of damage comes to depend, as I said, upon the question whether there was or was not incumbent upon Ramage & Ferguson an obligation to deliver that ship;—whether they were entitled to set at naught the charter-party altogether as they did?

Now, the position of the ship was this: The original charter-party was dated 9th October 1886. Under that charter-party it is unnecessary to notice the history of the delays which took place. I am disposed to think that these delays arose from the difficulties of Hunter, the owner of the ship. And I am clear that there is no claim in this action founded upon any delay under the original charter-party, nor, indeed, any claim under the amended charter-party of April 15th down to the 27th of June. No loss is alleged to have happened by the non-delivery of the ship prior to the 27th of June. But the delays which had arisen under the first charter-party are important in this respect as matter of history, for they resulted in an agreement in February 1887 between the owner,

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

No. 153.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

Hunter, and the first mortgagees, Barr & Company, and Messrs Ramage & Ferguson, and Mr Urquhart, as an individual partner, who also had a share of Barr's interest, the object on the part of the owner, and on the part of all concerned, being obviously to enable this ship to begin earning freight. On the narrative that whereas the fourth party (that is Ramage & Ferguson) were engaged in certain repairs for which they claim a lien "preferable to the claim of the first and second parties under the said mortgages, but which lien the whole other parties hereto refuse to recognise"; and on the further narrative that for the purpose of avoiding litigation, "and with the view of completing said repairs and making the said vessel ready for sea in every respect, the first and second and third parties have agreed to advance to the fifth party the further sum of £1300." Thereupon arrangements were made by which this advance and also a mortgage were to be given to Messrs Ramage & Ferguson. By the third article of that agreement Messrs Ramage & Ferguson, "in consideration of said payment of £1300, and promissory-notes and mortgages to be granted by the fifth party as aforesaid, renounce and discharge any claim for a lien, present or future, over the said vessel in connection with or arising out of said repairs, and undertake and bind and oblige themselves fully to execute and complete all repairs on said vessel which may be required to make her fit and ready for sea in every respect." And they bind themselves when the repairs are executed that the vessel shall "pass the Board of Trade's Surveyor, and that all within the space of one month from the last date hereof." They renounce their lien, and they agree to the owner of the ship at that time that they shall make all repairs "which may be required to make her fit and ready for sea in every respect." Now, what happened under this? I do not go over the correspondence. I think it appears that at first there was a temporary delay caused by Barr & Company requiring that a policy of insurance should be delivered. That was in the month of April, but the result was undoubtedly that on the 15th of April a new or rather an amended charter-party was given to Messrs Laming & Company, and although Messrs Barr & Company caused some delay by their demanding a policy of insurance it is quite plain upon the correspondence that the delay caused by the demand for delivery of a policy of insurance passed off, and was not the ultimate cause of the detention of the vessel at the time the final demand was made.

That appears to me to be quite plain by two letters which are contained in the print. The first is a letter dated 17th May 1887, in which Barr & Company's agents, writing to the pursuers, say they find it necessary to sell the ship, and they go on to say—"It is not correct to say that our clients have no intention of carrying out the arrangements of the ship in accordance with the terms of the charter. On the contrary, they have every intention of respecting your rights, and the sale will be carried out expressly under burden of the charter." So that they were ready to go on selling the ship under her arrangements. Moreover, there is another letter, which shews that they made Ramage & Ferguson acquainted with their willingness that the ship should fulfil her engagements. On the 21st May they write to Ramage & Ferguson saying—"Referring to Mr Barr's telegram to you of to-day, we again send you the draft agreement for approval as now altered. As it is of the utmost importance that we should be able to inform the charterers whether the charter is likely to be carried out or not, please wire us on Monday whether you agree to the terms now proposed, and that you will not defend the action." Now, that was the position of Barr. It appears that the matter of the insurance had been arranged, and Barr was willing to sell the ship under her engagement. But Messrs Ramage & Ferguson's position from the correspondence—indeed from an early part of the correspondence, from the 20th of April—was that of insisting, contrary to their agreement of February, upon the right to take every step they could to detain the ship. No. 153.

June 21, 1889.
Laming & Co.
v. Seater.

The letter of 20th April, I am afraid, it may be necessary to notice, because really in my mind it comes to be one of the links by which Ramage & Ferguson's liability is clearly demonstrated. They apparently began negotiations with Barr for the purpose of what they call "protecting the joint interests." Upon the 20th of April they write to Messrs Boyd, Jamieson, & Kelly, who, I think, are Barr's agents, as follows:—"With reference to our interview with Mr Kelly we have just ascertained that this vessel is so situated that she cannot sail for a considerable time to come, and Messrs Ramage & Ferguson will do all in their power to prevent her getting away until the terms of the minute of agreement have been fulfilled." Now, were Ramage & Ferguson fulfilling the minute of agreement? The minute of agreement bound them to make all necessary repairs in consideration of the £1300 and the mortgage which they got to fit her for sea. They go on writing, making it still more plain that they are determined to make a stand against the ship being allowed to go. I do not need to read these letters, but Hunter & Company write on the 27th April,—“The steamer is now ready for sea, but stopped on that account.” That is the question about the policy of insurance which went off. But all through the correspondence it will be found that from the 20th of April Ramage & Ferguson's position was that of taking every step they could to have the vessel detained.

Now, I pointed out that Barr & Company's proposed sale was under the burden of the ship's engagements. Barr & Company's agents write to Ramage & Ferguson's agents on 4th June 1887 as follows:—"We to-day obtained a warrant to sell, the exposure being fixed for Monday the 20th current; there is therefore very little time to advertise. We enclose herewith for your approval proof of the advertisement." That is an advertisement which contained a clause bearing that the sale was under the burden of the charter-party. Then they go on to say,—“You will observe that we have inserted in it that the purchaser is bound to carry out the charter. We understand your clients are strongly averse to the vessel being exposed subject to such a burden. We enclose copy of a letter we have from our Glasgow correspondents, from which you will see that their clients are willing that the exposure should take place free of the charter, provided your clients undertake all responsibility of satisfying the charterers' claims.” That letter shewed that Barr & Company were willing, indeed desirous, to act upon their undertaking to the owner Hunter that the sale should be subject to the charter. But the answer by the agents of Ramage & Ferguson is this,—“We have your favour of Saturday. Our clients quite understand that they have to settle the matter with Laming under their arrangement with Messrs Barr & Forrester, and in these circumstances we have deleted the reference in the advertisement to Laming & Co.'s charter.” And accordingly the result is that by the action of Ramage & Ferguson, upon their own sole responsibility, the sale was effected, and effected by them without any reference to the charter-party. It set at naught the engagement of the ship. It was in substance a sale by Ramage & Ferguson to themselves, or to a person who is their mere

No. 153. nominee, for the purpose of ignoring and putting aside the charter-party which I have referred to.
 June 21, 1889.
 Laming & Co.
 v. Seater.

Now, that is done by persons who in a question with the owner had undertaken within a month of the end of February to do everything that was necessary to make the vessel ready for sea in consideration of a sum of £1300. Now, were they entitled to do that? or were they not bound to allow Hunter to fulfil his engagement? It is perfectly clear that Hunter was bound to the charterers. It is equally clear that Ramage & Ferguson were bound to Hunter to do what was necessary to enable the ship to fulfil her charter. I fail to see how Ramage & Ferguson can justify what they did. I have not thought it necessary to notice the fact that their position as regards responsibility is made abundantly clear by the formal agreement between themselves and Barr & Company. I think it is dated in June, and by it they undertake all responsibility to the charterers. But apart from that altogether, being bound to Hunter, who was bound to the charterers—bound to Hunter in the way that I have mentioned—I entirely fail to see how they were entitled to take these steps for the purpose of defeating the charter. Therefore I am of opinion that on the 27th of June, when the action was intimated, before the damage had begun to arise, at the time when it was telegraphed to them by the pursuers that the charterer of the “Mula,” Mr Dasnieres, was still willing to take the vessel, they were under an obligation to make their nominee Seater give up the vessel, and they were altogether wrong in going on to hold out Seater as being a person entirely independent of them, holding under a decree of sale which had itself set aside the charter. But it now appears that the setting aside of the charter-party in the proceedings of sale was entirely the work of Ramage & Ferguson. I say, therefore, that they were bound to deliver on 27th June. I say, further, that if they had delivered on 27th June no damage would have arisen, because the vessel would have earned her freight under the pitch contract, and would have earned her coal freight, and no damage would have arisen. That being so, I think that under the agreement, after what had taken place, they must be held as responsible for the damage so arising. I think, in my view of the claim for damage, that no amendment is necessary. It is perfectly rightly concluded for as a substitute for a claim to the ship,—that is to say, the claim of damages arising out of the refusal to deliver the ship at the date when the action was intimated on 27th June.

I do not know that it is necessary to say more. Some importance has been thought to attach to the fact that Messrs Ramage & Ferguson had a lien for repairs. I concur entirely in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark that they had no such lien. Something has also been said about the ship being unseaworthy and unfit to go to sea down to the 27th of June. Well, let it be supposed for a moment that it was so, who is responsible for that? I say most clearly Ramage & Ferguson, for it was Ramage & Ferguson's breach of their engagement to the owner that prevented the ship being made ready for sea. Therefore, on the whole, I am sorry to say that I am obliged to differ from the proposed judgment.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against,” &c.

DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

W. & T. ADAMS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—R. Johnstone—Law. No. 154.
 GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).
 —D.-F. Balfour—Ferguson. June 21, 1889.

Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.
Arbitration—Contract—Reference—Disqualification.—The arbitration clause in a contract for the making of a railway provided that the arbiter should not be disqualified from acting by being or becoming consulting engineer to the railway company. Held that he was not barred from acting as arbiter by the fact that he had revised the specifications and schedules upon which the work which formed the subject of the arbitration was performed.

Process—Arbitration—Decree-arbitral—Reduction.—In a reduction of a decree-arbitral on the ground that the arbiter had given decree for a larger sum in name of penalties than was claimed by the party in whose favour decree was granted, the latter offered to discharge the excess. Held that the proper remedy was to reduce the decree quoad the excess.

Arbitration—Decree-arbitral—Reduction.—By the arbitration clause in a contract for the making of a railway, it was provided that “all disputes and differences which have arisen or shall or may arise between the parties under or in reference to this contract, or in regard to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, or of the said specifications, conditions, and schedules, or as to what shall be considered carrying out the work in a proper, uniform, and regular manner, . . . or as to any other matter connected with, or arising out of, this contract, and generally all disputes and differences in any way connected with the construction of this contract, or arising out of the execution of or failure to execute properly the works hereby contracted for or not,” should be submitted and referred to the final sentence and decree-arbitral of the arbiter named.

The contractor was bound to complete the line of railway on 30th March 1885 under a liquidate penalty of £20 for every day's delay, but it was stipulated by the railway company that 400 yards of embankment forming part of the line should not be formed until another contractor had completed the east abutment of a bridge and the diversion of a river, or until he had received the written instructions of the engineer to proceed with the embankment. The line was not completed till 1st May 1886.

The arbiter found that the contractor was liable in penalties for each day's delay (exclusive of Sundays) from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886.

In an action of reduction of the decree-arbitral brought by the contractor, it was proved that the contractor had not got access to the ground on which the 400 yards of embankment was to be formed until February 1886. The arbiter stated that he was satisfied that the contractor had not been ready to use the ground until he got it, and that his delay was not due to his not having had access to it until February 1886.

The Court held that, as the whole matter, including the construction of the contract, had been referred to the arbiter, the Act of Regulations prevented the Court from interfering with the arbiter's award, even on the ground of injustice.

By the Great North of Scotland (Buckie Extension) Railway Act, 1882, 1st DIVISION. the railway company were empowered to make a railway from Portsoy to Lord Fraser. Elgin, and in November 1882 they advertised for tenders for the work divided into four sections. Of these the first and second sections were M.
 (1) from Portsoy to Portnockie, which was again subdivided into two sections—(a) from Portsoy to Tochieneal Station, and (b) from Tochieneal Station to Portnockie, and (2) from Portnockie to the river Spey, or the Buckie section.

Messrs W. & T. Adams, contractors, Callander, sent in tenders for both sections, which were accepted, the cost of the Portsoy section being £52,286, 19s. 7d., and of the Buckie section being £39,063, 17s. 9d. By the contracts for the construction of the two sections, dated in January 1883, which were entered into between the company as first party, and

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

the Messrs Adams as second parties, the second parties bound themselves to complete the sections according to the specification, and the plans, sections, and drawings prepared by the company's engineer, or according to such altered or explanatory plans as might be furnished by the engineer during the progress of the works.

The contracts further provided,—“And further, the said second party hereby bind and oblige themselves to commence said works as soon as they shall have been put in or offered possession of land to the extent that the said engineer shall consider necessary, and within six days after written notice to them, or any of them, to do so; . . . And the said second party bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to intimate to the said first party in writing when they are ready to commence said works, and any delay which may thereafter occur, if any, in giving the said second party possession of such lands as the engineer shall consider necessary for carrying on said works, shall not confer on the said second party a right to claim damages against the said first party, or to break this contract, but may be stated to the arbiter hereinafter named as a reason for not completing the said works within the time after specified, and if it shall appear to said arbiter that the said second party was prevented from completing the said works by that delay or by any stoppage from any cause not imputable to the said second party, the said arbiter shall be entitled to extend the time for completing the same for such period as he shall consider reasonable, but of the propriety of giving the said extension of time, and the length thereof, the said arbiter shall be sole judge.”

The Messrs Adams bound themselves under the contracts to carry on the works regularly and uniformly, and to have the railway ready for traffic,—the Portsoy to Tochieneal part of the Portsoy section on 30th September 1883, and the remainder of that section and the Buckie section on or before 30th September 1884, “or on or before such respective days thereafter as may be respectively fixed by the arbiter after named.” In the event of delay on the part of the Messrs Adams, or of their not employing a sufficient number of workmen, horses, &c., it was provided that the company might apply to the arbiter for authority to employ workmen, provide plant and materials, &c., or to take the works out of the contractors' hands, all at the expense of the Messrs Adams,—“And it is hereby further declared that the said second party shall be liable in all damages and extra expenses which may be incurred by, or occasioned to, the said first party by the said second party or their foresaids failing to complete the said works, or to have the same ready for opening by the times respectively hereinbefore stipulated; and as compensation for loss of profits to the company should the foresaid respective portions of the line not be in a state to be opened for public traffic by the times stipulated, it is hereby declared and agreed on that the said second party shall be bound to pay to the said first party the sum of £20 sterling as the liquidate and agreed on compensation for every day during which each of the foresaid respective portions of the line, or any part thereof, shall remain unfinished, or in a state not to admit of its being opened for public traffic, after the said 30th day of September 1883 and 30th day of September 1884 respectively, or such extended periods as the said arbiter may determine as aforesaid.”

The contracts also contained the following clause :—“And further, the said first and second parties hereto hereby submit and refer to the final sentence and decree-arbitral to be pronounced by Benjamin Hall Blyth, civil engineer in Edinburgh, whom failing by death or resignation, to George Cunningham, civil engineer in Edinburgh, whom they hereby mutually nominate and appoint to be sole arbiter, all disputes and differences which have arisen or shall or may arise between them under or in reference to the contract, or in regard to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, or of the said specifications, conditions, and schedules, or as to what shall be considered carrying out the work in a proper, uniform, and regular manner, or regarding the nature of the materials used or the expense of any additional work or deduction from that specified, or any alteration which may be made as aforesaid in the works hereby contracted for, and which may make them more or less expensive than those specified, or regarding the proper maintenance of the works or the state and condition of the same, and the amount of the monthly payments to be made to account thereof, or as to any other matter connected with or arising out of this contract, and generally all disputes and differences in any way connected with the construction of this contract, or arising out of the execution of or failure to execute properly the works hereby contracted for or not; . . . Declaring that this submission shall not fall by the lapse of year and day, or by the death of any of the parties hereto, and that neither the said Benjamin Hall Blyth nor the said George Cunningham shall be disqualified from acting as arbiter by his being or becoming the said first party's principal or consulting engineer, or a shareholder in said company, or by his holding or being appointed to any other office or employment under the said first party, or by their being partners or connected with each other in business or otherwise; and that the said arbiter shall have power to award the expenses (including those to be incurred by himself), either in whole or in part, which may be incurred under this submission, against such of the parties as he shall think fit."

The specification and conditions for the construction of the Buckie section contained the following clause:—"The portion of the embankment of the line, between pegs Nos. 892 and 899, shall not be formed until the contractor for the bridge or viaduct over the river Spey has completed the works in connection with the erection of the east abutment of the bridge, the diversion of the river, and the erection of the protection walls embraced in the contract for the Spey Bridge, or until he has received the written instructions of the engineer or assistant-engineer to proceed with the formation of the said portion of the embankment. . . ."

The contractors commenced operations, but they were somewhat dilatory in their proceedings, and complaints were made of this frequently to them. On 4th December 1883 the railway company, by their manager, applied to Mr Blyth, as arbiter, to authorise them to put on men and plant so as to carry out the works vigorously, all at the expense of the pursuers. In consequence of this appeal to him, Mr Blyth visited the works, and in a letter, dated 12th December 1883, addressed to the railway company's manager, he stated that no part of the work was completed, and he added that "it is evident from their present state that if they [the works] continue to be executed at the present rate of progress the first five miles cannot be finished before May 1884, and the remainder of the works until at least September 1885—or fully a year behind the contract time." Mr Blyth was very unwilling to authorise the company to put men on the works at the contractors' expense, and suggested, that as the pursuers had promised to put on an increased force of men and waggons, that it would be for the best interest of all parties that the directors should obtain from the contractors a formal undertaking to do this, and that if they failed in their promise the application of the railway company might again be taken up.

Nothing further was done upon this application; but on 2d December 1885 the railway company again made a formal application to the arbiter with complaint of delay, and calling upon him "forthwith to issue and

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

No. 154.
 June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

pronounce the necessary order authorising and empowering them [the railway company] to provide, at the expense of the contractors, such additional workmen, horses, waggons, and other force, with all tools, implements, and materials requisite and necessary, and to continue to employ the same so as to ensure the completion of the whole of the works above referred to within the time above expressed." What the arbiter did upon this was to meet the parties, and, upon the urgent entreaty of the Messrs Adams, he was induced, upon their again giving an undertaking of greater diligence, to abstain from granting the prayer of the application of the railway company. The Messrs Adams accordingly wrote, on 8th December 1885, as follows:—"With reference to the application by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company to you as arbiter, dated 2d inst, discussed at the meeting before you to-day, we have now, as desired by you, to undertake to finish the works referred to in that application on or before 15th February next, unless prevented by some unforeseen occurrence. In order to do so we shall put and keep on the works as many men as can be practically done for the above end. In the event of our not, by these means, finishing at the above date, we will agree, if you deem it then necessary, to your giving effect to the application of the railway company." To which the clerk to the submission, by Mr Blyth's directions, replied as follows, by letter addressed to the Messrs Adams' agents, Messrs Campbell & Somervell, W.S.:—"9th December 1885.—I am instructed by the arbiter to acknowledge receipt of Messrs Adams' letter to him of yesterday. The arbiter still has the Great North of Scotland Railway Company's application under consideration, and the manner in which he will ultimately deal with it will to a great extent depend upon the information he may receive within the next eight or ten days as to what, if any, steps are being taken by your clients with the view to the completion of the works on or before 15th February next." The arbiter was not called upon by the railway company to issue the necessary order allowing them to put on additional men and plant.

Matters stood upon this footing until the works were completed. The first subsection of the Portsoy contract, which ought to have been completed on 30th September 1883, was not completed till 1st April 1884, and the second subsection was not completed within the time allowed, as extended by the arbiter to 30th March 1885, but only on 1st May 1886. The Buckie section was not completed within the time allowed, as extended by the arbiter to 30th March 1885, but only on 1st May 1886.

Thereafter, disputes having arisen between the Messrs Adams and the company with reference to the settlement of their accounts under the contracts, an appeal was made to Mr Blyth under the reference clause. After various procedure, and the taking of evidence at considerable length, and the intimation of a note of the proposed findings, against which no representations were lodged by either party, Mr Blyth issued two decrees—arbitral—the one applicable to the Portsoy and the other to the Buckie contract. Under the first he found that the Messrs Adams were due to the company the sum of £7109, 13s. 6d., with interest from 7th November 1887, and under the second he found that they were due the sum of £5103, 14s. 6d., with interest from the same date, and he gave decree for payment of the two sums. The larger portion of the items charged against the Messrs Adams consisted of penalties or liquidated damages at the rate of £20 per day for loss caused to the company through the delay in completing the works beyond the date of completion specified in the contract—being 837 days at £20 = £16,740.* Of this sum £6800 was applicable to the Buckie contract for the period from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886, 340 days (excluding Sundays), and the remainder to the two sections of the Portsoy contract,—156 days for section 1, and 341 days for section 2,—both excluding Sundays.

* It appeared that in his original proposed findings the arbiter had fixed the

The Messrs Adams thereafter brought an action of reduction of the two decrees-arbitral against the company.

No. 154.
June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

The grounds of action appear from the following pleas for the pursuers:—“The decrees-arbitral specified in the summons ought to be reduced,—

1. Because the said Benjamin Hall Blyth, through the circumstances condescended on, was disabled from exercising an impartial judgment on the matters referred to him. 3. Because, prior to the date of the two contracts aforesaid, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth had, on the employment of the defenders, prepared for them the specifications and schedules forming part of the contracts, and containing statements as to the masonry of the bridges and viaducts calculated to mislead the pursuers, or having that effect, and the fact of his having been so employed was concealed by the defenders from the pursuers, and the pursuers were ignorant of it not only at the date of the contracts but also at the date when the decrees were pronounced. 4. Because the decrees are ultra fines compromissi, in respect, (a) that, on a sound construction of the two contracts between the pursuers and the defenders condescended on, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth was not empowered, after the dates specified therein for the completion of the works, to extend the time for such completion; (b) that the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has found the defenders entitled to sums in name of compensation or liquidated damages, but in reality penalties, enormously in excess of the sum they claimed; and these matters imply corruption on the part of the said Benjamin Hall Blyth, and are not separable from the other findings in the decrees. 6. Because the Buckie section of the railway could not be completed till the bridge at Garmouth was nearly finished, and possession of the land necessary for connecting the bridge and the railway was not given by the defenders to the pursuers till February 1886; and in the decree applicable to the Buckie contract the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has nevertheless found the pursuers liable in compensation or liquidated damages for not completing the said section at the rate of £20 per day from 30th March 1885. 9. Because, in the circumstances condescended on, the decrees are corrupt, unconscionable, and unjust.”

The pursuers stated, inter alia, that the amount allowed in name of penalty exceeded that claimed by the defenders to the extent of £5250. In regard to this matter the defenders stated,—“Explained further that under the clauses of reference in the contracts the parties referred to the arbiter all questions as to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the contracts, as well as all questions connected with the execution, or failure to execute, the works to be constructed, and constituted him the sole judge between them on all questions of fact or law arising upon the construction or execution of the said contracts. In particular, he was entitled and bound to decide a question which arose between the parties as to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the clause providing for payment of liquidate and agreed on compensation at the rate of £20 per diem, as compensation for loss of profits in event of failure by the contractors to have the works completed at the times specified in the contracts, or such other times as the arbiter might fix, in accordance with the power of extending the time conferred upon him. . . . The claims lodged by the defenders are referred to, and it is explained that penalties at a sum of £10 per day, but that, in accordance with an opinion of counsel, he afterwards substituted a rate of £20 per day in the award.

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

they have throughout maintained that compensation for loss of profits was due to them at the rate agreed on in the contracts for the whole period during which the contractors have been found to be in fault, although, desiring to treat the contractors with liberality, they, in accordance with the statements in their claim, were all along willing to accept a payment of compensation to the extent of one-half of the amount claimed as due under both contracts. The railway company do not propose, and have intimated to the pursuers that they do not intend, to enforce payment of the sums decerned for in name of liquidated and agreed on compensation to an extent exceeding the sum of £11,490, and they hereby offer to discharge their claims against the pursuers under the decrees-arbitral to the extent of the sum of £5250, being the amount decerned for as compensation for loss of profits in excess of the sum of £11,490 insisted upon in their claim, and to engross upon the said decrees minutes giving effect to this restriction."

In reference to their 6th plea, the pursuers stated ;—(Cond. 11) "The aforesaid bridge across the river Spey at Garmouth, forming part of the Buckie Railway, was built by the firm of Blaikie Brothers, under a contract with the defenders similar to those of the pursuers, and dated in the same month of January 1883 . . . Part of the pursuers' contract with the defenders was to connect the bridge with the Buckie section of the railway by an embankment, but it was impossible to do this, and so complete the Buckie section of the defenders' contracts, till the bridge was finished. Messrs Blaikie Brothers had contracted to finish the bridge by the 31st July 1884, but they did not do so till the month of May 1886. It was not till the month of February 1886 that the pursuers were put in possession by the defenders of the land necessary for the formation of the aforesaid embankment. On 20th January 1886 the defenders' resident engineer addressed a letter to the pursuers, stating that he expected that the river Spey would be diverted in a week, provided the weather kept favourable, and that he trusted they were making all the preparations necessary for filling in the banking required. The material for the embankment had to be brought from Portgordon, a distance of three miles. It was thus impossible for the pursuers to have completed the works under their Buckie contract until two months or thereabouts after the said month of February 1886. . . . The said Benjamin Hall Blyth has, by the decree applicable to the Buckie contract, found the pursuers liable in the sum of £6800 in name of liquidated damages, being at the rate of £20 per day for the period from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886, and as if the bridge at Garmouth had been completed by the month of January 1885." In answer the defenders, inter alia, denied that the completion of the works under the Buckie contract was in fact retarded or materially affected by the state of the works of the Spey Bridge, and explained that any question of delay so arising was by the contract submitted to the decision of the arbiter.

In reference to their third plea, the pursuers stated ;—(Cond. 12) "The said Benjamin Hall Blyth was employed by the defenders to prepare or revise the plans, specifications, and schedules of quantities upon which the pursuers tendered for the works, and to estimate the probable cost of the works for them. At the date when the pursuers entered into their contracts with the defenders they were ignorant of the fact of the said Benjamin Hall Blyth having been so employed, and they have only become aware of it since the said decrees-arbitral were pronounced . . . ." (Cond. 13) "The specifications and schedules prepared or revised by the said Benjamin Hall Blyth were in many material points inconsistent, contradictory, and misleading. In particular, after the works were in progress, the pursuers were required by the defenders' engineers to construct of ashlar masonry the abutments and other parts of the various bridges and viaducts on the line, whilst the specifications and schedules, on a sound construction of them, prescribed only rubble, which is a cheaper kind of masonry.* In all the cases in which these circumstances occur, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has by the decrees-arbitral disallowed the pursuers' claims for the difference between ashlar and rubble prices, which amounts to £10,000 or thereby. From the said schedules it appears that the pursuers, in stating their rates of prices, had allowed for these works on the footing that the masonry was only to be rubble masonry. There was a great deal of evidence led before the said Benjamin Hall Blyth and argument submitted to him as to the meaning of the expressions used in the specifications and schedules to denote the masonry of which the bridges and viaducts were to be constructed. During the evidence and the argument the said Benjamin Hall Blyth concealed from the pursuers the fact that the expressions in question had been inserted in the specifications and schedules by himself, or had been revised and approved of by him. The pursuers have only discovered this since the said decrees-arbitral were pronounced. The question whether the pursuers were to be allowed ashlar prices or rubble prices for the masonry of the Cullen viaduct was the most important question in the reference; and if the pursuers had known that the said Benjamin Hall Blyth had prepared or revised for the defenders the specifications and schedules on the construction of the terms of which the question depended they would have declined to submit their claims to him. The pursuers further believe and aver that, in adjudicating upon their claims, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has permitted himself to be biassed and corrupted by the desire to save the defenders from the consequences of his own negligence in preparing or revising the specifications and schedules." The defenders in answer stated that the fact that Mr Blyth's firm were consulting engineers to the defenders was well known to the pursuers when the contracts were entered into, but they denied that Mr Blyth had ever prepared any estimate of the line of railway as finally authorised by Parliament, or that he prepared or revised the schedules of quantities issued to intending contractors on which the pursuers tendered, and they further stated;—"Any difference as to the construction of the specifications and schedules was by the contract expressly and exclusively submitted to the judgment of the arbiter. Denied that the pursuers were required to construct, or did construct, the abutments, or any portion of any bridge or viaduct of ashlar masonry, except where ashlar masonry is expressly required by the specifications. Denied that the masonry referred to in the condescendence and described by the pursuers as ashlar is truly ashlar masonry, and explained that it is in fact rubble masonry, rather inferior than superior to the quality stipulated for in the specifications, and that the arbiter's findings upon the items of claim falling under this head give effect to the contract of parties expressed in the specifications and schedules of prices."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent, except in so far as founded on the cause or reason of corruption alleged against the arbiter, or upon any decerniture by him ultra fines compromissi. (2) The pursuers' statements are not relevant. (3) The defenders are entitled to absolvitor in respect that,—(a) The matters in dispute under the contracts in question were competently referred to the judgment of the said Benjamin Hall Blyth; (b) That nothing existed or has occurred

* For terms of specification see Lord Fraser's note, infra, p. 853.

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

to disqualify him from acting as arbiter therein; (c) That the allegations of corruption against the said arbiter are false and unfounded in fact. (4) The said decrees-arbital being in conformity with the contracts of submission, having fully exhausted and not having exceeded the matters submitted, the reasons of reduction ought to be repelled, and the defenders found entitled to absolver, with expenses. (5) Separatim, Even assuming the arbiter to have exceeded his powers in decerning for liquidate compensation to an amount exceeding the restricted sum of £11,490, the amount decerned for in excess of the said sum of £11,490 is separable from the remainder of the awards, and the said decrees-arbital should only be reduced quoad excessum.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) on 26th May 1888 allowed a proof, and in a reclaiming note by the defenders the Court on 27th June following disallowed a proof by the pursuers of their averments in the fourteenth article of their condescendence, and quoad ultra adhered.

After a proof, the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), his Lordship, on 3d November 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having taken the proof, heard counsel thereon, and considered the cause, finds that under the decrees-arbital sought to be reduced the arbiter has found the pursuers liable in penalties to the amount of £16,740: Finds that this sum was larger by £5250 than the penalties claimed by the defenders, and that therefore the decrees-arbital are ultra petita to this extent: Reduces the same in so far as penalties are found due to the defenders more than £11,490: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Finds no expenses due to or by either parties," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.— . . . The objections stated by the pursuers will be noticed seriatim:—

"First, It is objected that Mr Blyth could not exercise an unbiassed judgment in the matter, because he was consulting engineer for the company. Now, it is settled law that the engineer of the company may be made the arbiter, and no objection can be taken to him because he is so. (Mackay v. Parochial Board of Barry, 22d June 1883, 10 Rettie, 1046, and cases there referred to.) And in this particular case it was specially stipulated that no objection was to be taken to Mr Blyth as arbiter because he was, or might become, consulting engineer for the company.

"Second, It is next objected that Mr Blyth could not be an impartial judge, because he revised the specifications and schedules forming part of the contracts. The pursuers knew perfectly well that Mr Blyth was consulting engineer. This was stated in the contracts which they signed. As consulting engineer his duty was to look over the specifications and plans of the work to be done, and knowing this the pursuers agreed to his being arbiter.

"Third, It is objected that the arbiter was not entitled after the time specified for the completion of the works to extend the time for such completion. In the interest of the pursuers this is not a very intelligible objection. The arbiter found them entitled to an extension of six months as regards the completion of the second part of the works. This was a concession in their favour, and why they should object to it is not very manifest.

"Fourth, It is objected that the arbiter has found the defenders entitled to damages in excess of the sums that they claimed, and this objection, to the extent of £5250, the Lord Ordinary holds to be well founded. The arbiter has given to the defenders damages ultra petita, and that is a good ground of reduction. Upon this point the railway company on the record make this statement: 'The railway company do not propose, and have intimated to the pursuers that they do not intend, to enforce payment of the sums decerned for in name of liquidated and agreed-on compensation to an extent exceeding the sum of £11,490, and they hereby offer to discharge their claims against the pursuers under the decrees-arbitral to the extent of the sum of £5250, being the amount decerned for as compensation for loss of profits in excess of the sum of £11,490 insisted upon in their claim, and to engross upon the said decrees minutes giving effect to this restriction.' The Lord Ordinary does not think that this is the proper mode of getting rid of a decree-arbitral which decerns for more than is asked; the proper course is to reduce the decree quoad the excess.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The first plea.—The letters No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

"Fifth, It is said that the arbiter, by his letter of 9th December 1885, extended the time for completion of the works until 15th February 1886, and that notwithstanding the extension of time he has awarded damages for the delay which had occurred, and which by such extension of time was condoned. The Lord Ordinary cannot read the correspondence which took place in this light. Delay had occurred, and the railway company had applied for power to put men and material on the work, and all the arbiter did was simply to abstain from granting the prayer of the application upon an undertaking that the works would be completed by the 15th of February 1886. He said nothing and did nothing as to the penalties already incurred under the contract for delay. There was here no extension of time, as might have been allowed by the contract, but a simple reservation not to issue an order authorising the railway company to put men and material on the works at the pursuers' expense. The penalties were still running on.

"Sixth, The only remaining objection worthy of any notice is one regarding which the Lord Ordinary has found some difficulty. In the specification for the railway from Portknockie to the river Spey it is provided that 'the portion of the embankment of the line between pegs Nos. 892 and 899 shall not be formed until the contractor for the bridge or viaduct over the river Spey has completed the works in connection with the erection of the east abutment of bridge, the diversion of the river, and the erection of the protection walls embraced in the contract for the Spey Bridge, or until he has received the written instructions of the engineer or assistant engineer to proceed with the formation of the said portion of the embankment.' It is averred by the pursuers in regard to this matter that 'the aforesaid bridge across the river Spey at Garmouth, forming part of the Buckie Railway, was built by the firm of Blaikie Brothers, under a contract with the defenders similar to those of the pursuers, and dated in the same month of January 1883, and in which the said Benjamin Hall Blyth was named arbiter. Part of the pursuers' contract with the defenders was to connect the bridge with the Buckie section of the railway by an embankment, but it was impossible to do this and so complete the Buckie section of the defenders' contracts till the bridge was finished. Messrs Blaikie Brothers had contracted to finish the bridge by the 31st July 1884, but they did not do so till the month of May 1886. It was not till the month of February 1886 that the pursuers were put in possession by the defenders of the land necessary for the formation of the aforesaid embankment. On 20th January 1886, the defenders' resident engineer addressed a letter to the pursuers, stating that he expected that the river Spey would be diverted in a week provided the weather kept favourable, and that he trusted they were making all the preparations necessary for filling in the banking required. . . . Notwithstanding, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has, by the decree applicable to the Buckie contract, found the pursuers liable in the sum of £6800 in name of liquidated damages, being at the rate of £20 per day for the period from 30th March 1885 to 1st May 1886, and as if the bridge at Garmouth had been completed by the month of January 1885.' It does seem hard that when the pursuers were absolutely prohibited from meddling with the embankment of the line between the pegs Nos. 892 to 899 until the contractor of the bridge over the Spey had completed the works in connection with the erection of the east abutment of bridge, &c., they should be made liable in damages for non-construction of the Buckie portion of the line, seeing that these preliminary conditions were only fulfilled in February 1886. It is with some hesitation that the Lord Ordinary comes to the conclusion that this was a matter entirely within the competence of the arbiter. The Lord Ordinary

16

No. 154. which had passed between the railway company or their representative

June 21, 1889.

Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

does not say that he would have come to the same conclusion as the arbiter, but the arbiter had a right to decide as he did. His view was that the portion of the line joining on to the embankment was not forward, and therefore there was no delay caused by the non-completion of the Spey Bridge, but that the whole delay arose from the works for the line not being carried forward by the pursuers. If these works had been brought forward to the place for the embankment, and if a demand had been made for the diversion of the Spey, the case would have been different. As the matter stands, the Court have no right to interfere.*

"Seventh, It is next objected that 'after the works were in progress, the

* The following evidence was given on the point referred to by the Lord Ordinary. Mr Blyth deponed,—“In condescendence 11 there is a statement as to delay being caused by failure to give possession of the ground adjoining the Spey Bridge. That matter was mentioned in the course of the arbitration proceedings, but it certainly was not made a serious point of. Not only is that so, but I am satisfied there was no delay in consequence of their not getting that ground. My reasons for that opinion are these, that the contractors were not ready to use that ground until they got it. They never asked for the ground, and if they had asked for it and did not get it in time, it would have formed a ground for asking an extension of time, which they never did. (Q.) And there was a larger power which authorised certain things to be cut out of the contract, was there not? (A.) The engineer might have done that without asking me. Any remedies they had, however, were not taken advantage of. (Q.) If they had had that ground much sooner, would it have made any difference on the time when the line was opened? (A.) I don't believe they were ready to use it one day before they got it. They had the ground before they were ready to use it. . . . Cross.—I am not in a position to say whether if the Messrs Adams had the whole of the Portsoy and Buckie contract up to the side of the river by the 30th September 1884, the line could have been opened a day sooner than it was. I think the bridge could have been built very much sooner if there had been anticipation of the pursuers being ready to use it. The line throughout certainly could not have been opened until the bridge was built, but it could have been open to Fochabers Station. . . . I am aware that the pursuers were forbidden to use any portion of the ground between certain pegs until the contractor for the Spey Bridge had completed his works and of the other provisions in the contract bearing upon that matter. The contractors were obliged not to touch that matter until they got instructions to do so. They were not ready to use the ground and in point of fact they never asked for it. So long as the river was flowing in its bed undiverted it was quite impossible for the pursuers or any other person to form the embankment to connect with the bridge.”

Mr William Adams, one of the pursuers, deponed,—“The Buckie contract extended from Portknockie to Spey Bridge. The specification with respect to it contains a clause that we are not to form that line between certain pegs until we are put in possession of the land, and authorised by the engineer to go on with the work. The portion of the works to which that applied would extend to between 300 and 400 yards. The Spey Bridge was built not by us, but by Blaikie Brothers, and it was built on the west side of the river on dry land. After it was built, the river had to be diverted so as to flow below the newly made arch. Then the bed of the river had to be given to us for the purpose of forming an embankment, continuing the line on to the end of the bridge. (Q.) So long as the river was not diverted, was it possible for any man to form such an embankment to the bridge? (A.) No. The specification indeed provides that we should not attempt anything of the kind, and it was quite impossible to do it. The bridge had to be finished by 31st July 1884. If it had been finished then and we had got possession of the land, our work was to be finished by 30th September following, but the bridge was not finished in July 1884, and we did not get possession of the land until February 1886. . . . Cross.—

and the arbiter, and of which the pursuers were not cognisant, shewed that the arbiter approached the performance of his duties as arbiter with

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.

Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

pursuers were required by the defender's engineers to construct of ashlar masonry the abutments and other parts of the various bridges and viaducts on the line, whilst the specifications and schedules on a sound construction of them prescribed only rubble, which is a cheaper kind of masonry. In all the cases in which these circumstances occur, the said Benjamin Hall Blyth has by the decree-arbital disallowed the pursuers' claims for the difference between ashlar and rubble prices, which amounts to £10,000 or thereby.' He was entitled to disallow them if such was his opinion on the construction of the specification, which is in the following terms:—'The exposed faces of abutments of all under-line bridges above the top of foundations to be built of coursed rubble stones from twelve to fifteen inches in height.' The contention of the pursuers is that this means that they could make a course of masonry fifteen inches in height, composed of little pieces of stone half-an-inch thick. The contention of the defenders was that every stone must be twelve to fifteen inches in height, and this latter contention the arbiter adopted, which he was entitled to do as being the judge appointed to construe the contract and specifications.

"The result of the whole matter is that the defenders must be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, except that there must be a partial reduction of the decrees-arbital; but with regard to expenses the Lord Ordinary must discriminate. In the first place, the pursuers have got rid of a liability for £5250; in the second place, there was a useless discussion on the relevancy, which was carried to the Inner-House, and where the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was affirmed. Plainly the pursuers were entitled to expenses down to the interlocutor of the Inner-House, and after that date—seeing that they have been successful upon the proof—the defenders ought to be found entitled to expenses; but substantial justice will be done by finding neither of the parties entitled to expenses."

We were quite in time with our work at that end of the bridge. We had the banking run up and stopped up to the very end for nearly two years. (Q.) Did you ever ask to get possession of the ground at the bridge to get on with the work? (A.) The river was running in it in full flow, and the bridge was not getting on at all, and it would have been perfectly absurd to ask for that. We were there daily, and saw how the thing stood. They would have laughed at us if we had asked for that. I cannot say whether we asked for the ground or not, but it is not likely we would do a ridiculous thing. I did not ask the engineer or anybody representing the engineer to dispense with the execution of this bit of work at Spey Bridge as the arbiters had power to do, for that would have been in my opinion a strange request. Suppose we had got possession of the ground at Spey Bridge earlier, it is not the case that the position of our other works was such that we could not possibly have finished the contract before the time when it actually was finished. The work to be done on that ground of which we desired possession was the last work that was done. . . . Re-examined.—I have explained that the portion of the line we had to build up to the Spey Bridge was the last work done under our contract, all the rest of the line being ready to be open. It had to stand ready to be open until the intervening little bit was finished. We had to pay £20 of penalty on each contract, that is £40 a-day, until the work was finished. (Q.) The stipulation in the clause says that you were not to go on with that bit of the work until ordered to do so by the engineer, until you were given possession of the ground, and until the river was diverted, but no time is specified. Did you understand you were agreeing to pay £20 a-day of penalty for about two years, except about three months before the finishing of the contract, if you did not get possession of the ground on which you were to do the work? (A.) No. (Q.) The complaint is that they broke the contract, but that you have been subjected to the penalty for that period during which it was impossible for you to prevent delay? (A.) Exactly."

No. 154. his mind prejudiced against the pursuers.* (2) The fourth plea.—The arbiter ought either to have enforced the contract, and applied the penalty clauses which provided for the case of delay, or else to have declared the penalty clauses to be in the circumstances inapplicable. What he did was to extend the time allowed for the completion of the contract, and so to reform the contract, to which he afterwards reverted by enforcing penalties for delay. By agreeing to the extension of time, the defenders must be held to have waived the penalty clauses in the contract, and to have betaken themselves to their common law right of damages.<sup>1</sup> Further, assuming that the penalty clauses were still enforceable, the Lord Ordinary had not met the justice of the case in the reduction which he had made on the amount of the award. The whole award must fall where admittedly penalties had been awarded greatly in excess of the claim made and the loss alleged to have been sustained. There was no previous case where the Court had sanctioned the principle of a partial reduction.<sup>2</sup> (3) The sixth plea.—The award of penalties for the delays in connection with the Garmouth bridge was so grossly wrong as to amount to legal corruption on the part of the arbiter.<sup>3</sup> The Lord Ordinary indicated an opinion that the arbiter's view was unsound, and it practically came to this upon the evidence that penalties were awarded for delay in the completion of a contract the conditions of which prevented the pursuers from beginning it until after the period for which the arbiter had awarded penalties. This was a good ground for the reduction of the award.<sup>4</sup>

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The pursuers' first plea.—There was no concealment on the part of the arbiter. Before making his visit to the ground, on being called upon by the respondents to take up the reference, the arbiter sent the pursuers a copy of the application which had been made to him. They knew that the arbiter was the consulting engineer of the railway company, and that as engineer it was part of his duty to revise the specifications and schedules which formed part of the contract. (2) The fourth plea.—The construction put upon the contract by the pursuers was very far fetched. It was not an extension of time that was allowed by the arbiter for the completion of the work. The sole object was to get an undertaking from the contractor that the work would be

* These letters were (1) from Mr Moffat, the general manager of the railway company, to Mr Blyth, dated 20th November 1883, intimating that the pursuers were getting on very slowly with their contracts, and asking advice as to the course they should take, and (2) from Mr Blyth in answer, dated 30th November,—“I quite appreciate the unwillingness of your directors to make a formal application to me, but I do not see how I can advise them in any other capacity than that of arbiter without disqualifying myself from hereafter acting as such.

“I would, therefore, suggest that you should send me the contract, at the same time requesting me formally to accept the submission and to call a meeting of parties on the line.

“This I should at once do, and I am hopeful that I might be able to make Messrs Adams understand the necessity for conducting their works more energetically, and might induce them to do so without any further proceedings under the submission being required.”

<sup>1</sup> M'Elroy & Sons v. Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co., Nov. 17, 1877, 5 R. 161, per Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff), 167; Robertson v. Driver's Trustees, March 2, 1881, 8 R. 555.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Napier v. Wood, Nov. 29, 1844, 7 D. 166.

<sup>3</sup> Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. v. Hill, Jan. 28, 1840, 2 D. 486, Lord Gillies, p. 494; Alexander v. Bridge of Allan Water Company, Feb. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 492.

<sup>4</sup> Robertson v. Driver's Trustees, March 2, 1881, 8 R. 555.

finished by a particular time, in order that the necessity for stronger measures might so be obviated. The idea of reforming the contract never occurred to anyone, and there was nothing in the proof to support such a view. The procedure throughout was perfectly regular and judicial. The cases of M'Elroy and Robertson were very different. No doubt, in order to find a right to penalties under the contract, there must be full implement by the person who sought to have it enforced, because the Court would not allow the integrity of the contract to be broken. In Robertson's case it was held that the integrity of the contract had been broken, and the Court had no power to interfere to enforce it. In M'Elroy's case it was held that the fault alleged on the part of the person seeking to enforce the contract, which was said to debar him from pleading it, must be material and contributory to the result complained of. But the substitution of one date for another for the completion of the contracts was not such a bar. In M'Elroy's case there was no provision, as in this case, for an extension of time. Besides, that case was decided upon English precedents, and there was a later case decided in England which displaced the authority of these precedents.<sup>1</sup> The evidence given by the pursuers—as to the grounds on which the arbiter had proceeded in making the award—must be laid aside, as these grounds could be ascertained only from the arbiter himself.<sup>2</sup> (3) The sixth plea.—The arbiter had acted within his powers in all that he had done, and his judgment was quite competent. It was also right. The bridge at Garmouth over the Spey, and the term of its completion, were not alluded to in the pursuers' contract. The sole question for the arbiter was what compensation was to be given for the delay, and in dealing with that, he could not look at the contract for the building of the bridge. Cases where the implement by one party of a condition material to the fulfilment of a contract was rendered impossible by the actings of the other party were not in point.<sup>3</sup>

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary in this case has reduced Mr Blyth's decree-arbitral in so far as he has decerned for penalties beyond the sum of £11,490, upon the ground that to that extent the award is ultra vires, and I do not understand it to be seriously disputed that he was quite right in taking that course. But there are a number of other objections to the decree-arbitral which he has not given effect to, and I think the only one that has created even an appearance of difficulty is that which is called the 6th objection. With regard to the others, I do not think it necessary to take particular notice of them. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary in the view that he has taken of all of them.

As regards the 6th, there is this great peculiarity that the arbiter has found penalties due for not executing works by the contractors in circumstances where it is alleged that they were absolutely prohibited by the contract from executing these very works. Now, that objection depends upon a consideration of two things—in the first place, the evidence in regard to the execution or non-execution of that work, and in the second place, the construction of the contract.

<sup>1</sup> Jones v. President and Fellows of St John's College, Cambridge, 1870, L. R., 6 Q. B. 115.

<sup>2</sup> City of Glasgow District Railway Co. v. M'George, Cowan, & Galloway, Feb. 25, 1886, 13 R. 609.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Mackintosh v. Midland Counties Railway Co., July 9, 1845, 14 Meeson & Welsby, 548; Dick & Stevenson v. Mackay, May 21, 1880, 7 R. 788, affd. H. L., 8 R. 37.

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

It is on the construction of the contract that it is alleged that the contractors were not only not bound to go on with their works in the circumstances in which they were placed, but were absolutely prohibited from doing so; and evidence has been led for the purpose of shewing that that was the position in which the contractors stood. The proposition that they are to be mulcted in penalties for a period when they not only could not execute the works, but when they were prohibited from executing the works, is a very startling one undoubtedly. The Lord Ordinary seems to indicate an opinion that if he had been the arbiter he would have taken a different view from that which the arbiter has actually taken, but he feels himself constrained to refuse effect to the objection, because he considers that the whole of that matter is absolutely within the power of the arbiter, and in that I agree with him. The arbiter is by the terms of the arbitration clause in the contract made absolutely master of the whole affair. He is not only to take evidence in so far as that is necessary for satisfying himself of the facts of the case, but the construction of the contract is left to him. That is one of the things expressly left to the arbiter by the contract; and he has construed the contract in such a way with regard to the facts as to satisfy his own mind that these penalties are due. The ground of the objection is nothing else than this, that the decree-arbital to this extent is unjust. It is said to be very unjust, grossly unjust, manifestly unjust; but these are degrees of injustice, and the adverbs do not add very much to the importance of the objection, as being a complaint of injustice. Now, nothing can be clearer in the law of Scotland than that according to the Act of Regulations injustice, or iniquity as the Act calls it, is not a ground for reducing a decree-arbital. The parties choose their own tribunal, they determine what matters shall be submitted to the arbiter, and by his award they are bound. In this respect we know that the law of Scotland differs very materially from that of England, in which the Courts review decrees-arbital or awards much more readily than we do. And the same kind of rule prevailed in this Court prior to the Act of Regulations. But certainly the practice at that time was such as fully to justify, I think, the enactment of these Regulations, because anything more loose or indefinite than the rules according to which the Court interfered or did not interfere with awards of arbiters can hardly be conceived, as I think some of us had occasion to point out in a case not very long ago. But be that as it may, we are bound by the Act of Regulations, and injustice or iniquity, although very glaring, very serious, and very hard upon the party who suffers, is no ground for interfering with the award of an arbiter. And therefore upon this particular part of the case I agree with the Lord Ordinary also. The result is that I am for adhering to his interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I am obliged to come to the same conclusion. The terms of the clause of reference in this contract are very broad and general, and everything is referred to the arbiter selected by the parties, including the construction of the provisions of the contract. Now, he has construed the clause applicable to compensation or penalties for delay in the execution of the works in a way which has led him to the conclusion that there had been such delays as warranted him in awarding the penalties. That was a matter of which he was made sole judge according to the terms of the contract, and I agree with your Lordship that the mere fact that it is unjust, as the contractors allege it to be, is not a ground on which we, as a Court, can review or alter the judgment of the arbiter. We have no right to do so. And upon that ground I agree that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion, and that the contractors here are not entitled to any further deduction from the sum that has been fixed by the arbiter.

No. 154.

June 21, 1889.
Adams v.
Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking, with reference to the points other than head sixth, which formed the subject of discussion, that the argument maintained on behalf of the reclaimer does not require to be specially dealt with. I think the Lord Ordinary has disposed of all of these points satisfactorily.

The only question which I think attended with some difficulty is that under head six, and we had a very full argument with reference to the subject there dealt with. It was maintained that the Court should look at the contract itself, and should determine its meaning. I am bound to say, as the result of the argument, that if the construction of the contract lay with the Court I should have had the utmost difficulty in adopting the view that the arbiter has taken. On the contrary, I should have been clearly of opinion that the meaning of the contract would not justify the award that he has given. But parties have excluded the Court from considering the meaning of the contract. It has been left to the arbiter expressly to decide all questions regarding the true intent, meaning, and construction of the contract with reference to the settlement of all these claims; and that being so, I am of opinion with your Lordships that we cannot get behind that award; and on that ground I agree in thinking that we must adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Bart., Pursuer (Reclaimer).—

D.-F. Balfour—Asher—Dundas.

JOHN STEWART KENNEDY, Defender (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Robertson
—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

Error—Issues—Reduction.—S., an heir of entail in possession, sent to K. a holograph offer to sell the entailed estate at a specified price, containing these words,—“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.” The offer was accepted in writing.

In an action of declarator and implement brought by K. he contended that S. was bound to execute a disposition in favour of the purchaser at the price stated in the offer, and thereafter to obtain a ratification of the sale from the Court under the Entail Amendment Act, 1853, as amended by the 13th section of the Entail Act, 1882. In granting such ratification it was not open to the Court to consider the adequacy of the price except as affecting the interest of creditors. On the other hand S. contended that by the contract he was bound only to apply for an order of sale under the Act of 1882 whereby an entailed estate might be converted into entailed money, and the adequacy of the price would fall to be considered by the Court in the interest of the heirs of entail. The Court gave effect to the pursuer's contention.

S. subsequently brought an action of reduction of the missives against K., averring, inter alia, that throughout the negotiations for a sale he had had in his mind a sale under the Entail Act, 1882, and the conversion of the estates into

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

entailed money—conditionally upon the Court approving of the whole terms of the bargain as fair and reasonable,—which was a mode of selling an entailed estate of which he had himself had experience, and the only mode of which he was aware,—and that he had never thought of committing himself to a sale on the footing of paying compensation to the next heir under the Act of 1853, and he proposed an issue of essential error on his part as to the “import and effect of the contract.” Held that as the error alleged was not in the essentials of the contract, which were complete, but concerned only its import and effect, there was no relevant ground for an issue of essential error,—diss. Lord Shand, who held that, assuming the defender’s averments to be proved, there had been no consensus in idem placitum between the parties, the pursuer by the words “subject to the ratification of the Court” having meant that the sale should be subject to the suspensive condition that the Court after inquiry should be satisfied that the transaction was advantageous to the heirs of entail generally, and that there should be no sale unless the Court considered the price adequate, while the defender intended an absolute sale with a potestative condition.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
C.

(VIDE Kennedy v. Stewart, Feb. 8, 1889, ante, p. 421.)

On 19th September 1888, Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart of Grandtully, Baronet, heir of entail in possession of the estates of Grandtully, Murtly, Strathbraan, and others, sent to Mr John Stewart Kennedy, banker in New York, then in Scotland, the following holograph letter:—“Murtly Castle, 19th Sept. 1888. Dear Sir,—Having reference to my interview and conversation with you and Mr Glendinning yesterday, I now desire to say that I am willing to dispose of the entire estate of Murtly, &c., consisting of about 33,000 acres, with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, on the basis of twenty-five years’ purchase of the present, or even an appraised valuation, of the nett rental thereof, as may be ascertained by an agreed appraisalment, you appointing one, and me the other, and if the two cannot agree, a third party to be chosen by the two.

“Payment to be made in cash unless it be otherwise agreed as to any part, and possession to be given not later than the 15th May 1889.

“This offer to be open for your acceptance for two weeks from this date, and on your notifying to me or to my agents (Messrs Dundas & Wilson, C.S.) of such acceptance on or before the expiry of that time it will be binding on me.

“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.—Yours truly,

A. D. STEWART.

“J. S. Kennedy, Esq.

“Of course the above does not include pictures, furniture, and furnishings, &c.

A. D. S.”

Mr Kennedy sent the following answer:—“Elmpark, Ettrick Road, Edinburgh, 20th Sept. 1888. Sir A. Douglas Stewart, Bart., Murtly Castle, Murtly. Dear Sir Douglas,—I hereby accept your offer of the entire estate of Murtly, &c., with all the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and all the rights, revenues, and issues thereof for ever, as contained in your letter to me of yesterday’s date, and I agree to purchase said estate, &c., at twenty-five years’ purchase of the present nett rental thereof, and that on the conditions set forth in your said letter, a copy of which is annexed hereto.—Yours faithfully, “JOHN S. KENNEDY.

“P.S.—I have acted more promptly than I would otherwise have liked to do, as I must return to the Continent at once to join my wife. I leave here to-night or to-morrow morning.

J. S. K.”

In November following Mr Kennedy raised an action of declarator and implement against Sir Douglas (reported supra, p. 421). In this action

Sir Douglas contended that under the missives he was bound to apply for an order of sale under the Entail Act of 1882 for the purpose of converting the entailed estate into entailed money, under which procedure it would have fallen upon the Court to consider the adequacy of the price in the interest of future heirs of entail. On 8th February 1889, the Court, however, in accordance with Mr Kennedy's contention, found that according to the true construction of the contract Sir Douglas was bound to proceed under the Entail Act of 1853, and to obtain a ratification by the Court of a sale made and a disposition granted before their interposition was asked.

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

In March following Sir Douglas raised the present action, concluding for reduction of the letters above quoted.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 2) "Early in the month of July 1888, the pursuer received a letter from Mr Peter Glendinning, of The Leuchold, Dalmeny Park, desiring to know, 'in the interest of an American gentleman,' whose name he did not disclose, whether the pursuer entertained any idea of selling all or any of his estates, and if so, at what price. The pursuer was not unwilling, if a price should be offered of which he and his legal advisers approved, to convert his entailed estates into entailed money, according to the procedure authorised by the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882. He had presented to the Court in the year 1885 a petition for an order of sale of the said estates under the said Act, in which sundry procedure had been taken, including a remit on 7th May 1885 to two valuers to report upon the time, place, and manner of sale of said estates, and to suggest the upset price or prices, and a report by them, in which they recommended £404,000 as the minimum upset price for said estates. Nothing further had been done in the petition, and the pursuer, while willing, for reasons of private convenience, to sell, as above explained, was at no time eager or desirous to achieve a sale, unless upon unexceptionable terms. . . ."

(Cond. 3) "The pursuer replied to Mr Glendinning that he would be glad to see him when he was in the neighbourhood. Mr Glendinning came to Murtly, and saw the pursuer on 13th July, and he thereafter continued to write in the interests of the American gentleman, whose name, however, he did not disclose (though the pursuer requested that he should do so), stating that his client had peculiar reasons for concealment, of which Mr Glendinning was kept in ignorance. On 31st August, it was announced that the American gentleman was Mr Kennedy, the defender, and Mr Glendinning shortly afterwards wrote that he would bring him to see the Castle and grounds of Murtly, on an early day, accompanied by a special friend, whose name was not at first disclosed, but who was afterwards stated to be 'Mr Duncan, a private friend of his, by whom he is to be guided.' The pursuer assented to the visit of Mr Kennedy, though he pointed out that the intervention of friends or advisers was unnecessary at that stage of negotiations, and repeatedly intimated that, on his own side, any negotiations for sale must be made with his Edinburgh law-agents. The statements in answer are denied, except that the pursuer attached importance to privacy in the negotiations, as did also Mr Glendinning." (Cond. 4) "On 18th September 1888, the defender, Mr Kennedy (whom the pursuer then saw for the first time), and Mr Glendinning came to Murtly, and were shewn over the Castle and grounds partly by the pursuer, and partly by his servants. The pursuer had also given a written order to enable them to visit Rohallion, Strathbraan, and Grandtully, and to see the various objects of interest, which, it is believed, they did on the same day. . . ." (Cond. 5) "On the forenoon of the next day, 19th September, Mr Glendinning unexpectedly arrived at Murtly Castle, where the pursuer and Lady Stewart were alone. The pursuer was at and about

No. 155. this time a frail and infirm old man, suffering from illness, and in a nervous and excitable condition. Owing to his physical and nervous state, as well as to his advanced age, his mind and will were not in a good state of control. He was in a weak and facile state of mind, and easily imposed upon, unfit to conduct business or to make a bargain, and unable, from his physical and mental conditions, to resist pressure, or to endure flurry or excitement. Mr Glendinning, taking advantage of these circumstances, and acting as agent for, or on behalf of, Mr Kennedy, did, by undue pressure and solicitation, and by fraud or circumvention, impose upon the pursuer, and did obtain or procure from him the said pretended letter first set forth in the summons, to his lesion, as after mentioned." (Cond. 6) "Mr Glendinning, after expressing regret on his own part and that of Mr Duncan that Mr Kennedy had been disappointed with the estates, and had not made an offer to purchase them, and enlarging on the advantages to the pursuer of such a sale, suddenly produced from his pocket a draft letter, which he earnestly pressed the pursuer to copy in his own handwriting, and sign as his own letter. He represented to the pursuer that the matter was urgent, and would brook no delay, and hurried and pressed him to copy and sign it immediately. The pursuer was unwilling to do so, but ultimately, being ill, nervous, and excited, and weak and facile, as above mentioned, he yielded to the pressure put upon him by Mr Glendinning, and copied out the draft letter and signed it. The letter thus written and signed by the pursuer is that first set out in the summons. As soon as the pursuer had copied and signed the letter, Mr Glendinning put it in his pocket, and left Murtly." (Cond. 7) "Throughout the negotiations for a sale of the estates above described, and in his interview with Mr Glendinning, the pursuer had in his mind the method of sale with which, as already explained, he was acquainted, viz., the conversion of the estates into a fund of entailed money, under the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1882. Mr Glendinning was well aware that the pursuer had presented a petition under that Act, as already mentioned, and that he was thus acquainted with its general scope and purpose. The pursuer was not aware of any other mode of selling an entailed estate, and it never entered his thought that he might be committing himself to sell the estates, on the footing of paying compensation to the next heir or heirs of entail. Mr Glendinning at the said interview represented to the pursuer that the effect of writing the said letter would be merely to give the pursuer a little hold on Mr Kennedy, in the event of his accepting its terms. Mr Glendinning thereby induced the pursuer to believe that the result of the acceptance by Mr Kennedy of the offer contained in the said letter would be a conditional bargain; that the pursuer would be bound to go to the Court for authority to sell the estates, under the procedure which he knew of, to Mr Kennedy, and if the Court should approve of the whole terms of the proposed bargain as fair and reasonable, and should ratify the same, that Mr Kennedy would be bound to purchase on the same terms; but that, if the Court should hold that the price was inadequate, the pursuer would not be bound to sell at the price proposed. The pursuer was induced to believe, and did believe, that the whole matter would, on Mr Kennedy's acceptance, be still open for investigation and consideration in the application to the Court, and that he might obtain the advice of his law-agents as well as the protection of the Court, as above mentioned. The pursuer believes and avers that the said price was an inadequate one, and would not have been sanctioned by the Court." (Cond. 8) "The pursuer, when he wrote out and signed the said letter, was under essential error as to its meaning and effect as above set forth, and said error was induced by the represen-

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

tations made to him by Mr Glendinning. The said representations were false and fraudulent. Or otherwise, Mr Glendinning believed that the meaning and effect of the said letter were such as the pursuer believed, and was induced by Mr Glendinning, as above stated, to believe them to be, in which case the pursuer avers that the contract embodied in the said letter, and the defender's reply thereto, was entered into under mutual essential error on the part both of the pursuer and defender as to its tenor and effect, as above set forth." (Cond. 9) "The pursuer further stipulated, for reasons which he stated to Mr Glendinning, that in any transaction to be entered into with Mr Kennedy, the latter should not be represented by Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, Writers to the Signet, but that the bargain should be adjusted and carried through either by the pursuer's law-agents, or by another firm of Writers to the Signet, whose names were voluntarily suggested by Mr Glendinning. Mr Glendinning assented to and promised this. If the pursuer had understood that the letter which he copied out and signed would, if accepted by Mr Kennedy, bind him absolutely, without any opportunity of advice or assistance, and without any investigation into or approval of the terms of the sale by the Court, as being fair and reasonable, to sell the estates to Mr Kennedy on the footing of compensating the next heir, he would not have consented to copy and sign the letter. He was induced, by the false and fraudulent misrepresentations of Mr Glendinning to believe, and did believe, that the bargain would not be enforced against him unless the Court thought it a fair and proper one, and that the entailed estates would in any event remain entire to him in the form of entailed money, to which, if he should survive the next heir, he would become absolutely entitled in fee-simple. Further, the pursuer would not have made any offer of sale to Mr Kennedy, except upon Mr Glendinning's assurance and promise, which turned out to be false and fraudulent, as before mentioned, that Messrs Tods, Murray, & Jamieson should not be agents in the matter."

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for, in respect that the said letter dated 19th September 1888 was impetrated from him to his lesion by Mr Glendinning, as agent for or on behalf of Mr Kennedy, by undue pressure and solicitation, and by fraud or circumvention, he being in a weak and facile condition, and easily imposed upon, as set forth in the condescendence. 2. The pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for, (1) because the said letter of 19th September 1888 was signed by him under essential error; (2) because in signing the said letter the pursuer was under essential error induced by the said Mr Glendinning; (3) because in signing the said letter the pursuer was under essential error, induced by false and fraudulent representations made by Mr Glendinning. 3. The pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for, because the contract in the letters noted in the summons was entered into under mutual essential error on the part both of the pursuer and defender.

The defender denied the whole material averments of the pursuer.

The pursuer proposed the following issues:—"1. Whether, on or about 9th September 1888, the pursuer was weak and facile in mind, and easily imposed upon; and whether Mr Peter Glendinning, of The Leuchold, Dalmeny Park, taking advantage of the said weakness and facility, did, by fraud or circumvention, impetrate and obtain from the pursuer the letter dated 19th September 1888 to his lesion? 2. Whether in granting the said letter the pursuer was under essential error as to its import and effect? 3. Whether in granting the said letter the pursuer was under essential error as to its import and effect, induced by the said Peter Glen-

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

dinning? 4. Whether in granting the said letter the pursuer was under essential error as to its import and effect, induced by false and fraudulent representations made by the said Peter Glendinning? 5. Whether the said letter and the acceptance were granted by the pursuer and defender under mutual essential error as to their import and effect?"

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 28th May 1889, approved of the first only of the above issues for the trial of the cause.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—1. The second proposed issue of essential error ought to be allowed. It was said that the error on Sir Douglas' part, as set forth on record, was one of law and not of fact, and that it did not therefore afford ground for reduction. But the error was as to Sir Douglas' own legal rights, and was therefore one more of fact than of law. Besides, the plea that the error alleged was an error in law was no answer to the reduction of a discharge of legal rights.<sup>1</sup> The error alleged here was in substantialibus. It had to do (1) with the price, and (2) with the nature of the contract, and therefore afforded a good ground of reduction.<sup>2</sup> As to the price, the pursuer understood he was to have a surrogatum of entailed money under the Act of 1882 in place of the estates, and instead of that he found he would have to make provisions for the next heir, &c. In this way the quantum of the price would be much reduced below what he had intended. In regard to the nature of the contract, the pursuer knew only of the Entail Act of 1882,—having presented a petition for an order for sale under that Act,—and he knew further that under that Act the Court had to be satisfied of the fairness of the transaction before they granted the order; and this was what he meant when he said "the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court." The effect of the maxim fortius contra proferentem flew off in a case like the present, where the letter or document to which it might apply was under reduction. Further, the true proferens here was not Sir Douglas but Mr Kennedy and his representative. None of the cases cited on the other side were opposed to the doctrine that both the price and the nature of the contract were inter essentialia. There was authority for the proposed issue, and although none of the cases was exactly in point, that of Johnston<sup>3</sup> came very near the circumstances of the present case. The deed in the case of M'Laurin v. Stafford was no doubt a voluntary one—but so also was the letter written by Sir Douglas. 2. There was good ground for the third and fourth * "NOTE.—The averments appear to me to be sufficient to support the first issue, but the remaining issues proceed on the assumption that the issue of facility and fraud or circumvention has been negatived, and on that assumption there is, in my judgment, no relevant averment of error.

---

"It is not alleged that the parties were under error as to any of the essential terms of the contract, but only that the pursuer did not know at the time that he could be required to execute the contract in the manner determined by the judgment of the Court. But a contract deliberately executed in the terms which the parties intended cannot be set aside on the ground that one of them misunderstood its legal effect. They are bound by their contract according to its true construction, and the pursuer cannot be relieved of his obligation because upon a question of construction judgment has been given against him."

<sup>1</sup> Mercer v. Anstruther's Trustees, March 6, 1871, 9 Macph. 618, Lord Kinloch, p. 652, 43 Scot. Jur. 285.

<sup>2</sup> Bell's Principles, 11; Cooper v. Phibbs, May 1867, L. R., 2 E. and I. App. 149 (Lord Westbury, p. 170); Earl Beauchamp v. Winn, 1873, L. R., 6 E. and I. App. 223 (Lord Chelmsford, p. 234).

<sup>3</sup> Johnston v. Smellie's Trustees, July 15, 1856, 18 D. 1234; McConehy v. McIndoe, Dec. 23, 1853, 16 D. 315, 26 Scot. Jur. 145; Earl of Wemyss v. Campbell, June 6, 1858, 20 D. 1090; M'Laurin v. Stafford, Dec. 17, 1875, 3 R. 265.

issues. It had been held that the elements of misrepresentation and No. 155.
essential error might be combined so as to make one ground of action.<sup>1</sup>
3. There was no case in the books where an issue of mutual error had June 25, 1889.
been approved. But there was no reason why there should not be such Stewart v. an issue. 4. This was one of the appropriated causes, and must be sent Kennedy.
to jury trial.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the respondent;—1. In order to found an issue of essential error, the error must be in substantialibus.<sup>3</sup> It did not extend to the qualitative incidents of the contract and their effect. Here the alleged error was not as to the price or the nature of the contract; it rather had reference to the application and disposal of the price, a question which was very remote from the defender. As to the stipulation by the pursuer in his letter that the sale should be "subject to the ratification of the Court," the Court had already held in the previous case that the pursuer's construction of it was wrong, and that the qualification therein referred to was no part of the transaction. It must therefore be taken for the purposes of the present question that a valid contract of sale had been entered into. Further, there was no authority to support the proposition that a misunderstanding of the legal effect of a contract was inter essentialia. In Mercer's case<sup>4</sup> the pursuer did not know what she was selling, and the error was clearly in essentialibus. In Cooper v. Phibbs<sup>5</sup> the error was as to the subject-matter of the transaction, which was supposed to belong to one person when in reality it belonged to another. [LORD PRESIDENT.—I must say that I think Lord Chelmsford's statement of the law which is to be found in that case is inadequate. There are cases which carry the law further.] Earl Beauchamp's case<sup>6</sup> was similar. So in Lord Wemyss's case,<sup>7</sup> the mistake was that what was thought to be a deer forest turned out not to be one. The case of Johnston<sup>8</sup> was only reported upon the question of expenses. The point now urged was either not taken there, or, if taken, the decision was bad law. These were all the cases of mutual contract where the error related to the subject-matter of the sale. In M'Laurin's case<sup>9</sup> the deed was a purely gratuitous one, and it could not therefore apply here. The cases in which an issue of essential error had been refused<sup>10</sup> were instructive. In the case of Munro<sup>11</sup> an issue of essential error, pure and simple, was disallowed, and it was held that the nature of the misrepresentation must be specifically set forth in the issue. No one could avail himself of his own misunderstanding to get rid of a contract.<sup>12</sup> 2. The pursuer was not entitled to an issue of essential error

<sup>1</sup> Adamson v. Glasgow Water-Works Commissioners, June 23, 1859, 21 D. 1012, 31 Scot. Jur. 558.

<sup>2</sup> Trotter v. Happer, Nov. 24, 1888, 16 R. 141.

<sup>3</sup> Erskine's Insts. iii. 1, 16; Stair i. 9, 9, and iv. 24, 40; Pollock on Contracts viii. 390, 403; Bentley v. Mackay, 1862, 4 De Gex, Fisher, and Jones 279, Lord Justice Knight Bruce, p. 285; Bell's Princ. 11.

<sup>4</sup> Mercer v. Anstruther's Trustees, March 6, 1871, 9 Macph. 618.

<sup>5</sup> L. R., 2 E. and I. Apps. 149.

<sup>6</sup> L. R., 6 E. and I. Apps. 223.

<sup>7</sup> Lord Wemyss v. Campbell, 20 D. 1090.

<sup>8</sup> Johnston v. Smellie's Trustees, 18 D. 1234.

<sup>9</sup> M'Laurin v. Stafford, 3 R. 265.

<sup>10</sup> Yeatman v. Proctor, Nov. 17, 1877, 5 R. 179; Hogg v. Campbell, March 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 848, 36 Scot. Jur. 428; Beresford's Trustees v. Gardner, Jan. 27, 1877, 4 R. 363.

<sup>11</sup> Munro v. Strain, Feb. 14, 1874, 1 R. 522.

<sup>12</sup> Birrell v. Dryer, Feb. 8, 1883, 10 R. 585, revd. H. L., March 17, 1884, 11 R. 41.

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

induced by misrepresentation, because there was no sufficient averment of the misrepresentation to support it. The only misrepresentation alleged was that Mr Glendinning had said to the pursuer that the effect of his writing the letter would be merely to give him "a little hold on Mr Kennedy." The other alleged misrepresentations were purely hypothetical. 3. As to the issue of mutual error, there was no error alleged on the part of Mr Kennedy. 4. This was eminently a case for proof before the Lord Ordinary, as provided in the Evidence Act, 1866.<sup>1</sup> The Court had a complete discretion in the matter.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are some matters in this case upon which I think none of your Lordships have ever entertained any doubt. The first of these is as to the right of the pursuer to obtain the first issue. I am very clearly of opinion that there is a relevant case presented on record in support of it. The other matter to which I refer is that there is no relevant averment on record of misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment inducing the essential error alleged upon the part of the pursuer. There remains only the pursuer's case under the second proposed issue, which must be taken on the assumption that the pursuer fails on his first issue, and also on the assumption that he was not led into the supposed error by misrepresentation, or undue or fraudulent concealment.

I am of opinion that there is no relevant averment of essential error on record, and that the proposed issue faithfully reflects the irrelevant averment. The error alleged and proposed to be submitted to the jury is error as to the import and effect of the contract sought to be reduced. But a contract cannot be reduced on the ground of error unless the error be in the essentials of the contract. In innominate contracts it is sometimes difficult to ascertain or define what are the essentials; but it is not so in nominate contracts, such as the contract of sale with which we are here concerned. The essentials of this contract are the identification of the parties contracting, the subject sold, and the amount of the price; and as regards these in the present case there is no room for doubt. The parties are certainly ascertained, the lands are sufficiently described in the missives, and the price is twenty-five years' purchase of the existing rental. As to the application of the price the purchaser has no interest or concern; and nothing can be an essential of a contract which does not concern both parties. Neither is there any error as to the nature of the contract, as in the case of a person signing a disposition believing it to be a lease, or a bond for borrowed money believing it to be a testament. The parties well knew they were making a contract of sale, and nothing else.

The error which the pursuer says he laboured under when he signed his letter of offer was, that, according to its terms, he believed he would sufficiently fulfil his obligation as an entail proprietor by selling under the authority of the Statute of 1882, and thereby converting the entailed lands into entailed money. It has been found by our judgment in the previous action that if he entertained this belief he was wrong as to the construction of the offer which he made and which was accepted; and that according to its true construction he was bound to proceed under the Act of 1853 to obtain the ratification by the Court of a sale made and a disposition granted before the Court's interposition is asked.

<sup>1</sup> Mackay's Practice i. 35; Hume v. Trotter & Co., Jan. 14, 1875, 2 R. 338; Trotter v. Happer, Nov. 24, 1888, 16 R. 141; Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 2.

The condition thus introduced into the contract of sale was a potestative condition, which the seller was bound to fulfil to the utmost of his power, and the Court upon an application under the Act of 1853 cannot alter the terms of the contract of sale made by the parties. The Court is no doubt bound to see that the pecuniary interests of creditors and heirs of entail are not prejudiced by the contract; and if they are, it will be the duty of the Court to refuse the application before them on the ground that the sale was, for that reason, ultra vires of the seller. But there is no middle course between ratifying and refusing to ratify the sale according to its terms and conditions.

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.

Stewart v.
Kennedy.

The pursuer made a contract of sale complete in all its essential parts, but a question arose between the parties as to the construction of one of its clauses not affecting the essentialia. That question has been decided against the pursuer by this Court acting as a Court of construction, and the pursuer now demands that because he was wrong in his construction he shall be entitled to set aside the contract. If this plea were listened to, every litigant who is unsuccessful in a question as to the construction and effect, or, to use the pursuer's own words, the "import and effect," of a contract would at once have the remedy of reducing the contract which he had deliberately made, and afterwards persistently misconstrued.

LORD MURE.—I agree in the opinion which your Lordship has so very clearly expressed, as to the second issue of essential error. I think there is no mistake here as to the nature of the contract. The contract is a simple contract of sale, and, as I read the letter of the pursuer, the subject-matter of that contract, the parties to it, and the price at which the property is to be disposed of, are all fixed; and these are the essentials of a contract of sale. Now, that being so, I am unable to see that what the pursuer here alleges as to his mistake in the matter is an error of a description that is relevant to reduce that contract. The error alleged is simply that he misunderstood or mistook the effect of the stipulation that the sale should be subject to ratification by the Court; that he thought that would have a particular effect, and he finds he is now mistaken as to what that effect would be, upon the application being made. Now, I do not think that is such an error as a party can be allowed to propound as a good ground for reducing a contract; and on that ground, and for the reasons stated by your Lordship, I agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with all of your Lordships in holding that the pursuer is entitled to have an issue for the trial of the cause founded on his averments of facility and lesion in entering into the contract which he seeks to reduce. I am also of opinion that there is no relevant statement of misrepresentation by Mr Glendinning as an inducing cause to lead the pursuer to enter into the contract. The single averment of misrepresentation is made in these terms:—"Mr Glendinning represented to the pursuer that the effect of writing the said letter" (meaning the letter of offer to sell the estates) "would be merely to give the pursuer a little hold on Mr Kennedy"; and I do not think that on any reasonable construction of the effect of these words, even in the circumstances in which they are said to have been used, they will bear the meaning which the pursuer has affixed to them in article 7 of the condescendence.

I am further of opinion that no good cause has been shewn for having the trial of the cause before a Judge whose verdict is subject to an appeal in place

No. 155. induced by misrepresentation, because there was no sufficient averment of the misrepresentation to support it. The only misrepresentation alleged was that Mr Glendinning had said to the pursuer that the effect of his writing the letter would be merely to give him "a little hold on Mr Kennedy." The other alleged misrepresentations were purely hypothetical. 3. As to the issue of mutual error, there was no error alleged on the part of Mr Kennedy. 4. This was eminently a case for proof before the Lord Ordinary, as provided in the Evidence Act, 1866.<sup>1</sup> The Court had a complete discretion in the matter.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are some matters in this case upon which I think none of your Lordships have ever entertained any doubt. The first of these is as to the right of the pursuer to obtain the first issue. I am very clearly of opinion that there is a relevant case presented on record in support of it. The other matter to which I refer is that there is no relevant averment on record of misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment inducing the essential error alleged upon the part of the pursuer. There remains only the pursuer's case under the second proposed issue, which must be taken on the assumption that the pursuer fails on his first issue, and also on the assumption that he was not led into the supposed error by misrepresentation, or undue or fraudulent concealment.

I am of opinion that there is no relevant averment of essential error on record, and that the proposed issue faithfully reflects the irrelevant averment. The error alleged and proposed to be submitted to the jury is error as to the import and effect of the contract sought to be reduced. But a contract cannot be reduced on the ground of error unless the error be in the essentials of the contract. In innominate contracts it is sometimes difficult to ascertain or define what are the essentials; but it is not so in nominate contracts, such as the contract of sale with which we are here concerned. The essentials of this contract are the identification of the parties contracting, the subject sold, and the amount of the price; and as regards these in the present case there is no room for doubt. The parties are certainly ascertained, the lands are sufficiently described in the missives, and the price is twenty-five years' purchase of the existing rental. As to the application of the price the purchaser has no interest or concern; and nothing can be an essential of a contract which does not concern both parties. Neither is there any error as to the nature of the contract, as in the case of a person signing a disposition believing it to be a lease, or a bond for borrowed money believing it to be a testament. The parties well knew they were making a contract of sale, and nothing else.

The error which the pursuer says he laboured under when he signed his letter of offer was, that, according to its terms, he believed he would sufficiently fulfil his obligation as an entail proprietor by selling under the authority of the Statute of 1882, and thereby converting the entailed lands into entailed money. It has been found by our judgment in the previous action that if he entertained this belief he was wrong as to the construction of the offer which he made and which was accepted; and that according to its true construction he was bound to proceed under the Act of 1853 to obtain the ratification by the Court of a sale made and a disposition granted before the Court's interposition is asked.

<sup>1</sup> Mackay's Practice i. 35; Hume v. Trotter & Co., Jan. 14, 1875, 2 R. 338; Trotter v. Happer, Nov. 24, 1888, 16 R. 141; Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 2.

The condition thus introduced into the contract of sale was a potestative condition, which the seller was bound to fulfil to the utmost of his power, and the Court upon an application under the Act of 1853 cannot alter the terms of the contract of sale made by the parties. The Court is no doubt bound to see that the pecuniary interests of creditors and heirs of entail are not prejudiced by the contract; and if they are, it will be the duty of the Court to refuse the application before them on the ground that the sale was, for that reason, ultra vires of the seller. But there is no middle course between ratifying and refusing to ratify the sale according to its terms and conditions.

The pursuer made a contract of sale complete in all its essential parts, but a question arose between the parties as to the construction of one of its clauses not affecting the essentialia. That question has been decided against the pursuer by this Court acting as a Court of construction, and the pursuer now demands that because he was wrong in his construction he shall be entitled to set aside the contract. If this plea were listened to, every litigant who is unsuccessful in a question as to the construction and effect, or, to use the pursuer's own words, the "import and effect," of a contract would at once have the remedy of reducing the contract which he had deliberately made, and afterwards persistently misconstrued.

LORD MURK.—I agree in the opinion which your Lordship has so very clearly expressed, as to the second issue of essential error. I think there is no mistake here as to the nature of the contract. The contract is a simple contract of sale, and, as I read the letter of the pursuer, the subject-matter of that contract, the parties to it, and the price at which the property is to be disposed of, are all fixed; and these are the essentials of a contract of sale. Now, that being so, I am unable to see that what the pursuer here alleges as to his mistake in the matter is an error of a description that is relevant to reduce that contract. The error alleged is simply that he misunderstood or mistook the effect of the stipulation that the sale should be subject to ratification by the Court; that he thought that would have a particular effect, and he finds he is now mistaken as to what that effect would be, upon the application being made. Now, I do not think that is such an error as a party can be allowed to propound as a good ground for reducing a contract; and on that ground, and for the reasons stated by your Lordship, I agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with all of your Lordships in holding that the pursuer is entitled to have an issue for the trial of the cause founded on his averments of facility and lesion in entering into the contract which he seeks to reduce. I am also of opinion that there is no relevant statement of misrepresentation by Mr Glendinning as an inducing cause to lead the pursuer to enter into the contract. The single averment of misrepresentation is made in these terms:—"Mr Glendinning represented to the pursuer that the effect of writing the said letter" (meaning the letter of offer to sell the estates) "would be merely to give the pursuer a little hold on Mr Kennedy"; and I do not think that on any reasonable construction of the effect of these words, even in the circumstances in which they are said to have been used, they will bear the meaning which the pursuer has affixed to them in article 7 of the condescendence.

I am further of opinion that no good cause has been shewn for having the trial of the cause before a Judge whose verdict is subject to an appeal in place

No. 155. of a jury. On the contrary, it appears to me to be extremely desirable that the tribunal, whose verdict will be final on the facts in this case, where so much must depend on the manner in which the evidence of the pursuer and Mr Glendinning is given, as well as on the substance of that evidence, should themselves see and hear the witnesses.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

But with all anxiety to avoid any difference of opinion as to the issues to be sent to trial, I have, after the best consideration I could give to the matter, come to the conclusion that the pursuer has stated a case which entitles him to an issue of essential error on his part in entering into the contract.

The former action between the parties related exclusively to the meaning of the contract and the mode of enforcing it. Of the two meanings which were presented by the parties the Court were of opinion that the construction for which the present defender contended was the true construction according to the proper and legal meaning of the terms used.

The pursuer, accepting this decision as conclusive, as indeed he is bound to do, says, however, in the present case, that if that be the true construction and legal meaning of the words employed in his letter of offer, then he was under essential error—for in using the language he did, and which indeed was a transcript of a paper brought to him by Mr Glendinning, he never intended to make the contract to which he has been held bound; and the difference between that contract and the bargain which by the terms of his offer he intended to enter into is so material in regard to the substance and effect of the contract itself as to amount to an error in the essentials of the contract, against which the law will give redress—though it may be there will be liability on his part at least for the expense which has been thus caused to the other contracting party. The question for determination is—Taking the decision of the Court as settling the true meaning of the pursuer's offer of sale, was there ever really in idem placitum consensus et conventio—or were the parties making a contract as to the meaning of which there was an essential difference—a difference in essentialibus between them?

The important words of the offer in the present question, without which indeed the question could scarcely have arisen, are these:—"In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court." These words, it must I think be conceded, admit of construction—by which I mean it may be fairly said of them that they might in the minds of the contracting parties respectively be used and taken in a different sense—in one sense by the proposed seller, in another sense by the purchaser.

Both parties knew they were dealing with an entailed estate. By a sale "subject to the ratification of the Court" might be meant (as the pursuer says he understood the words) a sale subject to a ratification which inferred examination and inquiry by the Court into the transaction, in the interest of the heirs of entail, and therefore the consideration and approval by the Court of the price as an adequate one in the view that the entailed estate was to become entailed money in which the future heirs of entail were interested. Or the language used might mean, as the defender understood it, and the Court has held it did mean, that the Court was to give its approval of the sale and proceedings as a matter of course, without any inquiry as to the future interest of heirs of entail, and on the footing that the estate was to be disentailed without any substitution of entailed money, in which case all that the Court had to regard was that present interests affecting the estate were duly provided for, without any consideration of the question whether the price was adequate or not. It is clear on No. 155. his statement that whether the difference was vital and essential or not, it was one of great importance to the pursuer. The difference was so great, as I think June 25, 1889. I shall immediately shew, that in the pursuer's view the contract was made sub- Stewart v. Kennedy. ject to an important suspensive condition which might never be purified, while according to the meaning to which the Court has given effect there was no such suspensive condition.

It was partly in the view of this material difference which might exist in the understanding of the parties of the meaning of the language which they used, that in the outset of my opinion in the former case I expressed myself thus:— "I concur with Lord Mure in thinking that the only question to be determined in this case is in regard to the meaning of the words, 'in the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court,' and I think in determining the meaning of these words we must have regard to what the purchaser was entitled to take to be their meaning. It is not a question entirely of what was in the mind of the seller when these words were used, but the question is, how was the purchaser entitled to read these words when he gave a written acceptance of the offer."

Now, what the pursuer in this action states is, that being quite aware that the Entail Statutes enabled him to sell the estate of Murtly and to convert the price into entailed money, and believing that this could be effected by a private sale, he entered into the contract of sale with that view. He knew by his previous experience in an application which he had formerly presented to the Court that the Court itself made independent inquiry into the propriety of the bargain, and particularly as to price, in the interest of future heirs of entail, and that the Court would only ratify or approve of the sale if fully satisfied as to the advantage to be gained by the sale; and he therefore stipulated as a condition of his contract that the sale should be "subject to the ratification of the Court." He states in article 7 of the condescendence that he understood that he was entering into "a conditional bargain," "that he would be bound to go to the Court for authority to sell the estates, under the procedure which he knew of, to the defender, and if the Court should approve of the whole terms of the proposed bargain as fair and reasonable, and should ratify the same, that Mr Kennedy would be bound to purchase on the same terms, but that if the Court should hold that the price was inadequate, the pursuer would not be bound to sell at the price proposed."

The present question is to be decided on the assumption that this statement is true, and that the pursuer is prepared to prove it. It is clear, in this view, that the pursuer, who was concluding a bargain involving the sale of an estate admittedly worth nearly £400,000 without the intervention of any law-agent, and with a certain degree of haste, was stipulating for a means of completely guarding himself against any improvidence in the bargain which he agreed to in such circumstances. But I apprehend, as I have already indicated, that he was, in his view, and as he believed by the very language of his offer, stipulating for a ratification by the Court which operated as a suspensive condition of the sale, and not a mere potestative condition only—for if the result of independent inquiry by the Court was that the price agreed on was inadequate, as the pursuer now avers it to be, then there would be no ratification or approval, and consequently no sale.

Now, what, on the other hand, was the contract which the defender meant to

No. 155. parties. It is only because "judgment has been given against him," and he consequently finds that the contract has been construed as an absolute sale on his part at a price finally fixed, that the pursuer has brought this action on the ground that there was never any real consent on his part to such a bargain. The same thing might occur, and no doubt has occurred, where a loose or ambiguous description of lands, the subject of a contract of lease or sale, has been given in the deed or correspondence between the parties. Each will properly in the first instance maintain his construction of the contract as creating the greater or lesser right. But the defeated party will surely not be precluded from setting aside the contract altogether, on the ground of error in its inception and absence of consensus in idem as to the subject of the contract, because the construction of the language used has been determined against him.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

I do not see that it forms any ground for refusing the remedy of reduction on the head of essential error that on the question of construction judgment has been given against the pursuer. And on the grounds I have stated I think the pursuer is entitled to an issue putting the question whether in entering into the contract he was under essential error as to its nature and effect, which is, I believe, the form of issues under which questions of essential error have been in use to be tried.

LORD ADAM.—I do not understand that there is any dispute that the pursuer and defender entered into a contract, and that that contract is contained in a letter from the pursuer addressed to the defender, dated 19th September 1888, and the defender's answer of the 20th of September.

That the parties entered into a contract by that letter and answer, I do not think there is any doubt. Nor do I think there is any doubt as to the nature of the contract which they thereby entered into. It was a contract of sale, and not a contract of lease, or anything of that sort. The meaning of error as to the nature of a contract is that the parties have been in error as to the kind of contract,—contract of sale or contract of lease, or any other contract that they meant to enter into. If there is error as to that, then a party may have relief, but not otherwise. If there is no error as to the nature of the contract, I have always understood that no averment of error is relevant to reduction, unless it is an averment of error as to the essentials of the contract; and I have always understood that the essentials of a contract of sale are three, viz., the person, the subject, and the price. If there is no error on these three points, then I understand there can be no relief against such a contract, however much in point of pecuniary value one of the parties may be prejudiced by the contract which he has entered into. If the error does not enter into one of these three essentials, he can have no redress. Now here, as I understand, there is no mistake as to the person. The pursuer and defender made the contract with each other. There is no mistake as to the subject. The estates of Murtly and Grandtully were the subject of the contract. There is no mistake as to the price. The price is distinctly fixed by the written contract between the parties, viz., twenty-five years' purchase of the nett rental. These three essentials of a contract of sale are embodied in the offer and acceptance, and I do not find any error as to these essentials at all. But the error which the pursuer says he fell into was this; he says,—When I used the words in my letter, "In the event of your acceptance, the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court," I mistook the meaning of the word ratification; what I had in my mind was that proceedings must be taken under the Entail Act of 1882, the effect of which is that the Court would order a sale of the subjects, and would determine the price, and further, that when the price was determined, it should just be a substitution of entailed money for entailed land. That, he says, is what he meant by ratification. Whereas he says the Court have found that the meaning of it is this, that you shall prepare a disposition, and the Court (as they have the power to do on being satisfied that the interests of the creditors and of the next heir of entail are secured) will approve and must approve of that disposition; and so the sale will be carried out. That is the error which he avers, and from which he wants relief. Now, that is not an error which to my mind goes to the essentials of the contract at all. It appears to me to be simply this, that Sir Douglas Stewart understood that the price of from £300,000 to £400,000 should be disposed of in a particular way. Now, Mr Kennedy, the defender, the other party to the contract, has no concern with the application of the price, and therefore I cannot see how that can be an essential of the contract. Nor do I see that the magnitude of the pecuniary or other result arising from the construction put upon the contract by the Court can make that an error in essentialibus. That occurs every day. We had a case lately in which the error of the parties as regards amount was very considerable. I refer to the case of The Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Company, February 8, 1889, supra, p. 440, where the pecuniary difference arising from one or other reading of the contract amounted to many thousand pounds. Yet the magnitude of the result of a certain construction of the contract did not affect the question of the essentiality, simply because it did not go to one of the essentials of the contract itself. Now, what is there more in this contract than that? The contract is in writing, and the Court have construed it, bringing out certain results. But this does not affect the essentials of the contract. The price is the same as before, the subject is the same, and the persons are the same. All Sir Douglas Stewart can say is this,—I entered into a contract, and when I used the word ratification I used a word with the meaning of which, as the result has shewn, I was not fully acquainted. That is all. But in my humble opinion that does not go to the essentials of the contract. If Sir Douglas Stewart has used language which the Court has been forced to construe to his prejudice, I do not see that the defender has anything to do with that. It does not in my mind go to the essentials of the contract, and therefore I think with your Lordship that there is no relevant averment of essential error on this record. On these grounds I concur with your Lordship.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

HUGH ROSS, Pursuer.

JOHN MACKENZIE, Defender.—John Wilson.

No. 156.

Process—Jury trial—Abandonment—Decree of absolvitor—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 10—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.—The pursuer Mac-ross v. Mackenzie, in an action lodged a minute of abandonment, in terms of sec. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1825,* after issues were adjusted, but before the trial. Thereafter

* By sec. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1825, the pursuer has it in his power after the closing of the record "to abandon the cause on paying full expenses or costs to the defender, and to bring a new action if otherwise competent."

No. 155.

June 25, 1889.
Stewart v. Kennedy.

No. 156. the Court allowed the defender to lodge an account of his expenses. The pursuer failed to pay the account as taxed. The defender moved for absolvitor. The Court, being satisfied that the pursuer had abandoned the suit, and having regard to sec. 46 of the A. S., 16th Feb. 1841,* assoilzied the defender.

June 26, 1889.
Ross v. Mackenzie.

1st Division. C. HUGH ROSS, Balchaggan, raised an action of damages against John Mackenzie, Milltown.

Issues in the cause were adjusted by the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) on 25th January 1889, and the cause was set down for trial at the Spring Sittings 1889.

Shortly before the date of the trial the pursuer by minute abandoned the cause in terms of the statute.

Thereafter the Court allowed the defender to lodge an account of his expenses, and remitted the account to the Auditor.

On 26th June the defender stated to the Court that the pursuer had failed to pay the account of expenses as taxed, and that his agent had intimated that he was not in a position to do so. He therefore moved the Court to assoilzie him from the conclusions of the summons.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—It seems to me that the failure to pay expenses after the minute of abandonment was lodged merely deprived the pursuer of his privilege of abandonment. I do not see how in the ordinary case any other consequence could follow. But here, I think the argument founded on sec. 46 of the A. S., Feb. 16, 1841, is quite unanswerable. That Act of Sederunt applies only to procedure in jury trials, and sec. 46 only to cases after the adjustment of issues. That section provides that “if it shall be made to appear to the Court that a party has abandoned his suit, or if the pursuer . . . shall not proceed to trial within twelve months after issues have been finally engrossed and signed the Court shall proceed therein as in cases in which parties are held as confessed,”—that is to say, decree of absolvitor shall follow. That section applies directly to the present case, and therefore, I think, the defender must be assoilzied.

LORD MURE.—I concur. The 46th section of the Act of Sederunt is precisely applicable to this case.

LORD SHAND.—I see no difficulty in this case. The Act of Sederunt to which we have been referred provides that if a defender satisfies the Court that the pursuer has abandoned the action then he shall be entitled to absolvitor.

The fact that the pursuer has abandoned the suit in this case is perfectly clear, and therefore I have no doubt that the Act of Sederunt applies, and that we must assoilzie the defender.

LORD ADAM.—I am satisfied on the evidence that the pursuer here has abandoned his suit, and, if that be so, I am further clearly of opinion that, whether under the A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, or under the innate powers of the Court, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“In respect the pursuer

* A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, regulating proceedings in jury causes, sec. 46, enacts,—“If it shall be made to appear to the Court that a party has abandoned his suit, or if the pursuer . . . shall not proceed to trial within twelve months after issues have been finally engrossed and signed, the Court shall proceed therein as in cases in which parties are held as confessed . . .”

<sup>1</sup> Lawson v. Low, July 1, 1845, 7 D. 960, 17 Scot. Jur. 492.

has abandoned the cause, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decern : Approve of the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses, No. 25 of process, and decern against the pursuer for the sum of £50, 14s. 11d., the taxed amount thereof." No. 156.
June 26, 1889.
Ross v. Mackenzie.

ROBERT CUNNINGHAM, S.S.C., Defender's Agent.

JAMES HOGARTH AND ANOTHER (Fotheringham's Trustees), First Parties. No. 157.

—Jameson—Hay.

JOHN FOTHERINGHAM, Second Party.—Low—Cook.

June 27, 1889.
Fotheringham's Trustees v. Fotheringham.

Husband and Wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 6—Marriage prior to Act—Right of surviving husband to share of wife's estate—Exclusion of jus mariti by antenuptial marriage-contract.—Section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881,* applies to marriages whether contracted prior or subsequent to the date of the Act.

By an antenuptial marriage-contract entered into prior to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, which dealt exclusively with the wife's estate, the wife conveyed to trustees her moveable estate with directions to them to hold the same "for behoof of herself, whom failing, then for behoof of her own representatives, . . . excluding always the jus mariti and right of administration of her said intended husband, and the debts and diligence of his creditors," and "in order that this trust and arrangement may receive effect" the husband renounced his jus mariti and right of administration over the estate so conveyed. The wife died leaving children of the marriage, but without having executed any further writing disposing of her estate. In a special case between the marriage-contract trustees and the husband of the deceased, held that the husband was entitled, under section 6 of the Act of 1881, to one-third of his wife's estate.

Poe v. Paterson, Dec. 13, 1882, 10 R. 356, affd. July 16, 1883, 10 R. (H. L.) 73, followed.

ON 20th March 1877 John Fotheringham, Orrock, near Burntisland, entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract with Miss Isabella Hogarth, and the marriage took place on the same day. 1ST DIVISION. C.

By the contract, which dealt entirely with the wife's estate, it was provided :—"Therefore the said Isabella Hogarth, with the special advice and consent of the said John Fotheringham, hereby assigns, disposes, conveys, and makes over to and in favour of James Hogarth, her brother, residing at West Mills, and James Cook, baker, Lochgelly, and acceptor and survivor of them, in trust, for behoof of herself, whom failing, then for behoof of her own representatives, or other parties that may be hereafter named by her, excluding always the jus mariti and right of administration of her said intended husband, and the debts and diligence of his creditors, All and Sundry her whole means and estate presently belonging to her, or which she may hereafter acquire or succeed to from any source whatever, which she, with advice and consent foresaid, directs her said trustees to hold and apply for behoof foresaid, in such manner as to them shall seem equitable and right; and, in order that this trust and arrangement may receive due effect, the said John Fotheringham hereby re-

* Section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts,—“After the passing of this Act, the husband of any woman, who may die domiciled in Scotland, shall take, by operation of law, the same share and interest in her moveable estate which is taken by a widow in her deceased husband's moveable estate according to the law and practice of Scotland, and subject always to the same rules of law in relation to the nature and amount of such share and interest, and the exclusion, discharge, or satisfaction thereof, as the case may be.”

No. 157. nounces his jus mariti and right of administration as regards the means and estate hereby conveyed.”

June 27, 1889.
Fothering-
ham's Trustees v. Fotheringham.

Mrs Fotheringham died domiciled in Scotland on 7th February 1883, without having executed any writing disposing of her estate (which consisted entirely of personal property), except the contract of marriage above referred to. She was survived by her husband and by five children of the marriage.

Questions having arisen as to Mr Fotheringham's right to a share of his wife's estate, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court. The trustees under the marriage-contract were the first parties to the case, and Mr Fotheringham was the second party thereto.

The question submitted to the Court was,—“Is the second party entitled to receive, and are the first parties bound to pay to him, one-third of the free moveable means and estate of the late Mrs Isabella Hogarth or Fotheringham?”

The second party maintained that he was entitled to one-third of his wife's property under the provisions of section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. It was decided by the case of Poë v. Paterson<sup>1</sup> that section 6 of that Act applied to the case of marriages whether contracted before or after the date of the Act. The object of the deed here was to protect the estate from the husband and his creditors stante matrimonio. There was no burden of any kind placed on the estate by the contract, and the wife was therefore left absolute proprietor of her property, and could do what she liked with it. The Act, therefore, applied to the case if its operation was not expressly excluded, or unless there was such a provision in favour of the husband as to infer exclusion. Now, there was no provision at all for the husband, and all that was excluded was the jus mariti. The 6th section of the Act could only apply to cases where jus mariti was excluded, for if it was not excluded a wife could have no moveable property of her own during the marriage. Further, the jus mariti ceased at the dissolution of the marriage, and the exclusion of that right could not affect his claim under the Act.

The first parties maintained that by the antenuptial contract Mr Fotheringham had discharged all his rights of every kind in his wife's estate, and that they were bound to hold the whole estate for behoof of the children of the marriage, as being Mrs Fotheringham's representatives. If the view of the second party were given effect to, the decision would be contrary to the provisions of section 8 of the Act, which enacted that the Act should “not affect any contracts made or to be made between married persons before or during marriage,” because the contract would be affected to this extent, that the children of the marriage would only get two-thirds of the estate instead of the whole.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is important to observe that it has already been decided in the case of Poë v. Paterson (10 R. 356, and ibid. (H. L.) 73) that section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, applies to marriages entered into before the date of the Act, as well as to those entered into subsequent to that date. In that case the Court and the House of Lords gave the husband of a deceased wife one-half of her moveable estate, the division being bipartite because there were no children of the marriage.

That being so, it appears to me that section 6 never can come into operation except where the jus mariti has been excluded from the moveable estate of the wife, for if it had not been excluded then the wife could have no moveable estate of which she could die possessed. Therefore, so far as marriages contracted before the Act were concerned, in every case where the section applies there must be this element, that the wife must have held her moveable estate exclusive of the jus mariti, whether in virtue of her marriage-contract, or of the settlement of some other person. Now, that is exactly the state of matters here, and it appears to me that there is nothing more in the case. The wife possessed her estate exclusive of her husband's jus mariti, and notwithstanding the trust she was absolute owner of it; there was no burden or liferent to which it was subject,—in short, there was nothing which stood between her and her right of absolute disposal of her property. That being so, she died with the property vested in her, and the question is whether her husband is entitled to one-third of it under the 6th section of the Act.

<sup>1</sup> Poë v. Paterson, Dec. 13, 1882, 10 R. 356, aff. July 16, 1883, ibid. (H. L.) 73.

No. 157.

June 27, 1889.
Fothering-
ham's Trustees v. Fotheringham.

There are two propositions which the second party has to make out, first, that the estate was the absolute property of the wife; and second, that there was nothing done by him to discharge the right which would otherwise have belonged to him. From what I have already said, it is clear that he has made out both these propositions. There is no doubt that the estate was the absolute property of the wife, and it is equally clear that the only right excluded by the contract is the jus mariti, and, as I said before, if the exclusion of that right is to prevent the 6th section from taking effect, then that section could never apply to any marriage entered into before the Act. I think, therefore, that the second party is entitled to prevail.

LORD MURE.—I concur. The main object of the contract was to secure the wife's right of property in her estate to the exclusion of her husband's jus mariti and the debts and diligence of his creditors. In that object the wife has succeeded. Now, the property existed intact at the date of the wife's death, and in those circumstances we have a section of an Act which provides that the husband of any woman who may die domiciled in Scotland shall take the same share in his wife's moveable estate which is taken by a widow in her deceased husband's moveable estate. Looking to the construction which has been given to that section by this Court, and by the House of Lords, in the case of Poe v. Paterson, I am of opinion that the husband in this case is entitled to a third part of his wife's moveable estate.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with the observation made by Mr Low that, so far as this is a marriage-contract, its object was to exclude the husband's rights stante matrimonio, and that, so long as the marriage subsisted, the wife was the sole mistress of her moveable property. If that be so, the result is that the 6th section of the Act of 1881 applies, unless it is expressly excluded. Now, the only thing excluded by the contract is the jus mariti and right of administration. But those are rights which come to an end with the marriage, just when the jus relictæ, as it has been called, comes into operation. I think, therefore, that we must answer the question in favour of the second party to the case.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 158. MRS HAMILTON DUNBAR TENNENT, Pursuer (Respondent).—Asher—Loc.

June 28, 1889.

Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

RALPH DALYELL WELCH (Tennent's Executor), Defender (Reclaimant).—Gloag—H. Johnston.

Husband and Wife—Foreign—Sale of English heritage belonging to wife—Surrogatum—Donation inter virum et uxorem.—The wife of a domiciled Scotsman, with her husband's concurrence, sold the estate of X, in England, belonging to her, and acknowledged the conveyance before two commissioners in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, declaring at the same time that she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in lieu thereof. Her husband received the price and applied it to his own uses. The spouses afterwards separated by mutual consent, and the wife executed a deed of revocation of all donations and provisions made by her in her husband's favour. She then brought an action against him for declarator that the £18,000 in his hands was either (1) a surrogatum for her heritage, and not subject to the ius mariti, or (2) was a donation to him which she had validly revoked.

The Court—after obtaining the opinion of the English Court to the effect that by the law of England, the law of the situs, (1) the estate of X, after the marriage, continued to belong to the wife in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate in the husband during coverture (which entitled him to the rents); and (2) by the wife's conveyance, and her refusal of any provision, her interest in the estate was converted into personalty, and became the property of the husband—held (1) that on the wife's interest being converted into personalty the respective rights of the spouses fell to be determined by the law of Scotland, the law of their domicile; and (2) that the price of the wife's interest in the estate belonged to her as a surrogatum for her heritage, exclusive of the ius mariti.

Opinion per curiam that the gift of the price of the subjects to the husband, assuming it to have been made, was a donation inter virum et uxorem, and had been competently recalled by the wife's deed of revocation.

Husband and Wife—Wife's English heritage—Husband's rights after sale of heritage.—A married woman sold certain heritage belonging to her in England, of which according to English law her husband had right to the rents during coverture, his right being a freehold. The husband received the price and applied it to his own uses during the marriage. In an action against his executor for recovery of the price without interest, the latter contended that the proportion of the price corresponding to the husband's freehold belonged to him. Held that although the husband might have been entitled to have the purchase money apportioned according to the value of the respective rights of husband and wife as at the date of the sale, he having enjoyed the interest of the whole price subsequently thereto, had received an equivalent for the rents of the heritage, and had no further claim.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

MR CHARLES WELCH TENNENT and Mrs Hamilton Dunbar Tennent were married in London on 24th March 1877. There was no marriage-contract between the spouses. After their marriage they lived together until the month of May or June 1881, when they separated. There was no issue of the marriage.

At the date of the marriage and down to his death, which took place on 8th October 1884, Mr Tennent was a domiciled Scotsman.

Prior to her marriage Mrs Tennent was owner in fee-simple in possession of the estate of Overton, in the county of Salop, being possessed of considerable other means and estate besides. In 1876 she had entered into negotiations for a sale of Overton to Lord Boyne, but at the date of her marriage the sale had not been carried through. It was subsequently to the marriage sold to Lord Boyne's marriage-contract trustees for £23,500, the deed of conveyance being executed by the pursuer and her husband in July 1877. On the day of the sale Mrs Tennent appeared before two of the commissioners appointed under the Act 3 and 4 Will

IV. cap. 74 (an Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, &c.), for the county of Middlesex, and acknowledged the conveyance to be her act and deed, and in terms thereof the commissioners executed the required certificate.*

No. 158.
June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

Out of the purchase price of £23,500, £18,000 was paid to Mr Welch Tennent, and the remaining £5500 was consigned in the joint names of the seller and purchaser for the purpose of meeting an annuity of £200 which was charged upon the estate.

After the separation of the spouses, Mrs Tennent, by deed of revocation dated 20th and 21st December 1882, revoked all donations or provisions which she had made in favour of her husband and declared them to be of no effect.

On 1st June 1883 Mrs Tennent brought an action against her husband in which she concluded for declarator, "that the defender is in possession of and holds—First, the sum of £18,000 sterling, and, second, the sum of £950 sterling" (being the price of certain subjects other than the estate of Overton), "as surrogata for the heritable estate of the pursuer, free from and unaffected by the jus mariti of the defender, or otherwise that the said sums possessed and held by the defender constituted a donation from the pursuer to the defender which has been validly recalled by the pursuer," and for payment. There was a further conclusion for declarator that the £5500 (the balance of the price of Overton) was also the property of the pursuer, subject to the burden of the annuity, or that it consti-

* By section 77 of 3 and 4 William IV. chapter 74, a married woman was enabled by deed to dispose of her heritable estate as fully and effectually as she could do if she were a femme sole, "save and except that no such disposition shall be valid and effectual unless the husband concur in the deed by which the sale shall be effected, nor unless the deed be acknowledged by her as hereinafter directed." By section 79 the deed, upon her executing the same or afterwards, is to be "produced and acknowledged by her as her act and deed before a Judge, Master in Chancery, or a Commissioner," who by section 80, before they receive such acknowledgment are to examine her apart from her husband touching her knowledge of such deed, and to ascertain whether she freely and voluntarily consents to such deed: otherwise they are not to permit the acknowledgment, and the deed as to her execution is void. Section 84 gives forms for the memorandum and certificate of acknowledgment: and section 89 provides that the Court of Common Pleas shall make orders and regulations touching the mode of examination by the Commissioners.

The second of the rules made by the Court of Common Pleas was,—(2) "Before a Commissioner shall receive an acknowledgment he shall inquire of the married woman separately and apart from her husband and from the solicitor concerned in the transaction, whether she intends to give up her interest in the estate to be passed by the deed without having any provision made for her, and where the married woman answers in the affirmative, and the Commissioner shall have no reason to doubt the truth of her answer, he shall proceed to receive the acknowledgment."

The affidavit made by one of the Commissioners bore, inter alia:—"That previous to the said Hamilton Dunbar Tennent making the said acknowledgment, I inquired of her, the said Hamilton Dunbar Tennent, whether she intended to give up her interest in the estate in respect of which such acknowledgment was taken without having any provision made for her in lieu of, or in return for, or in consequence of her so giving up her interest in such estate, and that in answer to such inquiry the said Hamilton Dunbar Tennent declared that she did intend to give up her interest in the said estate without having any provision made for her in lieu of, or in return for, or in consequence of her so giving up such her interest, of which declaration of the said Hamilton Dunbar Tennent I have no reason to doubt the truth, and I verily believe the same to be true."

No. 158. June 28, 1889. Tennent v. Tennent's Executor. tuted a donation in favour of the defender which had been validly recalled by the pursuer, and that on its ceasing to be chargeable the pursuer was entitled to payment of it.

The defender having died, as above stated, on 8th October 1884, the cause was transferred against Ralph Dalyell Welch, as his executor and general dispoinee. The record was also, on 16th December 1885, opened up and amendments allowed.

The pursuer stated;—"The said sums were either surrogata for the said heritable estates which belonged to the pursuer, or were a donation by her to the said defender. The said balance of £5500, consigned as aforesaid, was never reduced into the possession of the said defender, and the right thereto remained vested in the pursuer; or in any event, it was surrogata pro tanto for the said estate or a donation by the pursuer to the defender which was cancelled by the deed of revocation."

The defender stated, inter alia;—(Stat. 1) "Prior to the marriage of the pursuer and the original defender the pursuer . . . had entered into a contract of sale . . . of her manor of Overton, . . . to Viscount Boyne, but the said sale had not been carried into effect by actual conveyance. After their marriage the said defender concurred, as he was bound to do, with the pursuer, in fulfilling her contract of sale by granting the necessary conveyance. The price of the said estate contracted to be paid to the pursuer by Viscount Boyne was by the law of England personalty at the date of their marriage and passed to the said defender jure mariti as his own absolute property upon the marriage taking place." (Stat. 2) "At least if the said contract of sale was not complete and binding on the pursuer prior to her marriage, or if the original defender was not bound to fulfil, or to join with her in fulfilling it after their marriage, then the pursuer being, at the date of her marriage with the said defender, seized of the said manor of Overton and other hereditaments for an estate of inheritance in fee-simple in possession, and no settlement of the pursuer's estate having been executed prior to the pursuer's marriage to the said defender, by the law of England the said defender, on his marriage with the pursuer, ipso facto acquired a freehold interest in the said manor of Overton and hereditaments aforesaid, which entitled him to the rents and profits thereof during the joint lives of himself and wife, and which, in the event of there being issue of the marriage who could inherit, entitled him to such rents and profits during the remainder of his life. This freehold interest it was competent for him to alienate at pleasure. The pursuer retained the property or fee-simple, subject to her husband's right therein, but without power to dispose of the same by will or (except as hereinafter mentioned) by deed." (Stat. 3) "The pursuer was entitled to dispose of her said fee-simple estate by deed, provided only her husband concurred therein, and such deed was duly executed and acknowledged by the pursuer before two commissioners, in terms of law, according to the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74. In the event of her duly acknowledging the deed of conveyance in terms of law, the whole purchase price of the fee-simple, and not merely of his own freehold interest therein, passed by the law of England to her husband, the original defender, as his own absolute property jure mariti." There was a further statement (stat. 8) to the effect that the £18,000, although admittedly received by Mr Tennent, had been spent with the knowledge of the pursuer upon their joint establishment and for their joint uses and purposes.

The defender, after setting forth the execution of the conveyance by Mrs Tennent to Lord Boyne's marriage-contract trustees on 24th July 1877, and relative procedure, stated:—"The pursuer having thus duly executed and acknowledged the said deed of conveyance in terms of law, No. 158.

the whole purchase price of the said property of Overton became by the law of England the absolute property jure mariti of the said defender." June 28, 1889.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—1. The said sum of £18,000, Tennent v.
being surrogatum for the heritable property of the pursuer, did not fall Tennent's under the jus mariti of the said Charles Welch Tennent, and the defender Executor. is bound to make payment thereof to the pursuer. 2. The said sum of £5500 being surrogatum for the heritable property of the pursuer, did not fall within the jus mariti of the said Charles Welch Tennant. 3. The pursuer is not barred from claiming right to the said sums of £18,000 and £5500 by the acknowledgment of the deed of conveyance executed by her in respect (1) that the said acknowledgment did not affect the rights of the pursuer and the said Charles Welch Tennent inter se; and
(2) that their rights in the premises fell to be determined by the law of Scotland. 4. At all events the said sum of £5500 not having been reduced into the possession of the said defender, the right thereto remained vested in the pursuer as the owner of the said estate, and she is entitled to payment thereof, on the foresaid annuity ceasing to be chargeable, as concluded for. 5. Assuming the said defender to have acquired right to the foresaid several sums, the same formed a donation by the pursuer to him, which was revoked by the pursuer, and she is entitled to decree therefor in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—2. The pursuer having entered into a contract of sale of the said estate of Overton prior to her marriage, and the price stipulated to be paid therefor being personalty at the date of her marriage, fell to the original defender jure mariti as his absolute property on the marriage taking place. 4. By the law of England the manor and estate of Overton having been sold, and the conveyance thereof executed and acknowledged, . . . the whole price thereof belonged to the original defender as his own absolute property jure mariti. 5. The rights of parties in the said manor and estate of Overton, and the price thereof, and separatim, in the said leasehold property, No. 10 Grove End Road, St John's Wood, and the price thereof, falling to be determined by the law of England, which does not confer upon the pursuer any right to insist that the said price, or any part thereof, shall be paid to her, the defender should be assoilzied. 6. The said sum of £5500 being part of the price of the said manor and estate of Overton, belonged, by the law of England, to the original defender, and now belongs to the present defender, as his executor, absolutely, subject to the purposes for which it is held in trust, and the pursuer is therefore not entitled to decree as concluded for thereanent. 7. The Scots law of donation inter virum et uxorem does not apply, and the deed of revocation alleged to have been executed by the pursuer on 20th December 1882 cannot affect the conveyance of the Overton estate and Grove End Road property, and their consequences, which are regulated by the law of England. 8. Also separatim, The defender ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, in respect that, assuming the Scots law of donation to apply, the money sought now to be recovered as a donation was spent during the subsistence of the marriage by the spouses, or with the knowledge and consent of the pursuer, for the joint uses and purposes of the spouses.

Proof, both oral and documentary, was afterwards led before the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) as to the averments contained in the first article of the defender's statement of facts, and thereafter a case under the Law Ascertainment Act (22 and 23 Vict. cap. 63) was adjusted at the sight of the Court in which the facts were set forth, and the opinion of the High Court of Justice was requested upon it. The questions put were "(1)

No. 158. Whether at the date of her marriage to the original defender, viz., 24th March 1877, a valid and binding contract of sale of Overton had been entered into by or on behalf of the pursuer as vendor and Lord Boyne or his trustees as purchasers, enforceable by an action for specific performance at the suit of Lord Boyne or his trustees as purchasers, or of the pursuer as vendor, or of either of them? (2) Whether such contract operated as a conversion of said estate of Overton into personalty in the person of the pursuer, so as to vest the proceeds in her husband absolutely at the date of the said marriage? (3) Whether such contract was by English law a chose in action, and consequently did not become the property of her husband until the reduction of the same into his possession? In the event of the Court deciding that no valid and binding contract for the sale of Overton had been entered into before the marriage of the pursuer, and that the original defender took no interest in the price thereof,—(4) What, after their marriage, were the respective rights or interests of the pursuer and the original defender, as the husband of the pursuer, by the law of England, in the estate of Overton; and were these rights or interests, or either of them, saleable by them or either of them, and on what conditions? (5) On the conveyance of the estate, what were the original defender's right and interest by the law of England in the price thereof; and did such right and interest in the price pass to the original defender by the said conveyance or by his jus mariti? (6) Whether under the trusts of the indenture, set out in par. 15* herein, the pursuer is entitled absolutely to the said sum of £5500, she having survived her husband, or whether she is otherwise entitled to it as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband during his coverture?"

In answer the following order was pronounced in the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, by Mr Justice Kay,—“This Court is of opinion that at the date of the marriage of the pursuer to the original defender, namely, the 24th March 1877, no valid or binding contract of sale of Overton in the said special case mentioned had been entered into by or on behalf of the pursuer as vendor and Lord Boyne or his trustees as purchasers; and that after the said marriage the said estate of Overton belonged to the pursuer in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate of the original defender therein during the continuance of the coverture, and that those rights and interests were saleable by them, as to the original defender's estate, without the concurrence of the pursuer, and as to the pursuer's estate, only with the concurrence of the original defender in an acknowledged deed, and under the conditions imposed by the Statute 3 and 4 William IV. chapter 74, and the rules thereunder: And that on the conveyance of the estate, . . . the original defender, by the law of England, became absolutely entitled to the price thereof, and that such right and interest in the price passed to him by the said conveyance, and by the refusal of the pursuer, on her separate examination, of any provision, rather than by any jus mariti; and that under the trusts of the indenture, set forth in paragraph 15 of the said special case, the pursuer is not entitled by the law of England, to the sum of £5500 therein also mentioned, either as having survived the original defender, or as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the original defender during his coverture.”—(L. R. 37 Chanc. Div. 622.)

---

* The trusts were to hold the fund “for the purpose of indemnifying the purchasers against the charge of £200 per annum charged on the estate of Overton, as set forth in the said indenture. Further trusts were declared by the said indenture of the said sum of £5500 after the determination of the said annuity for the benefit of the pursuer and the original defender.”

On 20th October 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this No. 158. interlocutor:—"Finds that the domicile of the deceased Charles Welch Tennent was at the date of his marriage on 24th March 1877, and con- June 28, 1889.
tinued to be till his death, in Scotland: Finds that the pursuer, his wife, Tennent v.
acquired, on her marriage, the domicile of her husband: Finds that the Tennent's rights of parties as to the price of the Overton estate, so far as paid to the Executor.
husband, and of the £5500 now held in trust, must be determined according to the law of Scotland: Further, allows to the defender a proof of the averment contained in the 8th statement of facts by him, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation: Appoints the proof to be led before the Lord Ordinary on a day to be afterwards fixed. . . ."

* "OPINION.—The law of England was invoked in this action in order to ascertain what was the character, as heritable or moveable, of certain English property which at the date of the marriage belonged to the pursuer.

"By a series of decisions it has been determined that the character of the subject, as heritable or moveable, shall be ascertained according to the law of the place where it is situated—(See Egerton v. Forbes, 27th November 1812, F. C.; Newlands v. Chalmers's Trustees, 22d November 1832, 11 S. 65; Clarke v. Newmarsh, 16th February 1836, 14 S. 488; Downie v. Christie and Others, 14th July 1866, 4 Macph. 1067). It was upon this footing that the case was sent for the opinion of the Court of Chancery, and that has now been returned. Mr Justice Kay has held that the Overton estate was converted into personalty.

"Then comes the question what law shall determine as to the right to such personal estate. The late Charles Welch Tennent and the pursuer of this action were domiciled in Scotland, and the contention on the part of the pursuer is that her rights must be determined according to Scots law. If the English property had remained unconverted, then the interests of the husband and wife in it would have been determined by the law of the situs; but as soon as it is changed into personalty the law of the domicile steps in and declares the rights of the spouses in it. Mr Justice Kay, in his opinion,† assumes this doctrine as correct. 'Supposing the parties to have been domiciled in England, it would follow from the mere fact of such conversion that the husband, by his marital rights, would have become entitled at once to whatever interest the wife might have in such personal property.' With regard to the £5500 held in trust he expresses himself as follows:—"I am of opinion that under the circumstances in this case the £5500 cannot be treated as a chose in action to which the wife is entitled, but that if the domicile of the husband and wife had been English the whole would now belong to the executor of the husband.' But if the domicile of the husband and wife were not English, but Scottish, then the opinion of the learned Judge evidently is that resort must be had to the Scots law to ascertain the rights of the parties. There can be no doubt that the operation of the jus mariti is regulated by the law of the domicile. Lord Glenlee, in the case of Newlands v. Chalmers's Trustees, 22d November 1832, 11 S. 65, stated the rule as follows:—"The English lawyers having given an opinion that the right was vested by the law of England, then we held that it transmitted jure mariti by the law of Scotland. As to the effect of the jus mariti, therefore, that judgment [Egerton v. Forbes, 27th November 1812, F. C.] settles that it is the law of Scotland which rules between husband and wife, if there domiciled. But again, on the other hand, it is the law of the country where the subject is situated that must regulate the character of the subject as heritable or moveable. . . . By the law of Scotland, bonds bearing interest are held to be heritable, and this has only been relaxed as to succession by positive statute; but, by the law of Jamaica, they are held strictly moveable. Although, therefore, the law of Scotland regulates the jus mariti, yet we must go to the lex rei sitæ to ascertain what is heritable and what is moveable.' And again, Lord Mackenzie, in Clarke v. Newmarsh,

† The opinion of Mr Justice Kay will be found reported of date Feb. 6, 1888, L. R. 37 Chanc. Div. 622.

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

The defender having stated that he could not undertake to prove that the moneys in question had been spent on household and family expendi-

16th February 1836, 14 S. 488, said,—‘It is enough for the law of Scotland, if the subject be moveable, and vests as such in the wife. That being the case, the law of Scotland immediately applies to the effect of bringing it under the jus mariti. I decided the case of Newlands on this principle, and I perceive that it was on this precise ground that Lord Glenlee gave his opinion when concurring with the Inner-House in adhering to my judgment. The English law is to be referred to for the purpose of determining whether the character of a particular subject was heritable or moveable; but so soon as that is fixed, the law of Scotland decides what is the right of a husband under a Scottish contract of marriage in moveable effects which have accrued during the marriage to his wife.’ In a subsequent case these principles were held settled. The property in dispute was English mortgages, which, if secured over property in Scotland, would have been considered heritable; but being by the English law moveable, it was decided that they were in all respects to be regulated according to the law applicable to moveables in settling the rights of widow, heir, and executor in this country (Downie v. Christie and Others, 14th July 1866, 4 Macph. 1067).

‘Therefore, dealing with this case as one to which the Scottish law applies, then the husband’s jus mariti carried the price of the Overton property, including the £5500. But granting that, the pursuer, the widow, maintains two propositions—first, that a wife who converts her heritable estate into moveable is not presumed thereby to intend anything more than to perform an act of administration, and is assumed to be waiting for another investment of a heritable character; far less is she presumed to convert it into moveables so as to fall under the jus mariti. The money is regarded as the legal surrogate of the heritable estate, even although the husband has manipulated it and embarked it in his business. To this effect there are many decisions, the whole of which will be found collected in Fraser on Husband and Wife, vol. i. p. 703, et seq., and Cuthill v. Burns (20th March 1862, 24 D. 849). But these decisions must be taken with a qualification which is thus stated by Erskine (ii. 2, 16)—‘Thus also a sum belonging to the wife not falling under jus mariti, e.g., a bond bearing interest, continues heritable as to the husband, notwithstanding a demand of payment from the debtor. Nay, though the wife should not only demand, but actually recover payment, there is no alteration in the heritable nature of the bond quoad maritum, unless a presumption shall arise, from her allowing the husband to apply the sum to his own use, or from other circumstances, that she truly intended a donation to him.’ The defender has a special averment upon record that the prices of the Overton estate and of the leasehold property at Grove End Road, St John’s Wood, London, were not invested by the husband, ‘or otherwise applied to his own purposes. They were lodged in bank and afterwards entirely spent by the pursuer and the said defender, or by the said defender with the knowledge and consent of the pursuer, upon their joint establishment, and for their joint uses and purposes. The said prices form no part of the said defender’s executry estate.’ If this be true, then, it would bring the case within the qualification stated by Erskine.

‘Then there arises, secondly, another point. Erskine says that in such circumstances it would be considered a donation. If so, is it a donation revocable, and has it been revoked by the deed of revocation mentioned in the 5th article of the condescendence? Now, it has been determined, that if a wife allow the rents and profits of her separate estate to be employed in maintaining the family, she is debarred from insisting for repayment. Such a claim was made after the husband’s death, and the judgment of the Court met it in a very specific manner. It was found that, as to any portions of the annual proceeds and profits of the wife’s separate estate invested for her separate use in her own name, which the husband was from time to time allowed by her to draw, it was incumbent on the wife, by whom no demand was proved to have been made against the husband himself, to prove that the same or corresponding sums were ture, the Lord Ordinary, on 10th November following, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defender for payment of

No. 158.

June 28, 1880.

Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

applied by him to increase his own estates and funds, or to some specific purposes of his own, and were not applied and consumed from time to time as they were drawn in the expenses of the family or other occasional purposes; and that, in the event of the wife failing in such proof, the legal presumption as to portions of the annual proceeds of her estate so received by the husband was that they were used and consumed by the husband with the wife's sanction and concurrence for objects and purposes of the spouses known to her, and that she obtained the benefit or enjoyment of such use and consumption during the marriage; and that, in the event of the wife failing to prove all this, there was no ground in law on which she could insist in her action against the representatives of her husband (Allan or Hutchison v. Hutchison's Trustees, 1st February 1843, 5 D. 469; and see Williams v. Williams, 15th November 1844, 7 D. 112, opinion of Lord Cuninghame).

"The wife did not go on with her proof in the case of Allan or Hutchison, and the case must be taken as deciding the general point, that where a wife's money has been applied in family expenditure in the benefit of which she has participated, it must be held to have been so done with her sanction and concurrence, and all right of revocation on the ground of donation is barred. This view of the decision was accepted in the House of Lords in the subsequent case of Edward v. Cheyne (L. R. 13 App. Cases, p. 393), in which Lord Watson is found expressing himself as follows:—'The Second Division decided that it was incumbent upon the widow to prove that the money was applied by the husband to increase his own funds, and was not used for family expenditure. Their Lordships also decided that if the widow failed in such proof, effect must be given to the presumption that all sums received by him had been used and consumed by her sanction and concurrence.' This case of Edward v. Cheyne (reported in 13 Rettie, p. 1209, under the name of Baxter's Executor v. Baxter's Trustees, and in the House of Lords under the name of Edward v. Cheyne, L. R. 13 App. Cases, p. 385, and in 25 S. L. R. p. 424) was a case which presented not two questions but only one, and in this respect it differs from the present case. The claim for accounting was made not by the wife against the husband's representatives but by the wife's executor, and the only question there was one of fact, viz., whether or not the wife did gift or donate her separate estate to her husband. By the law of Scotland she is entitled to deal with that separate estate as she thinks fit, and she may give the whole of it to a stranger on the streets or to her husband without consideration, and that gift will remain irrevocable by her representatives. The only person who can revoke it from the husband (though not from a stranger donee) is herself; and if she dies without doing so, her representatives have no ground of complaint and no right of action as against the stranger donee or the husband, and they cannot exercise any right of revocation. Accordingly, the case was treated in the Court of Session as one of fact—as to whether she did donate. There was no second question as to whether, supposing there was a donation, there was a revocation. In the House of Lords the learned Judges, besides so treating the case, also referred largely to the English law as to the propriety of upholding such gifts, which law, however, is widely distinguishable from the law of Scotland, inasmuch as a gift once granted is not by English law subject to revocation by the donor. For example, the statement by Lord Macnaghten of the English law cannot be accepted as the law of Scotland when he says that 'where the circumstances are such that the wife's consent or acquiescence may fairly be presumed, the presumption arises immediately on each receipt' [of the wife's income] 'by the husband, and bars all claim on the part of the wife or her representatives. To displace the rule it is not sufficient to shew that the wife's separate income has accumulated in the husband's hands, and remains unspent.' On the other hand, the law of Scotland is, that if the wife's money can be traced and earmarked, and has not been spent in carrying on the household, it still may be reclaimed by her—though not by her representatives—as a donation. The last

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

the sum of £18,000 sterling; and, secondly, finds that the sum of £5500 sterling, which was part of the price of the heritable estate of Overton, formerly belonging to the pursuer, and which is now held in trust to meet a liferent annuity chargeable on the said heritable estate, is, subject to the burden of the said annuity, the property of the pursuer, and upon the said annuity ceasing to be chargeable the pursuer is entitled to payment of the said sum, and all interest accruing thereon or income derivable therefrom, from the 8th day of October 1884, being the date of the death of the pursuer's husband, Charles Welch Tennent, after payment of the said annuity, and decerns: Finds the defender liable in expenses subsequent to 16th December 1885," &c.*

illustration of this doctrine by decision was Cuthill v. Burns, already referred to. This rule bears very materially on the right as to the £5500 now held in trust, and which was the price of the wife's real estate.

"It is necessary, before any operative judgment can be given, to ascertain the facts as to how the money was spent, for it is admitted that it was received by the late Charles Welch Tennent. The £5500 is still extant, and judgment could now be given in regard to it, finding that it was or was not a donation revocable and revoked. But it is desirable to keep the whole case together, so that one interlocutor will suffice. . . ."

* "OPINION.—The Lord Ordinary has explained in the opinion which he delivered on 20th October 1888 the grounds upon which he holds that the rights of the parties in this cause as to the £18,000 and £5500 concluded for must be determined according to the law of Scotland. A proof was allowed, however, to the defender to shew that the £18,000, of which repetition was asked, was spent in household and family expenditure, and if this had been established the Lord Ordinary was prepared to find that that £18,000 could not be claimed by the pursuer. It has, however, been intimated to the Lord Ordinary by the defender that he is unable to undertake such a proof. It is admitted upon the record that the original defender, Charles Welch Tennent, did receive the said sum of £18,000, part of the price of the estate of Overton, which belonged to the pursuer, but it is denied that that sum was retained by him and forms part of his estate; and it is averred that that sum never was invested by said defender, but was lodged in bank and afterwards spent by the spouses, or by Welch Tennent, with the knowledge and consent of the pursuer, on their joint establishment. It was this latter averment that was sent to proof, and which the defender now admits he cannot prove. The admission that the money was received by Charles Welch Tennent, the husband, throws the onus of proof upon him, so as to shew to the Court in what way he disposed of the money.

"The £18,000 being thus traced into the husband's possession, and the right to that money being to be determined by the law of Scotland, according to the interlocutor already pronounced, the question comes to be, whether it fell under the jus mariti. It is quite settled, according to Scottish law, that the transmutation of the wife's heritage into money does not transfer to the husband jure mariti the price into which the heritage has been transmuted; and further, if such were the legal result of such a change from heritage to personalty, the wife was entitled to revoke the gift so made in favour of the husband, and this revocation she has in the present case done by express deed.

"There is thus, therefore, no defence against the wife's demand for payment of this £18,000. But, according to Mr Justice Kay, it is the law of England that, 'After the marriage the estate of Overton belonged to Mrs Tennent in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate of the husband therein during the continuance of the coverture. Those rights and interests were saleable by them—as to the husband's estate without the concurrence of the wife, as to the wife's estate only with the concurrence of the husband in an acknowledged deed.' This legal right of the husband, called a 'freehold estate,' is more clearly explained in the record by the defender in these words:—'The pursuer being, at the date of her marriage with

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—1. The answers given by the English Court to the questions submitted to them were categorically in favour of the reclaimer. A married woman could sell heritage in England only under the provisions of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, and the sale of Overton had been carried through by Mrs Tennent under that Act with the concurrence of her husband. In the opinion of the English Court, the husband then “became absolutely entitled to the price thereof.” That was simply the effect of the English law upon the subject, and there was not necessarily any conversion of the heritage into moveables such as invoked and involved the operation of the Scottish doctrine of jus mariti.<sup>1</sup> Mr Justice Kay’s grounds of judgment could not be looked at, and the order said nothing more. Accordingly, the law of the rei sitæ must regulate the right to the price of the subjects. It must determine whether the price was heritable or moveable, and whether it was surrogatum for the heritage or not. The Lord Ordinary’s judgment was not supported by the authorities he cited. In the cases of Egerton<sup>2</sup> and of Newlands<sup>3</sup> the judgments proceeded upon the ground that marriage operated a constructive assignment to the husband of the wife’s property, the English law of the situs determining what the nature of the subject was, while

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.

Tennent v.

Tennent’s
Executor.

the said defender, seized of the said manor of Overton and other hereditaments for an estate of inheritance in fee-simple in possession, and no settlement of the pursuer’s estate having been executed prior to the pursuer’s marriage to the said defender, by the law of England the said defender, on his marriage with the pursuer, ipso facto acquired a freehold interest in the said manor of Overton and hereditaments foresaid, which entitled him to the rents and profits thereof during the joint lives of himself and wife, and which, in the event of there being issue of the marriage who could inherit, entitled him to such rents and profits during the remainder of his life. This freehold interest it was competent for him to alienate at pleasure.’ This is a kind of right similar to the courtesy of the law of Scotland, with this difference, that instead of commencing at the wife’s death it commences at the date of the marriage; and this right the Lord Ordinary is of opinion must be given effect to; and it is given effect to by the interlocutor which he has pronounced, whereby no interest is made payable to the pursuer upon the £18,000. Charles Welch Tennent obtained the money and used it for his own purposes, in consequence of his freehold right thus explained, and apparently upon this ground no interest is asked upon the £18,000. If he was entitled to the rents and profits of the estate before it was sold, he was entitled to the interest upon the price during his life. No interest has been asked by the pursuer upon this money since Charles Welch Tennent’s death in 1884, and the Lord Ordinary is therefore not called upon to pronounce any judgment as to whether such a claim could be effectually made.

“The next point has reference to the sum of £5500 which has been set apart and is now held in trust to answer an annuity payable out of the estate of Overton. Mr Justice Kay says in regard to this sum,—‘The trusts of this were declared by a deed, dated the 24th July 1877,’ &c. He examines this question with reference to the law of England, and he states his opinion,—‘That under the circumstances in this case, the £5500 cannot be treated as a chose in action to which the wife is entitled, but that if the domicile of the husband and wife had been English, the whole would now belong to the executor of the husband.’

“The domicile of the husband and the wife being however Scotland, and the law of the domicile being that which must be applied here, this sum of £5500 must be held for the pursuer. It never was mingled amongst the husband’s funds, but was set apart and earmarked, and was part of the price of her heritable estate, and was therefore, according to the authorities referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his former opinion, the property of the wife.”

<sup>1</sup> Erskine’s Inst. ii. 2, 16.

<sup>2</sup> Egerton v. Forbes, Nov. 27, 1812, F. C.

<sup>3</sup> Newlands, &c. v. Chalmers’ Trustees, Nov. 22, 1832, 11 S. 65.

No. 158. the Scots law of the domicile determined the effect of the jus mariti. But in the present case the moveable property never belonged to Mrs Tennent. She had from the first made up her mind that it should be moveable, as appeared at the time of the sale from the affidavit when the certificate was granted by the commissioners, and it was accordingly impossible to say that it must be held to be the surrogatum for the heritage, and therefore hers. The case of Hall<sup>1</sup> was apparently an authority against the view that the law of the situs must decide as between husband and wife what the nature of a fund was, and seemed to shew that it was for the law of the domicile to say whether, in the present case, the price was surrogatum or not. Lord Fraser had commented doubtfully upon the authority of that case.<sup>2</sup> Further, the price of the estate here could not be both surrogatum and moveable. If it was surrogatum, it passed to the husband as heritage under the English law; if it was moveable, it passed to the husband jure mariti. The whole law of surrogatum was special. The doctrine was based upon the presumption that where a married woman sold heritable estate she did so with the intention of changing the investment of it, and not with that of converting it into cash. The intention to convert might be proved by facts and circumstances.<sup>3</sup> Here it was proved by the terms of the certificate and affidavit above mentioned. 2. If there was donation it was a donation of heritable property; the price never belonged to the wife. Donation of heritable property by a wife was not revocable in England.<sup>4</sup> Supposing, on the other hand, the question of the revocation of the donation fell to be decided by the law of Scotland, could it be said that there was any donation here? Donation was not to be implied from the fact of a spouse having sold her heritage, and there was nothing more here. If it was to be so implied, it would cover the case of a sale by a husband equally with that of a sale by a wife; but the case of Lees was opposed to that doctrine.<sup>5</sup> The true view was that the husband got the price as personal property by the law of England, and that the case was in no sense one of donation. 3. If the reclamer were held to be wrong on the two first points, the price of the heritage fell to be apportioned between the spouses as at the date of the sale, and the actuarial value of the husband's interest as at that date fell to be deducted from the sum sued for. The expenses of the sale ought also to be deducted.<sup>6</sup> Further, in any view, the Lord Ordinary had gone wrong in decerning against the defender personally.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—1. At the date of the marriage the estate of Overton was heritable property belonging to the pursuer. During the marriage it was converted into money, and by the law of Scotland, which was the law of the domicile of the spouses, the price of the estate was held to be surrogatum for the estate itself. It did not matter that the wife did not handle the money and that the transaction was carried through by the husband. It was not the sale which brought the subject within the jus mariti of the husband. The effect of the sale was clearly separable from the transaction of sale itself, and was to be decided by Scots law. When the price thereafter passed into the hands of the husband the law of Scotland held it to be a donation inter virum et uxorem, and therefore revocable.<sup>6</sup> Hall's case was the converse of the

<sup>1</sup> Hall's Trustees v. Hall, July 13, 1854, 16 D. 1057.

<sup>2</sup> Fraser on Husband and Wife, i. 703, 743.

<sup>3</sup> Rollo v. Forrest, 1685, M. 5795.

<sup>4</sup> Fraser on Husband and Wife, 1322; Burge's Comma i. 639.

<sup>5</sup> Lees v. Wilson, Feb. 17, 1808, Hume, 191.

<sup>6</sup> Fraser on Husband and Wife, i. 703; M'Lennan v. Hathorn, 1758, M. 6098; Hall's Trustees v. Hall, July 13, 1854, 16 D. 1057; Cuthill v. Burns, March 30, 1862, 24 D. 849.

present; the judgment there assumed the doctrine of surrogatum, otherwise the question in that case would not have arisen. The doctrine applied even where the husband was employed to sell his wife's estate; it had been introduced as an exception to the generality of the rule of the jus mariti. It was true that if it could be shewn that the wife intended to convert, the price would not be held to be surrogatum. The presumption that she did not intend to convert was not rebutted here. The defender had shrunk from attempting to prove that the price was spent upon the expenses of the household. The proceedings under the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV., which were appealed to in support of the defender's contention, had reference only to the title to be given to a purchaser. They were introduced in order to facilitate the transfer of married women's property. 2. If it were held that the wife intended to convert, the price came to the husband as a donation, and it had subsequently been revoked by the wife. The law of England relating to the donation of an immoveable subject had been appealed to. An opposite view to that stated by Burge had been taken by another commentator.<sup>1</sup> But, further, it was impossible to say that, if there was a donation here, it was a donation of an immoveable subject. 3. It was said that the price should be apportioned between the spouses as at the date of the sale. No doubt Mr Tennent might have asserted his right to capitalise his share of the price. But he had elected to keep the whole fund and enjoy the interest of it. He could get no more, and it was impossible after his death to enter upon an actuarial investigation of his interest. The pursuer was willing to allow the defender the expenses of the sale.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer, Mrs Tennent, was married to the late Mr Welch Tennent on the 24th March 1877.

At the date of the marriage Mr Welch Tennent was a domiciled Scotsman. No marriage-contract was entered into between the spouses.

At the date of the marriage Mrs Tennent was possessed of a large amount of property both heritable and moveable, the heritable property being situated partly in England and partly in Scotland. In particular she was possessed of the estate of Overton, in the county of Salop in England.

On the 24th July 1877 Mrs Tennent, with concurrence of her husband, conveyed this estate to the marriage-contract trustees of Lord Boyne. The price was £23,500, and of this sum £18,000 was received by Mr Tennent, and the balance of £5500 was vested in trustees to meet a liferent annuity charged on the estate. This sum still remains in the hands of the trustees.

On the 21st December 1882 Mrs Tennent executed a deed of revocation by which she revoked all donations, provisions, deeds, writings or things whatsoever, made, executed, or done by her, in favour of her husband.

On the 1st June 1883 she raised this action against her husband, by which, in so far as now insisted in, she seeks (first) to recover payment of the said sum of £18,000, and (second) as regards the said sum of £5500 to have it found and declared that it is her property, and that, on the foresaid liferent annuity ceasing she is entitled to payment of it.

Mr Welch Tennent died on 8th October 1884, but the action has been transferred against the present defender, who is his executor and general disponee.

It appears that, prior to the conveyance of the estate of Overton, as before

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

<sup>1</sup> Barr's International Law (Gillespie's edn.), 404, sec. 97.

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

mentioned, and prior to the marriage of Mr and Mrs Tennent, certain negotiations had been going on with Lord Boyne as to the purchase by him of the estate, and it was pleaded by the defender, in answer to the pursuer's claims, that these negotiations had resulted in a binding contract of sale, and that, although the sale had not been carried into effect by actual conveyance, the effect of this contract was to convert the heritable estate into moveable—that, accordingly, the price, being personalty at the date of the marriage, by the law of England, passed jure mariti to her husband. This and various other questions as to the respective rights of the parties according to the law of England in the estate of Overton and the price thereof having thus arisen, a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice in England was prepared and laid before that Court in terms of the Law Ascertainment Act, 22 and 23 Vict. cap. 23, for the determination of these questions. We have now that opinion before us, which is conclusive on all questions of English law at issue between the parties.

That opinion is short, and I may read it. It is in these terms,—“This Court is of opinion that at the date of the marriage of the pursuer to the original defender, namely, the 24th March 1877, no valid or binding contract of sale of Overton in the said special case mentioned had been entered into by or on behalf of the pursuer as vendor and Lord Boyne or his trustees as purchasers; and that after the said marriage the said estate of Overton belonged to the pursuer in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate of the original defender therein during the continuance of the coverture, and that those rights and interests were saleable by them, as to the original defender's estate without the concurrence of the pursuer, and as to the pursuer's estate only with the concurrence of the original defender in an acknowledged deed, and under the conditions imposed by the Statute 3 and 4 William IV. chapter 74, and the rules thereunder: And that on the conveyance of the estate, . . . the original defender, by the law of England, became absolutely entitled to the price thereof, and that such right and interest in the price passed to him by the said conveyance, and by the refusal of the pursuer, on her separate examination, of any provision, rather than by any jus mariti; and that under the trusts of the indenture, set forth in paragraph 15 of the said special case, the pursuer is not entitled, by the law of England, to the sum of £5500 therein also mentioned, either as having survived the original defender, or as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the original defender during his coverture.”

The first thing, accordingly, which this opinion establishes, is, that the estate of Overton had not been converted into personalty at the date of the marriage, but that it then belonged to Mrs Tennent in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate of the husband therein during the continuance of the coverture—that is, as we should say, that the husband was entitled to the rents during the subsistence of the marriage. Had the estate been personalty at the date of the marriage, there would seem to be no room for doubt that, whether by the law of Scotland or of England, the price would have belonged to Mr Welch Tennent.

But that not being so, and the estate being heritable estate in the person of the wife at the date of the marriage, the question arises, whether the price of the estate on its sale after the marriage belonged to the husband or the wife, and that question appears to me to depend for its solution entirely upon this other question, whether the answer is to be sought in the law of England or in the law of Scotland. If the question is to be ruled by the law of England, there can be no doubt as to the answer, because, in the opinion of the High Court of Justice, by the conveyance of the estate Mr Welch Tennent became by the law of England absolutely entitled to the price. No. 158.

On the other hand, if the law of Scotland is to determine the matter, I think that it is conclusively settled by the authorities referred to by the Lord Ordinary that, where a wife sells her heritable estate, the price received is regarded as the surrogatum of the heritable estate, and does not fall within the jus mariti of the husband, but remains the property of the wife; and, indeed, I did not understand that this was seriously disputed by the defender.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

The question therefore is, whether the rights of the husband and wife in this fund are to be regulated by the law of Scotland or by the law of England. That the fund is personal estate by the laws of both countries I do not think is disputed, because, as I understand the opinion, it is because it is personal estate that the High Court of Justice holds that by the law of England it belongs to the defender. But if it is personal estate, then it is the law of the domicile of the spouses which rules the matter. I think that this is quite settled by the authorities to which the Lord Ordinary refers, and which I need not again quote.

The domicile of the spouses in this case being Scotch, the result is that as soon as this moveable fund came into existence the right to it fell to be regulated by the law of Scotland, and that as it was the surrogatum of the wife's heritable estate it did not go to the husband, but remained her own property.

Nor do I see anything in the circumstances attending the sale to take the case out of the ordinary rule. The sale was simply a sale by a married woman of her heritable estate, with concurrence of her husband, under the authority of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 74. No doubt there are provisions in that Act by means of which Mrs Tennent might, had she chosen, have protected herself to a greater or less extent from the operation of the law of England, by which the price of the estate as a moveable fund would become the property of her husband. She did not avail herself of these provisions, and had there been any question in this case as to whether she intended that the price should go to her husband, that circumstance no doubt might have been material. But as all gifts between husband and wife are revocable by the law of Scotland, it is of no materiality whether she intended to give the price to her husband or not, seeing that she has completely revoked all such gifts.

The defender further pleaded that the £18,000, which it is admitted that Mr Welch Tennent had received, had not been applied to Mr Welch Tennent's own uses and purposes, but had been applied, with the pursuer's consent, to the joint uses and purposes of himself and his wife; but the defender intimated that he was not prepared to undertake the proof thus allowed. That being so, it must be held that the money was applied to Mr Welch Tennent's own uses and purposes.

But the defender further pleaded that it appeared from the opinion of the High Court that the sale of the estate was a sale of the joint rights of husband and wife in the estate, and that Mr Welch Tennent would have been entitled to have the price received for it apportioned according to the value of their respective rights; and I understand that he proposes that an inquiry should now be made as to what would or might have been the actuarial value put upon Mr Welch Tennent's rights as at the date of the sale, and to retain this sum out of the price as his share thereof.

Had this claim been made at the time, I think it probably would have been difficult to resist it. But I think that such an inquiry now is quite out of the

No. 158.

June 28, 1889.
Tennent v.
Tennent's
Executor.

question. Mr Welch Tennent's right was a right to the rents of the estate during the subsistence of the marriage. He received the whole available price of the estate, and appropriated the whole interest or income of it to his own uses during the subsistence of the marriage.

The defender is not asked to repay any part of that interest or income. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the price of the estate must be considered as coming in place of the estate itself, and that the interest or income of the price which Mr Welch Tennent received must be held as equivalent to the rents to which he was previously entitled.

I am of opinion therefore that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be in substance adhered to. There is, however, a small matter, apparently not brought under his Lordship's notice, in respect of which I think it should be slightly altered. He has decerned against the defender for the full sum of £18,000, but I think that there should be deducted from this sum the expenses of the sale, and any other charges of a similar kind which formed proper deductions from the price received by him.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I entirely concur, and I have only to say that, as I think the case has been very clearly and exhaustively dealt with by Lord Fraser in the opinions appended to his interlocutors of 20th October and 10th November last, I can add nothing.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in Lord Adam's opinion.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, with these variations,—(1) that the expenses incurred by Mr Tennent in connection with the sale of Overton were allowed to be deducted from the amount found due by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and (2) that decree against the defender was given against him in his capacity of executor and general disponee of his brother only.

PETER DOUGLAS, S.S.C.—HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 159.

June 29, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

SIR ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Pursuer.—Dundas.

JOHN STEWART KENNEDY, Defender.—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

Process—Jury trial—Interlocutor approving issue—Appeal to House of Lords with view to obtaining second issue—Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 36), sec. 13.—In an action of reduction of missives of sale of a landed estate the pursuer proposed issues of facility and circumvention, and of essential error. The Lord Ordinary appointed the issue of facility and circumvention to be "the issue for the trial of the cause." On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, Lord Shand dissenting, on the ground that the pursuer was entitled to both issues. The pursuer having appealed to the House of Lords, the defender moved the Court to allow the cause to go to a jury on the issue as adjusted, on the ground that the question whether the second issue should be granted was not "necessarily dependent" on the interlocutor appealed against within the meaning of sec. 13 of the Court of Session Act, 1850.* The Court refused the motion, the Lord President and Lord Adam doubting whether a trial pending appeal would be competent.

* Sec. 13 of the Court of Session Act, 1850, enacts "that no reclaiming note to the Inner-House, and no petition of appeal to the House of Lords, in any process before the Court of Session shall be held to remove such process from before the Lord Ordinary or the Court, as the case may be, as regards any point or points not necessarily dependent on the interlocutor so submitted to review, but such process shall for all purposes and to all effects not necessarily depen-

(VIDE Stewart v. Kennedy, ante, p. 857.)

No. 159.

In this action for reduction of missives of sale of an estate (the circumstances of which are fully set forth, ante, p. 857), the pursuer proposed issues of facility and circumvention and of essential error. The Lord Ordinary (Kinneer), on 28th May 1889 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Holds the issue, No. 12 of process [being the issue of facility and circumvention], as now amended as adjusted and settled; approves of the same as now authenticated accordingly, and appoints the same to be the issue for the trial of the cause."

June 29, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kinneer.
C.

On 25th June, on a reclaiming note at the instance of the pursuer, the First Division, diss. Lord Shand, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to him to proceed.

The defender, Mr Kennedy, thereafter moved the Lord Ordinary to fix a day for the trial of the cause.

The pursuer opposed the motion on the ground that he was about to appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutor of 25th June with a view to obtaining an issue of essential error.

On 29th June the Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the First Division.

Counsel for the pursuer stated that the appeal was ready, and would be served on Monday, July 1st.

Argued for the defender;—The Lord Ordinary had appointed an issue of facility and circumvention to be the issue in the cause, and the Court had affirmed his interlocutor. It was therefore competent for the cause to be sent to trial on that issue alone, unless the point whether an issue of essential error should be allowed was "necessarily dependent" on the interlocutor submitted to the review of the House of Lords within the meaning of section 13 of the Court of Session Act, 1850. But that point was not "necessarily dependent" on the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Issues of facility and essential error were quite distinct, and it was only as matter of convenience that they were tried together in the ordinary case; the questions raised and the lines of proof were quite distinct. It was then a question of expediency whether the cause should go to trial on the issue already adjusted, or whether it should be delayed to await the result of the appeal. It would clear the case (should the House of Lords allow an issue of essential error) if the question of fraud were decided and out of the way. Time was of great importance here considering the pursuer was eighty-one years of age, and the pursuer had no cause to complain of the proposed course of procedure, because, if he were successful on the issue of facility that would put an end to the case, while, if the House of Lords refused the appeal he would be none the worse from the trial having already taken place. The cause should be set down for the sittings, or a remit should be made to the Lord Ordinary to fix an early day for the trial.

Argued for the pursuer;—The question for the House of Lords to determine was, "What was the proper issue on which to try the cause?" That question was raised by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which only allowed one issue, whereas the House of Lords might hold that two issues were essential. The point was thus necessarily dependent on the interlocutor submitted to review, and it was impossible from the wording of the interlocutor to split it up into two points, one of which was appealed and the other not.<sup>1</sup> Assuming, however, that the proposed course was lent on such interlocutor remain before the Lord Ordinary or the Court as the case may be, and shall be proceeded in by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, notwithstanding such reclaiming note or appeal, if it appear to the Lord Ordinary or the Court to be expedient and proper."

<sup>1</sup> Johnston v. Johnston, Aug. 10, 1869, 3 Macq. 619, Lord Chancellor, p. 624.

No. 159. competent, it would be very unusual, in fact unprecedented, and a hardship on the pursuer, as, should the appeal be sustained, it laid upon him the anxiety and expense of two jury trials instead of one, and, further, would save little time, as the House of Lords would, in cases where despatch was urgently required, make arrangements for an early hearing.

June 29, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The motion now made by the defender is founded on section 13 of the Court of Session Act of 1850, which provides "that no reclaiming note to the Inner-House, and no petition of appeal to the House of Lords, in any process before the Court of Session shall be held to remove such process from before the Lord Ordinary or the Court, as the case may be, as regards any point or points not necessarily dependent on the interlocutor so submitted to review, but such process shall, for all purposes and to all effects not necessarily dependent on such interlocutor, remain before the Lord Ordinary or the Court, as the case may be, and shall be proceeded in by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, notwithstanding such reclaiming note or appeal, if it appear to the Lord Ordinary or the Court to be expedient and proper."

The first question to be considered is whether that section applies to the interlocutor which has been taken to appeal. That interlocutor is the interlocutor pronounced by Lord Kinnear on 28th May and affirmed by us on 25th June. Our affirmance was a simple one, and everything therefore depends on the terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. He "holds the issue as now amended as adjusted and settled; approves of the same as now authenticated accordingly, and appoints the same to be the issue for the trial of the cause." Now, if the House of Lords should reverse our judgment on the matter of the relevancy of the averments of essential error, the issues for the trial of the cause would necessarily be two in number, and not one only. Now, when the Lord Ordinary approved of "the same"—that is to say, a single issue—to be the issue, he necessarily determined that there could be no other issue for the trial of the cause. The question, then, which will come before the House of Lords seems to be, whether the issue of facility and circumvention approved by Lord Kinnear's interlocutor is to be the sole issue sent to trial, or, in other words, whether his judgment was sound or not.

If our judgment is reversed, and it is held that another issue is required, then the issue of facility and circumvention will not be "the issue" for the trial of the cause but only one of the issues. I think it would be inconsistent with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and with our affirmance to hold that there can be two trials, for the Lord Ordinary and this Division only contemplated one issue and one trial. In these circumstances I doubt the competency of proceeding with the trial on the issue already adjusted, and if there is any doubt about the question of competency there can be no doubt on the question of expediency.

LORD MURE.—There is here a nice question raised by the form of the interlocutor as to the points which will arise before the House of Lords. It may be that the House of Lords may hold that the proper issue has not been settled here or that another issue is required. In those circumstances I do not think it would be expedient for us to grant the defender's motion.

LORD ADAM.—Your Lordship in the chair has exactly expressed my opinion on this question, and I have nothing to add.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT refused the motion.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 159.

June 29, 1889.
Stewart v.
Kennedy.

RAYMOND BLASQUEZ, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Murray—John Wilson.

LOTHIANS RACING CLUB, Defenders (Respondents).—*J. C. Thomson—
H. Johnston.*

COSMO REID, Defender (Respondent).—M. Kechnie—Sym.

No. 160.

June 29, 1889.
Blasquez v.
Lothians
Racing Club
and Reid.

Process—Jury Trial—Issue—Counter issue—Reparation—Slander.—In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer obtained the following issue:—“(1) Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, within the ring or paddock of the ‘Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting’ at Musselburgh, the defender, in the presence and hearing of” A B “and others, falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, ‘this is the man who owes me money,’ or used words of similar import, meaning that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?” The defender proposed the following counter issue:—“Whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay?” The pursuer contended that the words “and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock” should be added to the counter issue. The Court held that those words should be added to the counter issue.

RAYMOND BLASQUEZ, Princes Street, Edinburgh, raised an action for 1st DIVISION. damages against (1) the Lothians Racing Club and the office-bearers and Ld. Wellwood. C. individual members thereof, and (2) against Cosmo Reid, bootmaker in Edinburgh. The grounds of action were that the defender Reid had by false representations slandered the pursuer within the ring or paddock at a race meeting at Musselburgh in October 1887, and had wrongfully expelled him or caused him to be expelled from the ring or paddock, and that the Lothians Racing Club had wrongfully expelled the pursuer or caused him to be expelled from the ring or paddock.

The pursuer proposed the following as the first issue against Reid:—“(1) Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, within the ring or paddock of the ‘Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting’ at Musselburgh, the defender Cosmo Reid, in the presence and hearing of Augustus Francis Meredith Powell, medical student, Edinburgh, and Walter Sprott of the Edinburgh Police Force, and others, falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, ‘this is the man who owes me money,’ or used words of similar import, meaning thereby that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and that the pursuer ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The defender Reid objected to the words “and that the pursuer ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock,” on the ground that they were merely an inference from the innuendo which pursuer placed upon the defender’s words, and maintained that they should be struck out.

He also proposed a counter issue in these terms,—“Whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay,” and maintained that such a counter issue would meet the substantial part of the alleged libel, and that he was not bound to do more.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Torrance v. Weddell, Dec. 12, 1868, 7 Macph. 243, 41 Scot. Jur. 149; Ogilvie v. Paul, June 28, 1873, 11 Macph. 776, 45 Scot. Jur. 511; M’Iver v. M’Neill,

No. 160.

June 29, 1889.
Blasquez v.
Lothians
Racing Club
and Reid.

Argued for the pursuer;—The words objected to in the pursuer's issue were a material part of the libel. If it was said that he owed money and dishonourably refused to pay, it was also said that he ought to be turned out of the society of honest men. The defender's counter issue must meet the libel, and therefore the words "and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock" should be added to it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think these words should be added to the counter issue for the defender Reid.

LORD MURE.—My impression was rather that these words were not needed, but I think the defender Reid must prove the allegation contained in these words as part of his defence, and I do not think there is any hardship in requiring him to do so. If a person is distinctly proved not to pay his racing debts, one may be entitled to infer from that that he is not a person to be allowed to remain in the ring. I accordingly do not see any harm in the addition of these words, and think they should be inserted.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with Lord Mure that there is no need to add these words. If the defender makes out the first part of his counter issue, he substantially meets the issue for the pursuer. But I am in the same condition of mind as Lord Mure, and see no harm in the addition of these words.

LORD ADAM.—The concluding words of the pursuer's issue form, I think, a substantial part of the libel, and if there is to be a counter issue, it must be made to meet that issue, and must include these words.

THE COURT adjusted these issues for the trial of the cause:—“(1. Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, within the ring or paddock of the ‘Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting’ at Musselburgh, the defender Cosmo Reid, in the presence and hearing of Augustus Francis Meredith Powell, medical student, Edinburgh, and Walter Sprott of Edinburgh Police Force, and others, falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, ‘this is the man who owes me money,’ or used words of similar import, meaning thereby that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £2000. Or, Whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions, which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock? 2. Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, the defender Cosmo Reid wrongfully expelled the pursuer, or caused him to be expelled, from the ring or paddock of the ‘Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting’ at Musselburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £5000. 3. Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, the defenders the Lothians Racing Club wrongfully expelled the pursuer, or caused him to be expelled, from the ring or paddock of the ‘Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting’ at Musselburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £5000.”

A. W. GORDON, Solicitor—GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents

MARSHALL & AITKEN, Appellants (Reclaimers).—Begg—Napier.
ROBERT COCKBURN MILLAR (Campbell's Trustee) AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Goudy.

No. 161.

July 2, 1889.
Marshall &
Aitken v.
Campbell's
Trustee.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Trustee—Compromise approved by general body of creditors—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 169.—A trustee in a sequestration entered into a compromise with a debtor to the estate, whereby he waived certain claims against the debtor on payment of a certain sum, and the debtor waived claims of retention, which, if sustained, would have extinguished the trustee's claim. At a meeting of creditors a resolution was passed approving the compromise. A creditor appealed against that resolution, and prayed the Court to ordain the trustee to grant his consent, as concurring pursuer, to an action which he proposed to raise against the debtor for the full amount of his debt, the appellant guaranteeing the expense of the proposed action. The Court refused the appeal, on the ground that the reopening of the question settled by the compromise might result in loss to the estate.

ON 28th August 1888 the estates of Captain John Alexander Living-<sup>1ST DIVISION.</sup> ston Campbell were sequestrated, and Mr Robert Cockburn Millar, C.A.,<sup>Ld. Kyllachy.</sup> was appointed trustee.<sup>M.</sup>

Thomas J. Millar was the sole commissioner in the sequestration.

The trustee claimed from Captain Edward P. Campbell, the bankrupt's brother, £1132, which he had received on the bankrupt's account.

Captain Edward Campbell stated that from the sum received by him he had made payments to his brother and to certain creditors of his brother at various dates from February to 13th June 1888, amounting in all to £891, 2s. 7d.; and that he was entitled to retain the balance to account of a personal claim he had against his brother for advances to the amount of £1042, 7s. 10d.

In November 1888 the trustee, with the consent of the commissioner, agreed to accept payment from Captain E. Campbell of £241, 5s. 7d. in full of all claims against him, and this sum was paid.

On 25th March 1889 a special general meeting of creditors was held at the expense of Messrs Marshall & Aitken, clothiers, Edinburgh (who had lodged a claim for £161, 14s. on 28th December). A motion was proposed and seconded, "that the meeting approve of the conduct of the trustee in settling with Captain E. P. Campbell." Mr Tait, on behalf of Messrs Marshall & Aitken, moved that, in respect they were prepared to guarantee the expenses in an action instituted against Captain Edward Campbell in connection with his illegal intrusions as agent for the bankrupt, the trustee be requested to give his consent, as such trustee, to the action. As this motion was not seconded, the former motion approving of the trustee's conduct was duly carried.

Messrs Marshall & Aitken thereupon brought this appeal against the above resolution under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.

The case was heard before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kyllachy) on 28th May, and, upon his Lordship's suggestion, the trustee lodged a minute, in which he stated,—“The trustee, with the consent of the only commissioner acting in the sequestration, entered into communication with Captain E. P. Campbell and his agent, Mr Somerville Greig, W.S., Edinburgh, and made a claim for payment of the whole of said sum of £1132, 8s. 2d.; that Mr Greig thereupon submitted to the trustee duly vouched accounts, two in number, and which shewed disbursements by Captain E. P. Campbell on his brother's behalf amounting to £1933, 10s. 5d., including the sum of £1042, 7s. 10d. due to himself personally for

No. 161.

July 2, 1889.
Marshall &
Aitken v.
Campbell's
Trustee.

advances made by him to or for his brother between 1879 and 1884, and claimed to set off the whole of said sum of £1132, 8s. 2d. as against these disbursements; that the trustee and commissioner, after examining said accounts, admitted £891, 2s. 7d. as proper deductions from said sum of £1132, 8s. 2d., but declined to admit the said sum of £1042, 7s. 10d., and claimed payment of the balance of said sum of £1132, 8s. 2d., which amounted to £241, 5s. 7d.; that Mr Greig at first refused to admit liability for said last-mentioned sum, but ultimately, after certain negotiations, and having obtained the opinion of counsel, he agreed to pay over the said sum of £241, 5s. 7d. in full of all claims by the estate against his client, and this sum was accepted by the trustee and commissioner in terms of this arrangement."

On 4th June the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the appeal.*

Marshall & Aitken reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Assuming that the transaction was a compromise, it was invalid in respect it was not carried through with the consent of two commissioners, as prescribed by the 75th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. There were two creditors who had lodged claims, and there should have been two commissioners. The trustee was not therefore in a position to make a compromise.<sup>1</sup> (2) Assuming that the transaction was of the nature of a compromise, the compromise was not only injudicious but illegal. Captain Edward Campbell, knowing his brother's insolvency, had paid away to other creditors a sum of money belonging to the bankrupt in defraud of the general body of creditors. An insolvent's agent was not in the same position as the insolvent himself, and Captain E. Campbell would not have been entitled to pay himself in full.

Argued for the trustee;—(1) The objection stated under the 75th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 was not good. At the date of the election of the trustee and the sole commissioner in the sequestration, * "OPINION.—This is an appeal against a resolution of creditors approving of the conduct of the trustee in a sequestration in settling certain claims against Captain E. P. Campbell, the bankrupt's brother. The appellants contend that the settlement approved of involves the renunciation of a claim competent to the estate which ought to be enforced, and they desire to be allowed to prosecute the same at their own expense, and to obtain the trustee's instance to enable them to do so.

---

"Had the transaction complained of been of the character alleged, I should have thought the appellants were right. Neither the trustee nor the other creditors would in that case have had any legitimate interest to prevent the claim being prosecuted at the appellants' expense. But I am satisfied upon the documents produced, and upon the minute which has been lodged for the trustee, that the transaction was truly of the nature of a compromise, whereby the trustee waived certain claims against Captain E. P. Campbell, and on the other hand Captain Campbell waived certain claims of retention which, if well founded, would have extinguished the trustee's claims altogether. I have not the means of judging how far the claims thus mutually waived were well founded. That is a matter on which it appears to me that the trustee and the creditors were entitled to judge. It is enough for the present purpose that by the settlement in question the bankrupt estate obtains payment of a sum of £241, 5s. 7d., to which, according to Captain Campbell's contention, they were not entitled, and which, if the question were re-opened, as the appellants propose, might be ultimately lost to the estate. It cannot, I think, be said that in these circumstances the body of creditors have no legitimate interest to prevent the matter being re-opened. I therefore refuse the appeal, and find the appellants liable in expenses."

<sup>1</sup> Dennistoun v. Dennistoun's Trustees, June 4, 1863, 1 Macph. 869, 35 Scot. Jur. 523; Gray v. Fraser, Feb. 6, 1850, 12 D. 684.

there were only two creditors with claims in the sequestration. One of these declined to act as commissioner, and in these circumstances the other creditor had to act as commissioner alone. Further, the resolution approving of the trustee's conduct was a resolution approving of what was on the face of the documents a compromise. (2) The trustee had in the exercise of a wise discretion agreed to accept from Captain Edward Campbell the sum of £241, 5s. 7d., giving up all further claims against him. Captain Campbell would have been entitled legitimately to set off the whole sum in dispute against a much larger debt due to him by the bankrupt. The trust-estate had thus been secured in a sum of money which might ultimately be lost to it if an action was raised against Captain Campbell by the appellants. He would be entitled to reopen the whole question settled by the compromise. In the case of Spence v. Gibson,<sup>1</sup> the compromise was inchoate, and the creditor wishing to raise an action guaranteed that no loss should be sustained by the trust-estate.

July 2, 1889.
Marshall &
Aitken v.
Campbell's
Trustee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

It seems to be questioned whether the arrangement arrived at between the creditors and Captain E. P. Campbell was in the nature of a compromise, but I have no doubt that it was. The claim of Captain Campbell on the one hand to retain all the money was waived, and on the other hand the trustee restricted his claim to £241, 5s. 7d. There was the giving and taking on both sides necessary to constitute a compromise. The compromise is not made, as is the usual case, merely by the trustee and the commissioners, in consequence of there being only one commissioner on the estate at the time, and the trustee and that commissioner thought it desirable to bring the matter before the general body of creditors. A special meeting of creditors was accordingly called, and when it was held the creditors unanimously approved of what had been done with the exception of the appellants, Marshall & Aitken. They desired to open up the whole matter, and to sue Captain E. P. Campbell in the trustee's name for payment of a much larger amount than the trustee undertook to receive as a matter of compromise. Of course such a proceeding would bring into peril the £241, 5s. 7d. paid to the trustee, for if Captain Campbell is sued for a larger sum than he has paid over under the compromise he must be allowed to plead that he is not due anything to the trust-estate, and the trust-estate may consequently lose the £241 altogether.

In these circumstances I do not think it can be said that the creditors have done wrong in refusing to allow the appellants to use the trustee's name, for the question which the appellants propose to raise might be to the great detriment of the trust-estate.

